The inference I draw as to what took place between the different parties at Savannah, and the conclusion to which I have come as a matter of fact from the documents put in, is that there was an arrangement between the master and the Georgia Export Co. and the repairers of the ship that the master should act in the discharge of the cost of the repairs in the same way as that in which he was bound under the charter-party to act in connection with the ordinary disbursements of the ship.

The repairs were completed, and I infer that the Georgia Export Co. then paid the repairers of the ship the amount of their bill, for which a receipt has been put in. They then proceeded to prepare a draft which is headed "Disbursements, Savannah, the 20th of January, 1899," and purports to be for "value received for necessary disbursements owed by my vessel at this port." There is a similar draft, practically in the same terms, for £546 for the ordinary disbursements of the ship. The draft was drawn by the master of the ship in favour of the Georgia Export Co. and the Georgia Export Co. insured the draft with the Firemen's Fund Insurance Co. I understand that when the vessel was totally lost on her voyage home the Georgia Export Co. claimed from the Firemen's Fund Insurance Co. the amount insured on the draft, which included the amount of the repairs, the commission, and the insurance upon them, and that they were paid the amount thus insured. They therefore never made any claim, nor could they have made any claim upon the owners of the ship to reimburse them the cost of the repairs to the ship which they had discharged. The plaintiffs, however, in effect say "Our ship was damaged and our ship was repaired, and we became liable to pay the cost of the repairs; and although we have not paid anything we have a claim upon the underwriters for which we ought to be"—I cannot say indemnified—"paid."

The question is whether these facts give rise to any claim against the underwriters on the original policy on the ship. In my opinion they do not, and my reason is this: I have found as a fact that the master at the port of shipment when he was arranging for these repairs to be done arranged with the parties that they should be liquidated in the same way as the ordinary disbursements were going to be liquidated, and I think he carried out the transaction in such a way that the owners of the ship never became liable to pay for the cost of these repairs. That brings the case within the principle stated in paragraph 1267 of the 5th edition of Phillips on Insurance, as follows: "In England and the United States the underwriters are unquestionably liable for a subsequent total loss in addition to the expense of previous repairs which have been previously paid for by the assured in distinction from those made by means of funds raised on bottomry." The meaning of that passage is, that where a particular average damage has been incurred, and the master arranges for the repairs which are thus necessitated being discharged by means of moneys raised on bottomry, he never imposes any personal obligation to pay those moneys upon the owners of the ship or any obligation upon them to pay if the ship is lost on the voyage home; and that, therefore, if the vessel is lost on the voyage home, and the underwriters pay a total loss, the assured does not in fact sustain a partial loss, because he never has to pay for it, and is adequately and properly indemnified by being paid by his underwriters for the subsequent total loss. There is no doubt that in the case of bottomry that meets the necessity and the justice of the case.

The decision I have come to in this case is that there is, legally speaking, no substantial distinction that I can detect between the case of bottomry and the present case. I am much assisted in arriving at the conclusion of law and fact to which I have come by the view taken by Sir Robert Phillimore in the case of The Karnak, 17 W. R. 58, L. R. 2 A. & E. 289, with regard to the presumption, or perhaps I ought to say inference, which ought to be drawn in a case of this class. He says that he is "of the opinion that, in the absence of all evidence, the presumption must be that the foreign lender made the advances in contemplation of a bottomry security, and this presumption is increased where the lex loci empowers the lender to arrest the ship in satisfaction of his demand." I think I am quite justified on the materials laid before me in presuming and inferring that the repairer of this ship meant to have the repairs paid for in the way I have suggested, and meant to have them paid before the ship left the port, and that in doing so he was looking to have his advances paid, not by bottomry exactly, but in a way which this course of business, when properly understood, shows is substantially of the same nature—that is to say, making the liability of the owner of the ship dependent upon the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge, in which case the draft was to be paid three days after arrival. I have also no doubt, though no evidence has been given about it, that the repairer of the ship did not let this ship go without being secured in the way I have suggested. This particular case raises a stronger presumption than that which Sir Robert Phillimore suggested should be drawn in the case with which he was dealing, because there is actual evidence here from which I think I may, and ought to, infer that what took place was what I have in substance stated. There is no doubt that it is the way in which the parties treated this case; though when the claim was put forward in this country the assumption was that the owners of the ship were liable at the outset to discharge this claim, and that what took place between other underwriters was immaterial. If, however, I am correct, that point is entirely disposed of, and therefore this case is of quite a different class to Lidgett v. Secretan, upon which counsel for the plaintiffs relied, because there never was a loss for which the owners of this ship could make any claim. The conclusion of fact to which I have come is that the law is in accordance with the business view of the matter—namely, that the plaintiffs have not sustained any loss against which they can ask to be indemnified; and my judgment, therefore, is for the defendants.

One other point remains, and that is that the defendants have already paid £52 on account, and this they seek to recover. The money was paid in this way. As soon as it was known that the ship had been damaged and sufficient information as to the extent of the damage was received in this country, the average adjuster sent round a letter stating the position up to that date, and in substance advising that the underwriters might safely settle on account towards the costs of repairs, and accordingly in January this settlement on account was made. Later on, in April, a total loss was settled.

The plaintiffs now say that the defendants cannot have this money back because they have paid it in discharge of liability. The defendants say they paid it on account of any liability which they should ultimately be found liable for. I think the money was paid without prejudice on account of the ultimate liability if it turned out that there was any ultimate liability. For instance, when the money was paid the repairs were in progress, and they might never have been completed. The ship might have been destroyed by fire in the meantime, and the expense of repairs never incurred, and it cannot be that where there is no liability the owners are entitled to retain money which has been paid in such a way. It was paid under a mistake of fact, and in the way in which the witnesses for the defendants have said—that is, on account of what they might ultimately be found liable for. There being no liability, the money should be returned.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the court ought to be for the defendants on both the claim and counterclaim, with costs.

Practice—Pauper—Suing in formâ pauperis—Assigning official solicitor to assist pauper—Ord. 16, r, 26.

The official solicitor of the court ought not, except in special circumstances, to be assigned to assist a litigant suing or defending in formâ pauperis.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers, discharging an order of the master.

The plaintiff was admitted to sue in formâ pauperis, and the master, under ord. 16, r. 26, assigned the official solicitor to the court to assist him in the action. It appeared that the plaintiff had not employed a solicitor in the matter, nor had he brought before the master the name of any solicitor to be appointed to act for him in the action.

Upon appeal by the official solicitor, Day, J., discharged the order of the master.

The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff in person.

H. Sutton, for the official solicitor.—It is not suggested that the plaintiff has not a primâ facie cause of action. The official solicitor objects to be assigned to a pauper litigant unless there are special circumstances requiring that this should be done. Ord. 16, r. 26, is wide enough to give the court jurisdiction to assign the official solicitor, but the court ought only to do so in special circumstances. This view is borne out by a long-continued course of practice. Ord. 16, r. 26, goes back to the year 1661, for an order in somewhat similar terms appears in Beames's Orders in Chancery, p. 216. The official solicitor is the successor to the solicitor to the Suitors' Fund, and since the Judicature Acts he has been known as the official solicitor of the Supreme Court. By 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 15, one of the masters of the Court of Chancery was directed to visit the Fleet Prison four times a year and to examine the prisoners confined there for contempt of the Court of Chancery in not putting in an answer to a bill in equity, and report to the court; and the court might order the costs of a prisoner's contempt to be paid out of the Suitors' Fund, and to assign him a solicitor and counsel to put in an answer and defend him in formâ pauperis.

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 149, s. 2, this duty was transferred to the solicitor to the Suitors' Fund, and by section 6 the expenses incurred by the solicitor were to be allowed out of that fund.

In 1869, by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 91, the Suitors' Fund was transferred to the Treasury. Besides acting for defendants in contempt of the Court of Chancery, the official solicitor acts for infants and lunatics in proper cases (see 1 Daniell's Chancery Practice (6th ed.), pp. 175, 184), and in such cases he gets his costs out of the estate. Except in the above cases the official solicitor never acts for litigants suing or defending in formâ pauperis, and it has never been the practice to assign him. There is no provision indemnifying him against any expenses he may incur in such a case if the pauper for whom he acts is unsuccessful. Formerly this burden of looking after paupers was imposed on the six clerks, but this was probably done in consideration of the large income they derived from their office. The official solicitor has only a salary of £500 a year, and this covers his ordinary work. If the official solicitor is always to be assigned to assist a pauper litigant where the latter has no solicitor of his own, pauper litigants will never have solicitors, and the position of the official solicitor will become a very difficult one. Even if the pauper litigant is successful, the solicitor can only recover out-of-pocket expenses and a reasonable sum to defray office expenses: Carson v. Pickersgill, 33 W. R. 589, 14 Q. B. D. 859; Johnson v. Lindsay & Co., [1892] A. C. 110, 40 W. R. Dig. 180.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The plaintiff in this case obtained leave to sue in formâ pauperis, and the master assigned the official solicitor of the court to assist him in the conduct of the action. The official solicitor objected to being assigned, and upon appeal Day, J., discharged the master's order. Thereupon the plaintiff appeals to this court. The first question is whether the court has any jurisdiction to assign the official solicitor to assist a person who is suing or defending in formâ pauperis. That depends upon ord. 16, r. 26. In my opinion there is clearly jurisdiction to assign the official solicitor. The rule is perfectly general in its terms. The next question is whether the official solicitor ought to be appointed. The official solicitor has certain duties to perform, and he is paid to perform those duties. I do not think that it is any part of his duty to take up the case of a pauper litigant who has not got a solicitor of his own. If he were compelled to take up such cases, his position would be an impossible one. There are certain cases provided for by statute, to which we have been referred, where the official solicitor acts for pauper defendants, and there are also the cases of infants and lunatics, where he gets his costs out of the estate. But if he were liable to be called upon to act for every pauper plaintiff or defendant who had no solicitor, his position would be an intolerable one, because if the pauper was unsuccessful the solicitor would not recover his out-of-pocket expenses, and sometimes, indeed, he might not recover them if the pauper for whom he acted was successful. Such a burden is not intolerable when spread over all the members of the profession. Therefore I think that the official solicitor ought not to be assigned unless there are special circumstances which require it. In the present case there are no special circumstances. The pauper litigant, when he obtains leave to sue or defend in formâ pauperis, should bring before the master the name of some solicitor who will conduct his case for him, and the master will then say whether the person suggested is a proper person to assign. For these reasons I think that the order of the learned judge is right. The plaintiff, however, is to be at liberty to bring before the master the name of some solicitor to assist him in the action.

COLLINS and ROMER, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

MARLBOROUGH (LILY, DUCHESS OF) v. DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH. (a.)

Settlement—Construction—Power to jointure wives in succession—Divorce—Power to jointure second wife during lifetime of first wife.

A settlement empowered a person to appoint to "any woman whom he might marry" yearly rent-charges by way of jointure, but provided that the settled estates should not be liable to the payment of jointures exceeding on the whole a given sum.

Held, on the construction of the deed, that the exercise of such power in favour of a second wife after the dissolution of the first marriage by divorce was valid, and that there was nothing on the face of the clause which was contrary to public policy, being distinct from those cases which bargained for the event of future separation between husband and wife.

Appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

By the action the plaintiff, Lily, Duchess of Marlborough, the second wife, now the widow of the eighth duke, claimed a declaration that she was entitled to a charge of £2,500 on the Marlborough estates appointed to her by her late husband.

By a resettlement of the Marlborough estates, dated the 14th of July, 1866, the eighth duke, who was then the Marquis of Blandford, was empowered, subject to a jointure rent-charge in favour of the wife of the seventh duke, to appoint to "any woman whom he might marry" yearly rent-charges by way of jointure not exceeding in the whole the following yearly sums—viz., if the Marquis of Blandford should die in the lifetime of the seventh duke, then during the lifetime of the seventh duke £1,500 a year, and after his death £2,000 a year; if the Marquis of Blandford should survive the seventh duke, £2,500 a year. The settlement provided that the power of jointuring might be exercised as often as the Marquis of Blandford should marry, and also that the settled estates should not be liable to the payment of jointures exceeding in the whole the sum of £4,000.

In 1869 the Marquis of Blandford, on his marriage with Lady A. Hamilton, his first wife, appointed to her the following rent-charges by way of jointure: If he should die in the lifetime of the seventh duke £1 500 a year, and after his death £2,000 a year; but if he should survive the seventh duke £2,500 a year, in accordance with the terms of the resettlement.

In 1883, the Marchioness of Blandford, who is still living, obtained a divorce from the Marquis of Blandford, and subsequently, in the same year, the seventh Duke of Marlborough died.

Lord Blandford, who thus became the eighth Duke of Marlborough, married the plaintiff in 1888, and by a settlement made on this marriage he appointed to her a jointure rent-charge of £2,500 a year.

In 1892 he died, and in 1899 the dowager duchess, the widow of the seventh duke, also died.

In 1895 the plaintiff had married Lord William Beresford.

Byrne, J., held that the eighth duke had the power, under the resettlement of 1866, to create the jointure in favour of the plaintiff after the dissolution of his first marriage.

From this decision the defendant, the present duke, now appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the appellant, contended that the power to jointure was limited to £2,500 a year, which was exhausted after the appointment to the eighth duke's first wife. Whether a power of jointuring can be exercised more than once was discussed in Zouch v. Woolston, 2 Burr. 1136. The power could, moreover, be construed as providing for the event of a future separation between husband and wife, and was, therefore, contrary to public policy and illegal.

The following cases were referred to: Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas 1. at p. 197; Cartwright v. Cartwright, 3 De G. M. & G. 982; H. v. W., 3 K. & J. 382, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 29; Cocksedge v. Cocksedge, 14 Sim. 244.

Levett, Q.C., and Brinton, for the respondent, the plaintiff, were not called upon.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the trustees.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is an appeal from Byrne, J., and the questions raised are two. Dealing with them in the order in which they were argued before us by Mr. Haldane, I will describe them thus: First, whether upon the true construction of the resettlement of 1866 there was any power enabling the late Marquis of Blandford—who afterwards became the eighth Duke of Marlborough—who had already in exercise of a power contained in that deed appointed to his first wife a jointure rent-charge of £2,500, to appoint, upon his second marriage during the lifetime of his first wife, who had obtained a divorce from him, a jointure rent-charge of £2,500 for the second wife, now known as Lily, Dowager Duchess of Marlborough. That is the first question. The second question is whether (if the first question were answered in the affirmative) it was within the competence of the parties to the deed of 1866, which we have to construe, to bargain for a power which might in its exercise have such a result as I have mentioned. Now, it appears to me that the case is by no means open to the difficulties that have been suggested.

First of all, upon the point of construction, I will read as shortly as is consistent with clearness the clauses of the deed which have to be dealt with. It is not a marriage settlement or anything of that kind, but a resettlement on a family arrangement, and it provides as follows: [His lordship read the material clauses, and continued:] We get there a clear power to appoint a jointure to "any woman he may marry," exerciseable by the express terms of the deed as often as he shall marry; and as a safeguard to the estate that it might not be overburdened, there is a provision that any sum or sums by way of jointure should not altogether exceed the sum of £4,000. Now, it is argued upon the question of construction, that it does not include the case of a second marriage when the first wife, having obtained a divorce, might be living at the date of the second marriage. Really I must confess that I have been unable to grasp the argument. I can see that if I were considering the propriety of the terms of the settlement, and such an idea ever occurred as to what was to take place in the case of the marriage of a future Duke of Marlborough during the lifetime of the lady who had been his wife, and by whom he had been divorced, then there would be reasons for making a different provision from what is here made. But I cannot find that there is anything here pointing to that. We are told that that provision about exercising the powers as often as he shall marry was intended solely for the purpose of doing away with a doubt which once existed whether, having been exercised once, a power of jointuring could be exercised again. It may be the reason, or one of the reasons at all events, for which the clause was introduced. But I do not see any authority for supposing or entitling the court to hold that it was limited to that purpose. We are bound to take the words as we find them, and they are words absolutely without any doubt or difficulty. And it appears to me to be as clear that the eighth duke was entitled to make an appointment on the second marriage as he was on the first marriage, notwithstanding that his first wife was then living. It is always to be noticed that he had not charged more than £2,500 That may be sufficient or insufficient as a limit, but it has been chosen by the parties, and the court has no power or authority to alter it. So much for the construction of the deed.

Then as to the question of the parties being limited so that they were not competent to provide that there should be such a dealing with the property on the ground that it was against public policy. Of course we do not find a syllable in the deed which is against public policy. But it is said that, if we construe it so as to let in the second wife for a jointure, we are doing something which is contrary to public policy. I have rather a difficulty to make it out in what way, but I suppose it is that we are rendering a divorce more beneficial or less injurious to the husband than it otherwise would be. It is acknowledged that you must extend that argument to the child, which is a startling thing—that you cannot really appoint in favour of the children of the second marriage in the same way as you could if the marriage had taken place after the death of the first wife. Indeed, I do not see that it is possible for the argument not to go to that extent. Cases were cited—three, I think, altogether—one being a case of Cartwright v. Cartwright in the Court of Appeal—which, of course, we should follow if we thought it was binding upon us in this case—and the cases of H. v. W., and Cocksedge v. Cocksedge, before Wood, V.C. and Stuart, V.C., respectively. They are all alike in one respect. The parties to a marriage settlement, or what was equivalent to it, meeting together, chose to bargain about what should take place in the event of a separation of the spouses. One has never had any doubt that such a bargain as to what should be the effect of a future separation of people who are living together as man and wife is absolutely bad All that was there held was that, if you will bargain about an event which you are not entitled to look forward to, or to anticipate, your bargain will be bad. And it was carried so far in the case of Cartwright v. Cartwright, in the Court of Appeal, that where a father was settling his property and he stipulated as regarded a future separation, the court held that an advantage could not be gained by the son, an advantage which depended upon the separation which in fact afterwards took place. It was said that he had no right to claim through the fraud of the father, and that it was a fraud on the law to stipulate as he did. I do not see the resemblance at all, and I do not think that there is any, between the present case and any of the three cases which have been cited to us. They are perfectly easy to understand, and they are perfectly intelligible in principle. But it is equally clear, I think, that that principle does not apply to the present case. So I think, on both points that have been argued, the decision of Byrne, J., must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I will first say one word about the second point of public policy. So far as the three cases cited by Mr. Haldane are concerned, they are all cases in which you find on the face of the instruments a matter expressly bargained for which was contrary to public policy. In the present case it is not and cannot be suggested that there is anything on the face of this clause in the settlement which is contrary to public policy. It is only said that, in what I may call the accidental application of it, such a clause might operate as an inducement to a husband to look forward to a divorce because he knew he might be able to marry some other woman, and to provide for her out of the family estates. Speaking for myself, I very much doubt whether, even if this clause had been written out at large, as Mr Haldane suggested, it would have been against public policy. After all, public policy, like other things, must depend on a balance of what is politic, a balance of what is right. In this very matter of public policy one finds that principle sometimes applied, to take a different sort of case, to a covenant in restraint of trade deliberately entered into by somebody who presently wishes to avoid the enforcement against him of the covenant he has entered into because he says that restraint of trade is against public policy. In old days that used to be strictly so held. But in modern days you look at the whole subject-matter, and bear in mind that though on the one hand it may be contrary to public policy to have trade restrained, yet on the other hand it is contrary to public policy that a man should be allowed successfully to evade engagements he has entered into. So here you have got a clause which generally is free from any objection. It is found that in the case of a second marriage after a divorce obtained against a husband that this might possibly be an inducement to the husband to seek for a divorce, and as such is against public policy. But, on the other hand, if he does marry again, and the law allows him to marry again after a divorce, he has a duty to provide for his wife and children It seems to me very doubtful whether on the balance of consideration it would be against public policy to say that if a divorced husband, exercising the right that the Legislature has given him, and marrying again, were to make provision out of his property—because for this purpose questions about the family and the people interested in remainder do not come into consideration—the making of such provision is against public policy. So much on the point of public policy.

With reference to the conveyancing point, I only wish to say one word about it in order that I may express what I understand to be the argument which has been addressed to us. We are invited to read the power which it is expressly said the husband, Lord Blandford, may exercise as often as he shall marry—"the said power of jointuring" it is called—as being a general power, and to read the words "appoint to any woman" in the same sense as if the words had been "appoint on marriage." And then it is said that the intention is that there should be a power of jointuring limited to the £2,500, and that it is that power, and that power only, which may be exercised, not upon one marriage, but as often as Lord Blandford shall marry. Although that is a construction which one would perhaps not be sorry to give to these words, the words are too strong for us, and we can only construe them as the Lord Justice has construed them.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. With regard to the so-called public policy point, all I need say is that there is nothing whatever in that point. The simple truth is that here there is nothing whatever contrary to public policy in a settlement providing or contemplating that a tenant for life may validly marry more than once, nor in a settlement providing that, if he does, he may exercise certain powers over the settled property in order to provide for the wife and children of the subsequent marriages. The simple fact is that a provision of that kind in such a settlement is perfectly valid, and there is nothing contrary to public policy in it. The cases cited have nothing whatever to do with such a case as that I have indicated, and that case is the one before us. There was a point that might possibly have been argued upon the construction of this settlement, and that was that the power of jointuring was limited in this way, that the power could not be exercised in favour of any woman who did not become the tenant for life's wife—that is to say, who was not the wife of the tenant for life at the time of his death. That point has not been argued before us. We start on the assumption which the appellants have taken before us, that in this case the power was not limited in the way I have indicated, that the lady who divorced the eighth duke was entitled to the jointure which was appointed or purported to be appointed in her favour by the eighth duke. That being so, and that point not being taken, it appears to me clear that upon this settlement nothing can be said against the claim of the second wife. She was clearly within the words of this settlement, a woman whom the eighth duke married, and it is clear upon this settlement that the eighth duke had power to appoint to her by way of jointure a yearly rent-charge or charges not exceeding in the whole the sum he has appointed. The words "not exceeding in the whole" clearly point to this, that each woman who was entitled to have exercised in her favour the power of jointure might have limited to her a sum not exceeding in the whole the sums mentioned in the settlement. For these reasons it appears to me there is nothing whatever in the first point that was argued, and I agree in thinking that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

BRITISH MUTOSCOPE AND BIOGRAPH CO. (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER v. HOMER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distraint of patented article—Sale—2 & 3 Will. & Mary, c. 5, s. 1—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 16—Infringement of patent—Injunction.

A patentee's right is distinct from the right of property in a chattel.

On a sale by a landlord under a distress, a purchaser only acquires such a chattel interest as the landlord could and did seize.

It is essential to a distress that the property distrained should be capable of physical possession.

A patent right is not a chose in possession. A chose in action is incapable of manual seizure

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, the British Mutoscope and Biograph Co. (Limited) and the London and District Mutoscope Co (Limited), for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using, selling, letting, exhibiting, or dealing with a certain mutoscope coin-operating machine during the continuance of the letters patent. It was agreed that the motion should be treated as the trial of the action.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Farwell, J.

E. E. H. Brydges, for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appeared in person.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiffs the British Mutoscope and Biograph Co. are the owners of letters patent for an invention relating to mutoscopes. The plaintiffs the London and District Mutoscope Co. are the licensees, with the exclusive right to use and licence others to use coin-operated mutoscopes for exhibition purposes within the City of London.

In October, 1900, the last-named company delivered to one Maynard certain mutoscopes, to which their licence applied, for exhibition purposes, on certain conditions contained in an agreement of the 23rd of October, 1900. These conditions were: "To the manager of the London and District Mutoscope Co. (Limited). Please send me ten mutoscopes on the following conditions: (1) The money to be collected fortnightly by your own man, and checked by me or someone in my employ; (2) I am to receive 25 per cent of the gross takings by way of rent, payable when the collection is made; (3) you are at liberty to move the machines at any time, giving seven days' notice in writing; (4) the machines are to remain the sole property of yourselves; (5) in the event of any machine ceasing to work I will give you notice at once, and the same is to be rectified by you and at your expense; (6) if at any time these premises change hands, I agree to give you due notice, in order that you may remove machines or arrange with new tenants; (7) I undertake to protect machines from wilful damage so far as I am able; (8) all coins found in the machines to be the property of yourselves, subject to the percentage above mentioned. (Signed) H. J. Maynard." These mutoscopes were placed in a shop, 99, Whitecross-street, within the City of London, held by Maynard as tenant.

On the 23rd of December, 1900, Maynard made default in payment of the rent of the premises, and the landlord distrained and seized the ten mutoscopes.

On the 5th of January the mutoscopes were put up for sale by auction and the defendant purchased one of them. It was admitted that the notice required by the Act of William and Mary, hereinafter referred to, was given, and that the defendant knew before he purchased of the terms and conditions on which Maynard held the mutoscopes.

The plaintiffs claim an injunction to restrain the defendant from "using, selling, letting, exhibiting, or dealing with the mutoscope coin-operating machine during the continuance of the letters patent." The defendant alleges that he has purchased from the landlord selling under the authority of 2 William and Mary, c. 5, and that he is entitled to use the machine as he pleases without regard to the conditions on which

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Maynard held the same. Counsel for the plaintiffs, and the defendant in person appeared before me and asked me to accept the foregoing as an agreed statement of facts and to treat this as the trial of the action, and determine their rights under the said statute accordingly. No point was raised or argued on the question whether the machine, being on the premises for exhibition purposes, was within any of the common law exceptions to the general right of distress, and I accordingly express no opinion on this point.

A patentee is entitled to restrain any person in whose hands he finds an article which infringes his patent, from infringing such patent unless the defendant can show a title direct or derivative from the patentee to use the patent; and it has recently been held in Incandescent Gas Co. v. Brogden, 16 Rep. Pat. Cas. 179, that a purchaser who buys with the knowledge of the conditions under which his vendor is authorized to use the patented invention is bound by such conditions, and that such conditions are not contractual, but are incident to and a limitation of the grant of the licence to use, so that if the conditions are broken there is no grant at all.

The defendant, therefore, would be clearly liable in the present case unless the statute of William and Mary protects him; and he contends that the statute has this effect. At common law a landlord had no right to sell distresses, but only to detain them as pledges for enforcing payment. The right of sale, therefore, depends on the statute. Section 1 provides (I read it shortly) that, where any goods or chattels shall be distrained for any rent reserved and due upon any lease, and the tenant or owner of the goods, &c., distrained shall not within five days after such distress taken and notice thereof, left at the premises charged with the rent distrained for, replevy the same, the person distraining may in the manner pointed out by the Act appraise the goods and chattels seized, and after such appraisement sell them for the best price. The Act obviously extends to goods and chattels belonging to persons other than the owner of the demised premises, and it is therefore impossible for the plaintiffs to succeed on the short ground that the mutoscope and the right to use it free from conditions, were not the tenant's property. See Lyons v. Elliott, 24 W. R. 296, 1 Q. B. D. 210, at p. 213, where Lord Blackburn says: "The general rule at common law was that whatever was found on the demised premises, whether belonging to a stranger or not, might be seized by the landlord and held as a distress till the rent was paid." But it is equally clear that the Act does not extend the common law right to seize, but merely adds a power to sell that which the landlord could seize at common law. The landlord's right to distrain is founded on the principle that the rent reserved by his demise issues out of the land and he distrains by taking possession, in the nature of a pledge, of goods and chattels found upon such land. Thus Coke upon Littleton, vol. 1, p. 47*a*: "'Reserve to him a yearly rent, &c.' First, it appeareth here by Littleton that a rent must be reserved out of the lands or tenements, whereunto the lessor may have resort or recourse to distreine, as Littleton here also saith, and therefore a rent cannot be reserved by a common person out of any incorporeal inheritance, as advowsons, commons, offices, corodie, mulcture of a mill, tythes, fayres, markets, liberties priviledges, franchises, and the like." And with this accords Rolle's Abridgment, 446 (2) and (4): "(2) Un rent ne poet estre reserve hors d'ascun incorporeal inheritance come advowsons, commons, offices, corodies, multure d'un molyn, dismes, fairs, markets, liberties, priviledges, franchises et tiel semble. . . . (4) Un rent ne poet estre reserve hors d'un chose que gist solement en grant pur ceo que nul distresse poet estre." See also Jewel's case, 5 Rep. 3*a*. In distraining, therefore, the landlord looks to the land demised and to the goods and chattels found thereon. If the demise be of an incorporeal hereditament no entry can be made on it and no goods and chattels can be found on it, and in like manner, if the goods and chattels be of an incorporeal nature, they can have no local position upon the land demised and are incapable of seizure into the possession of the landlord. It is essential to a distress that the property distrained should be capable of physical possession. Now, a patent right is a privilege granted by the crown in the exercise of its prerogative to a first inventor, and is described in Stephen's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 8, as an incorporeal chattel. I should be disposed to classify it myself as a chose in action which has been defined to be "a right to be asserted or property reducible into possession either by action at law or suit in equity": see Fleet v. Perrins, 17 W. R. 862, L. R. 4 Q. B. 500 I refer to the common form of a patent: "Know ye therefore, that we . . . do by these presents . . . give and grant unto the said patentee our especial licence, full power, sole privilege, and authority, that the said patentee by himself, his agents, or licensees, and no others, may . . . make, use, exercise, and vend the said invention . . . and that the said patentee shall have and enjoy the whole profit and advantage from time to time accruing by reason of the said invention. . . . And to the end that the said patentee may have and enjoy the sole use and exercise and the full benefit of the said invention, we do by these presents . . . strictly command all our subjects whatsoever . . . that they do not at any time during the continuance of the said term of fourteen years, either directly or indirectly, make use of or put in practice the said invention, or any part of the same, nor in anywise imitate the same nor make or cause to be made any addition thereto or subtraction therefrom . . . without the consent, licence, or agreement of the said patentee . . ." Now this confers necessarily a right to bring an action to restrain infringement and to recover damages—at any rate, it is not a chose in possession. But a chose in action cannot be found upon the demised premises; it has no locality and is incapable of manual seizure, and this is borne out by the fact that for this reason choses in action could not at common law be taken in execution under a writ of fieri facias (Stephen's Commentaries, vol. 3, 598) or of levari facias (Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. jun. 196). The landlord has seized a chattel—viz., the mutoscope, and the plaintiffs raise no claim to any property in this; but the patentee's right is entirely distinct from the right of property in the chattel; it is a right of action to prevent any dealing with that chattel in contravention of the letters patent, and such right is no part of, or capable of seizure with the chattel, but is outside and antagonistic to the possessory title to the chattel. The plaintiffs' rights arise out of the grant under the royal prerogative, coupled with section 16 of the Patents Act, 1883, which enacts that "every patent when sealed shall have effect throughout the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man." The landlord has not taken and could not take possession of these rights, and the defendant had purchased only such a chattel as the landlord could and did seize. Having regard to the decision in Incandescent Gas Co. v. Brogden, referred to above, the defendant is in no better position than if Maynard had been a mere infringer. It is not a question of contract inter partes affecting a chattel seized and sold by a landlord, but of the absence of any licence, in the event that has happened, to use the patented invention. If the defendant's contention were correct, an infringer might fill his room with infringing articles and pay his rent by allowing the landlord to seize and sell them free from any right of the patentee to complain of the infringement. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to an injunction as asked, and to the costs of the action.

RIVINGTON v. GARDEN. (a.)

Practice — Costs on higher scale—Partition action—Special grounds arising out of the difficulty of the case —Ord. 65, r. 9.

The display by a solicitor of exceptional skill or ability in conducting a partition action and the proceedings incident thereto, involving great difficulty and labour, is not a "special ground" within the meaning of ord. 65, r. 9, so as to empower the court to order the taxation of the costs of the proceedings as between solicitor and client on the higher scale.

In such a case the court has no jurisdiction to order costs to be taxed on the higher scale.

In re Leeuw, 93 Law Times 333, and Marriott v. Cobbett, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 620, not followed.

This case arose out of a partition action on further consideration. The partition action had resulted in an order for sale and distribution of the proceeds in 180ths, and the point raised was whether, having regard to the immense amount of difficulty, labour, and skill involved in the conduct of the proceedings the solicitors engaged should be allowed costs on the higher scale as between solicitor and client under ord. 65, r. 9. Some of the persons entitled to give receipts for the shares were entitled absolutely, but others were entitled as trustees, the shares being settled. The former supported the application, but the latter, though they did not oppose, were unable to consent.

Terrell, K.C., in support of the application.—This is a clear case where the court should grant costs on the higher scale. The case has been one of extreme intricacy and difficulty and the estate has been saved much expense by reason of the ability and skill displayed by the solicitors. The difficulty of the case called for the skill of the solicitors. Hence the skill of the solicitors can be properly said to have arisen out of the difficulty of the case. It is therefore a special ground within the meaning of the order. The solicitors ought to be rewarded: Marriott v. Cobbett, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 620; In re Leeuw, 93 L. T. 333; Ellington v. Clark, 38 W. R. 873, 58 L. T. Rep. 818; Davies v. Davies, 36 W. R. 86, 56 L. J. Ch. 963; Paine v. Chisholm, 39 W. R. 353, [1891] 1 Q. B. 531.

Dibden, K.C., in similar interest.—We ask your lordship to give directions to the taxing-master to tax the costs as between solicitor and client on the higher scale in pursuance of the order.

Whinney, on behalf of the persons entitled to settled shares.—We do not oppose, but owing to the nature of our interest we are unable to consent.

Manning, K.C., Christopher James, Crossfield, and H. W. Vaughan Williams, for other parties interested.

BUCKLEY, J.—I will assume that the partition action and the proceedings connected therewith had been of very great difficulty and had been conducted with the greatest skill and ability by the solicitors engaged in it. Now, but for the rule the court has no power to give costs on the higher scale. It has been urged upon me that the special ground in this case is the skill and ability of the solicitors. In my opinion that cannot be said to have arisen out of the nature or difficulty of the case. The skill and ability of the solicitors arose from their natural capacity and education and existed quite apart from the difficulty of the case. The applicants relied upon the case of In re Leeuw. I may observe that in that case there was neither argument nor opposition. Then as to the report of the case of Marriott v. Cobbett it must be pointed out that that is not a regular report. It is a mere note, not contributed by the journal's authorized reporter. I decline to follow either of those cases. On the other hand I am guided by two decisions in the Court of Appeal—namely, Williamson v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 32 Ch. D. 399, 34 W. R. Dig. 44, and Paine v. Chisholm, and I may also refer to Assets Development Co. v. Close, 48 W. R. 699. I cannot find anything in the rule which says that solicitors should be rewarded for exceptional ability. I have no jurisdiction to order taxation on the higher scale.

In re ST. HILDA'S INCORPORATED COLLEGE, CHELTENHAM. (a.)

Company—Association not for profit—Alteration of objects—Addition of "Limited"—Board of Trade—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 23 —Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62).

An association not for profit, registered under licence from the Board of Trade without the word "Limited," applied to the court for confirmation of alterations of its objects as stated in its memorandum of association.

By the direction of the court the sanction of the board to the alterations was applied for and obtained.

The court granted the application.

Held, also, that, if the sanction of the board had not been obtained, the court could only have allowed the alterations if the word "Limited" were added to the name of the association.

Petition.

This was a petition for the confirmation by the court of an alteration of the objects of the memorandum of association of an association not for profit, registered without the addition of the word "Limited" to its name, and raised the question of the necessity of obtaining a fresh licence from the Board of Trade.

The St. Hilda's Incorporated College, Cheltenham, was incorporated in November, 1895, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, as an association formed as a limited company, and authorized under a licence of the Board of Trade to be registered with a limited liability without the addition to its name of the word "Limited."

Its objects, as stated in the memorandum of association, were, shortly, (a) to take over a then existing establishment called St. Hilda's College, Cheltenham, and carry it on as an educational establishment for gentlewomen and girls engaged in education, whether as students or teachers; (b) providing them with lodging and attendance and other necessaries; and (d) if thought desirable to affiliate that college with any university, college, or association.

The memorandum provided that the income and property of the association should be applied solely towards the promotion of its objects, and that no portion thereof should be paid directly or indirectly as dividends, or bonus, or otherwise, by way of profit to the members, except as payment for occasional services.

It was desired to take over another educational institution for gentlewomen and girls of a similar kind called "St. Hilda's Hall," established at Oxford by the same founders, and also registered without the word "Limited" under licence from the Board of Trade. A special resolution had accordingly been passed by the petitioning college that the name should be changed to "St. Hilda's Incorporated College," and that additions should be made to the objects enabling the amalgation to be effected.

Among other proposed additions it was proposed to add to object (a), after words enabling St. Hilda's Hall, Oxford, to be taken over, the words "To found and take over, or carry on, wherever from time to time it may be thought desirable, similar educational establishments, halls, hotels, and houses of residence, for gentlewomen and girls engaged or interested in education." And to add to object (d) words which extended the power of affiliation to "any hall or other similar establishment."

The petition was now presented on behalf of the association asking the court to confirm the special resolution.

P. B. Abrahams, for the petitioners.

R. J. Parker, for the Board of Trade, said the board had no objection to the proposed alteration except that they thought words ought to be inserted rendering the consent of the board necessary before any further extension of the college could be made.

BUCKLEY, J., directed a fresh application to be made to the Board of Trade under section 23 of the Act of 1867, for their sanction to the proposed alterations.

The words "subject to the consent of the Board of Trade" having been added to the proposed additions to objects (a) and (d) and the Board of Trade having approved of the alterations in that form, the matter again came before the court on the 26th of February.

BUCKLEY, J.—I directed the Board of Trade to be served, and I desire to say why I did so. Where the Board of Trade grants its licence under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, it does so upon seeing the memorandum of association and satisfying itself that the company to whom the licence is granted is such as satisfies the provisions of that section. Where a petition is presented for alterations in the memorandum under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, it may be that the proposed alterations would so alter the scope of the objects of the company as that the board, if applications were made to it anew, would not licence it, because it would not fall within the section. It seemed to me, therefore, that before I dealt with the application the board should be served. The board have attended before me and intimated that the alterations are not such in their opinion as to necessitate any objection on their part, by reason of the company desiring to vary the licence. The orders under the Act of 1890 can be made by virtue of section 1, subsection 3, on such terms and subject to such conditions as the court sees fit. Unless the board had assented to the alterations as proper in the case of a company bearing their licence, I should have had to direct either that the petition should be dismissed, or that the proper alterations should be made, so that the company should no longer trade without the addition of the word "Limited" to its name. However the officers of the Board of Trade see no objection, and I make the order. The company must pay the costs of the Board of Trade.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Jan. 11, 28.

In re LAKE.
Ex parte DYER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Deposit of securities to make good breaches of trust—Fraudulent preference—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 48.

The relation of debtor and creditor does exist between trustee and cestui que trust.

Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419 (per Halsbury, L.C., at p. 426), and In re Blackpool Motor Car Co. (Limited), ante, p. 124, [1901] 1 Ch. 77, followed.

If, therefore, it is established by evidence that a trustee, without any circumstances creating any special duty in favour of a particular trust estate, and within three months of his bankruptcy, has transferred any property to that trust estate with a view to prefer it, such transfer constitutes a fraudulent preference within section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Motion by the trustees of the marriage settlement of Colonel and Mrs Dyer for a declaration that four mortgage debentures of the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. were handed over by the bankrupt Benjamin Greene Lake, while one of the trustees of the said settlement, to his co-trustees to make good a breach of trust, and that such delivery or transfer did not constitute a fraudulent preference.

The marriage settlement in question was executed in 1869. Lake was appointed one of the trustees in 1898. He opened an account for the trust at Child's Bank and obtained an authority from his co-trustees enabling him to draw on it in his own name alone. He realized the trust estate and invested the proceeds in other than trust securities.

By the beginning of 1900 the books of the bankrupt showed that he was indebted to the trust to the extent of £1,250.

Upon the 7th of May, 1900, he deposited in the box containing the trust deeds and securities—four debentures of the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co.—together with a memorandum in the following words:

"I have just learnt that there is something like £1,000 of Dyer's Trust capital in the hands of the late firm. Had I known this I could not have permitted my daughter to have accepted their most generous help, without which our Streatham house could not have been secured. As I am a trustee the debt is a personal one, and one which I can properly make good out of my own assets. I therefore deposit £2,000 Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway 4 per cent. Debenture Stock as security for whatever may be found due. Its intrinsic value now is from 60 to 70 per cent., and I have quite recently been offered and have refused 40."

A judgment had been signed against Lake on the 1st of May, and a bankruptcy notice founded upon that judgment was served upon him on the 9th of May. He committed an act of bankruptcy by failure to comply with such notice, and a petition was presented against him upon the 2nd of June upon which he was ultimately adjudicated bankrupt.

After his bankruptcy the other trustees of the Dyer settlement requested the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. to register the four debentures in their names. The company refused to register them without the consent of the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy refused his consent, whereupon the present motion was launched.

It was admitted for the purposes of the motion that there had been a number of breaches of trust committed by the bankrupt in respect of other estates, and that in some cases he had made restitution, but that in the majority he had not.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Colt, for the applicants.

Northcote, for the respondent.

The case was argued upon the 11th of January, when judgment was reserved. The arguments and authorities cited appear in the judgment.

Jan. 28.—WRIGHT, J. (after stating the facts).—It was argued for the trustees of the settlement upon the authority of Ex parte Taylor, In re Goldsmid, 35 W. R. 148, 18 Q. B. D. 295, and Ex parte Stubbins, In re Wilkinson, 29 W. R. 653, 17 Ch. D. 58, that section 48 of the Bankrupcy Act, 1883, is inapplicable on the ground that the trustee and the cestui que trust do not stand in the relation of debtor and creditor. This doctrine was questioned in Ex parte Ball, In re Hutchinson, 35 W. R. 264, and its soundness is denied by Lord Halsbury, L.C., in Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419, at p. 426; and I agree with Buckley, J., in In re The Blackpool Motor Car Co. (Limited), ante, p. 124, [1901] 1 Ch. 77, that it must now be taken that this objection is untenable. At any rate in this case the debtor, who was both trustee and solicitor to the trust, was a debtor for the £1,250. It was further argued for the trustees of the settlement, on the same authorities, that a preferential payment by an insolvent trustee made by him in order to repair a breach of trust may be, and in this case ought to be, regarded as made by him not as a debtor, but as trustee, and not with a view to prefer the cestui que trust as creditor, but with a view to satisfy the trustee's own conscience. This doctrine does not appear to have commended itself to the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Ball, In re Hutchinson, but no further doubt is apparently thrown upon it in the House of Lords in Sharp v. Jackson, and the only question at present open is what is the exact scope and limit of this doctrine. Of course, if the fund or property which the debtor hands over is itself impressed with a trust the question does not arise: he is merely performing his legal or equitable obligation in handing it over. Next, if it is affirmatively proved that the debtor did not act with a view to prefer the trust estate, and acted merely to protect himself from penal or other consequences, that is settled to be no fraudulent preference. Again, if it is proved that he acted merely to satisfy his own conscience as a trustee, and not in the interest of the trust estate as a creditor, there is no fraudulent preference, if Ex parte Taylor, In re Goldsmid is good law. And possibly the doctrine is to be carried to this extent, that there may be a presumption that the trustee has acted for the satisfaction of his conscience as a trustee, and not with a view to prefer the trust estate as creditor. But I do not find any authority which necessarily gives any further extension to the doctrine so as to justify under all circumstances a preference by the trustee of the trust estate. If it is established by evidence that he acted not in his own interest nor from a sense of duty binding his conscience as a trustee to prefer a particular trust estate or to prefer trust estates over ordinary creditors, and still more if it is shown that, having committed several similar breaches of trust, he without circumstances creating any special duty in favour of a particular trust estate gives it a preference with a view to prefer it over the others, that must, as it seems to me, be sufficient to bring the case within the section.

In the present case the evidence, and in particular the memorandum which has been read, seems to me to establish that the debtor acted with a view to prefer this particular trust estate from a motive of gratitude. The motive may not be decisive, but it is a guide to what was the dominant or efficient view. Here there was evidently an intention to prefer the cestui que trust from a motive of gratitude, and not simply or merely from a sense of duty to repair this particular breach of trust as a breach of trust.

Application refused.

THURSBY v. ECCLES. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Parol agreement to rent furnished flat—Payment of one week's rent in advance—Before entry defendant repudiates agreement—Part performance—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.

The defendant verbally agreed to hire the plaintiff's flat for thirteen weeks at £4 10s. a week, and paid the first week's rent in advance, but in fact never took possession.

Held, in an action to recover rent for the full period, that the payment of one week's rent in advance on a parol agreement was not such a part performance as would take the case out of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and that the action could not be maintained.

Action set down for hearing under order 14.

The plaintiff sought to recover the rent of a furnished flat which the defendant had verbally agreed to rent for thirteen weeks from the 25th of June, 1900, at £4 10s. a week.

The defendant paid a week's rent in advance, but owing to a dispute arising between the parties, which is not material to this report, the defendant never took possession, and repudiated the agreement.

There was no memorandum of the agreement of any kind within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds.

Boydell Houghton, for the plaintiff.—The defendant having paid a week's rent in advance, section 4 of the Statute of Frauds does not apply: Nunn v. Fabian, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 35, 14 W. R. Dig. 119; Truman v. Stamp, 1 Stark. N. P. C. 12; Edge v. Strafford, 1 Cr. & J. 391.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Emile Cannot, for defendant.—The courts have never decreed specific performance of a parol agreement to lease a house on the ground that the mere payment of rent, apart from possession, took the agreement out of the statute. Nunn v. Fabian does not help the plaintiff; because in that case the tenant was in possession, and had paid rent under the new agreement, although the lease had not been executed.

BIGHAM, J.—The first point I have to decide in this case is whether the contract entered into between the parties comes within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds so as to preclude the plaintiff from suing upon it. I am clearly of opinion that this agreement is one concerning an interest in land, and that being so it comes within the mischief of the section. Therefore, although the contract subsists, the right to sue upon is taken away. But the plaintiff says that the payment of the week's rent in advance by the defendant was such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute. That is clearly not so. It has been held over and over again that where the contract is for the sale of an interest in land, and not merely for a tenancy of land, the payment of part of the price does not take the case out of the statute, and indeed it seems that payment of the whole price would not take the case out of the statute The whole law on the subject is laid down in Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467. The law as there stated I think shows clearly that a payment of part of the purchase-money in a contract of sale of lands is not such a part performance of the contract as will take it out of the statute. I see no distinction in principle between the payment of part of the purchase-money and the payment of part of the rent. When the Court of Chancery gives relief from the operation of the statute it does so upon the equities which have arisen out of the acts of the parties. Payment of money in such a case as this raises no equity except possibly a right to recover it back. I have therefore come to the conclusion that this action fails, and that there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

Semble, the notice must specify the alterations or additions required.

Per Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Bruce and Darling, JJ.—An appeal to quarter sessions from the requirement of the factory inspector lies under section 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.

Case stated by justices for the borough of Ipswich, who had dismissed an information and complaint by Anna Tracey, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories and Workshops, that the occupiers of a building used as a manufactory situate in the borough, at the said building, on the 16th of July, 1899, and on divers days between that date and the laying and making of the information and complaint had unlawfully neglected or refused to comply with the requirements of a certain notice in writing, dated the 15th of May, 1899, given pursuant to section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, and the Acts amending the same, and under section 22 (2) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, requiring the occupiers within two months from the date of such notice to provide the building with suitable and sufficient accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed or in attendance at the building, and with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex, and for that purpose to provide for the use of the females so employed or in attendance eighteen water-closets with proper fittings and appurtenances.

The following facts were proved or admitted:

The respondents were the occupiers of a building used as a corset factory.

The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, had been adopted in the borough of Ipswich.

The building in question was a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, and was situate within the sanitary district of the Ipswich urban sanitary authority.

The appellant was an inspector under the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895.

The notice prescribed by section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, was given to the sanitary authority by means of a letter dated the 2nd of March, 1899, of which, so far as material, the following is a copy: "I beg to inform you that on visiting the corset factory occupied by Messrs. Pretty & Sons, and situated at Tower Ramparts, Ipswich, the undermentioned sanitary matters appear to require attention: Insufficient sanitary accommodation provided for women. . . . 730 women when visited; full number, 1,000; 14 sanitary conveniences provided."

It appeared to the appellant that the acts, neglects, and defaults alleged in the letter of the 2nd of March, 1899, were punishable or remediable under the laws relating to public health, but not under the Factory and Workshop Act.

Proceedings were not taken by the sanitary authority upon the notice, so far as it related to the alleged insufficiency of sanitary accommodation for women, against the owners or occupiers of the factory.

It appeared to the appellant that the provisions of section 22 (1) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, were not complied with on the 15th of May, 1899, in the case of the factory.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant gave a written notice to the respondents, the occupiers of the factory, of which the following is a copy:

"Factory Department, Home Office, London, S.W.

"I, the undersigned, one of her Majesty's inspectors of factories, acting in pursuance of section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, and section 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, hereby give you notice under section 22, sub-section 2, of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, that the provisions of section 22, sub-section 1, of that Act are not complied with in the building of which you are occupier, used as a manufactory, and situate at Tower Ramparts, Ipswich, the same being a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878; and I hereby require you, within two calendar months from the date of this notice, to provide the said building with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed or in attendance at the same building, and with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex, and for that purpose to provide for the use of females so employed or in attendance eighteen additional water closets, with proper fittings and appurtenances. If you neglect or refuse to comply with this notice you will be liable for such default to a penalty not exceeding £20 and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40s., and proceedings will be taken in pursuance of the said section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, to recover the same.

"ANNA TRACEY.

"To Messrs. Pretty, and Son (Limited), Tower Ramparts. May 15, 1899."

The respondents neglected or refused to comply with the last-mentioned notice.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended on the above facts that the Court of Summary Jurisdiction had no jurisdiction to hear evidence upon, or decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of, the accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences existing in the factory, or the necessity for the further accommodation required by the notice dated the 15th of May, 1899, and that these questions were by law left to the discretion of the appellant. In support of this contention St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis, 1 B. & S. 865, 10 W. R. 249, 31 L. J. M. C. 73; Hargreaves v. Taylor, 11 W. R. 562, 3 B. & S. 613, 32 L. J. M. C. 111; Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board, 46 J. P. 675, were cited.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the matters were questions of fact which the justices had jurisdiction to decide upon evidence to be given before them.

The justices decided in favour of the contention of the respondents, and accordingly heard evidence on behalf of the appellant and the respondents; and upon that evidence dismissed the summons and ordered the appellant to pay £6 4s. costs. The justices found as facts: (1) That the existing sanitary accommodation in the factory was suitable and sufficient; (2) that the sanitary authority had made all due inquiry into the suitability and sufficiency of the sanitary accommodation existing in the factory, and had found the accommodation to be suitable and sufficient. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear evidence upon or decide the question of suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation existing in the factory, or required by the notice.

The enactments upon which the aguments turned are as follows:

Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 38: "Where it appears to any local authority by the report of their surveyor that any house is used or intended to be used as a factory or building in which persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed at one time in any manufacture, trade, or business, the local authority may, if they think fit, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of such house, within the time therein specified, to construct a sufficient number of water-closets, earth-closets, or privies and ashpits for the separate use of each sex. Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding £20, and to a further penalty not exceeding 40s. for every day during which the default is continued."

Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16) s. 4: "Where it appears to an inspector under this Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, water supply, nuisance, or other matter in a factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under this Act, that inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority; and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice, and take such action thereon, as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. . . ."

Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 7: "(1) Any person aggrieved—(a) by any order, judgment, determination, or requirement of a local authority under this Act; (b) by the withholding of any order, certificate, licence, consent, or approval, which may be made, granted, or given by a local authority under this Act; (c) by any conviction or order of a court of summary jurisdiction under any provision of this Act—may appeal in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions. (2) This section shall not apply in cases where there is an appeal to the Local Government Board under section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875." Section 22: "(1) Every building used as a workshop or manufactory, or where persons are employed or intended to be employed in any trade or business, whether erected before or after the adoption of this part of the Act, in any district, shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed in, or in attendance at, such building, and also where persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed or in attendance, with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex. (2) Where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of this section are not complied with in the case of any building the urban authority may, if they think fit, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of any such building to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such sufficient, suitable, and proper accommodation as aforesaid. (3) Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for such default to a penalty not exceeding £20, and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40s. (4) Where this section is in force section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, shall be repealed."

Factory and Workshop Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75), s. 2: "(1) Section 4 of the principal Act shall apply to workshops conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein, and to laundries. (2) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under the said section 4 as amended by this Act to a sanitary authority, and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same as the sanitary authority might have taken, and shall be entitled to recover from the sanitary authority all such expenses in and about the proceedings as the inspector incurs and are not recoverable from any other person, and have not been incurred in any unsuccessful proceedings."

Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 3:—"(1) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under section 4 of the principal Act to a sanitary authority it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to inform the inspector of the proceedings taken in consequence of the notice. (2) In section 2 of the Act of 1891, for the words 'within a reasonable time' shall be substituted the words 'within one month.'" Section 35: "(1) In every place where section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, is not in force every factory or workshop shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed in or in attendance at the factory or workshop, and also where persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed, or in attendance, with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex. (2) A factory or workshop in which there is a contravention of this section shall be deemed not to be kept in conformity with the principal Act."

The case was first argued before Grantham and Channell, JJ., and was subsequently argued before Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and Grantham, Bruce, Darling, and Phillimore, JJ., when judgment was reserved. Owing to the death of Lord Russell of Killowen before judgment was delivered, the case was now argued before the court constituted as appears at the head of this report.

Sir R. B. Finlay A.G. (Henry Sutton and R. D. Muir with him), for the appellant.—Failure to provide a sufficient number of water-closets is "a default in relation to a water-closet" within the meaning of section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. On such a default being notified by a factory inspector to the sanitary authority they may take proceedings under section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, in places in which that section is in force, and has therefore superseded section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875. If proceedings are so taken by the sanitary authority, there is no appeal to Local Government Board under section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and consequently there is an appeal to quarter sessions under section 7 of the Act of 1890. But if the sanitary authority fails to take proceedings, then the factory inspector may, under section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891, take the like proceedings as the sanitary authority might have taken; such proceedings are "like" in all respects; on a complaint of the inspector the question of the sufficiency of the accommodation cannot be gone into before the justices any more than it can be gone into when the sanitary authority is the complainant; and like proceedings include the like right of appeal to quarter sessions, so that the decision of the inspector is not necessarily final. The scheme of the legislation is to put the inspector in the place of the sanitary authority where they have failed to take proceedings, the reason being that factory inspectors have more intimate knowledge of the requirements of the employees than the officers of sanitary authorities can have.

Macmorran, Q.C. (E. E. Wild with him), for the respondents.—The justices had power to go behind the requirement of the sanitary inspector, and to inquire into the sufficiency of the accommodation. There is no authority to show that the justices cannot go into the merits where proceedings are taken under section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the section with which this legislation originated. The cases in which it has been decided that the justices cannot go into the merits arose under section 36 of that Act or the corresponding provisions of the Metropolis Management Acts, and the ground of the decisions was that another mode of questioning the reasonableness of the requirements of the local authority was provided. There is no appeal to the Local Government Board under section 38 of the Act of 1875, and therefore the justices can go into the merits in proceedings under that section, and the same is the case as to proceedings under section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890. Again, the defaults mentioned in section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, are defaults in existing closets, &c.; the section does not apply to omissions to provide such things. Further, where the sanitary authority have bonâ fide considered a complaint by the factory inspector, and have come to the conclusion that proceedings ought not to be taken, they are not in default, and the powers of the factory inspector under section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, do not arise; they arise only when the sanitary authority have failed to consider the complaint, or where, having decided that a default exists, they have taken no steps to remedy or punishit. It cannot have been intended that the mere opinion of the factory inspector as to whether proceedings are necessary should override the opinion of the representative sanitary authority and should be final, as it would be if the justices cannot go behind his requirement; for "like proceedings" in section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, are proceedings taken by the inspector, and cannot include an appeal under section 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, against his decision.

Finlay, in reply.—The factory inspector has to give notice to the sanitary authority because that authority has the means of seeing that any necessary work is carried out; but section 2 of the Act of 1891 would be nugatory if he cannot act except where mala fides on the part of the sanitary authority can be shown; this could never be proved. The inspector taking proceedings is in precisely the same position as the sanitary authority taking proceedings, and it is clear upon the authority of a series of cases decided upon similar sections that in the latter case the justices cannot go behind the requirement of the sanitary authority: Reg. v. Wheatley, 34 W. R. 257, 16 Q. B. D. 34; St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis; Hargreaves v. Taylor; Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board, 46 J. P. 675; Robinson v. Sunderland Corporation, [1899] 1 Q. B. 751, 47 W. R. Dig. 110; Stroud v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 42 W. R. 355, [1894] 1 Q. B. 64, [1894] 2 Q. B. 1.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 18.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises, in my opinion, questions of very considerable difficulty, and I express my judgment with great hesitation. After the best consideration I can give I have, however, come to the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to judgment. The substantial question which arises is whether upon a summons for penalties under sub-section 3 of section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, for neglect to comply with a notice given by a factory inspector, it is competent for the magistrates to receive evidence upon the merits as to the necessity for the sanitary accommodation required by such notice. The difficulty arises from the fact that the powers of the factory inspector in the matter are given by reference to the powers of the sanitary authority under the Public Health Act; and we have to determine to what extent the powers of the sanitary authority are transferred under the general words used. Certain other incidental points arise which I will consider in the course of my judgment. In dealing with cases of legislation by reference, I think that, as a rule, the primary consideration to be kept in view is the general scope and object of the amending legislation, as this affords some guide as to whether a wide or narrow interpretation is to be put upon general words or expressions capable of a wider or narrower meaning.

By the 4th section of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, it is provided that where it appears to an inspector under the Act that any neglect or default in relation to any water-closet, earth-closet, or other matter in the factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, and not under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the inspector shall give notice in writing of such neglect or default to the sanitary authority of the district, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice and take such action thereon as to the authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. By the same section it is provided that an inspector under the Act may for the purposes of the section take with him to the factory a medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or other officer of the sanitary authority. The material provisions of the law relating to public health which were in force at that time—namely, at the passing of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, are to be found in sections 35, 36, and 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The most material section is the 38th, which provided that, where it appeared to any local authority by the report of their surveyor that any house was used or intended to be used as a factory in which persons of both sexes were employed, the local authority might, if they thought fit, by written notice require the owners within a time specified in the notice to construct a sufficient number of water-closets, earth-closets, or privies for the separate use of each sex. The section provided a penalty for neglect to comply with such notice. No appeal was provided against the requirements of the local authority under this Act.

By section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, which is the section under which the question in this case arises, further powers were given to the sanitary authority. Sub-section 1 of that section provides that every building used as a workshop shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed, and also where persons of both sexes are employed with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex. It further provides by sub-section 2 that where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of this section are not complied with they may by written notice require the owner or occupier of the factory to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such sufficient, suitable, and proper accommodation. Sub-section 3 prescribes a penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with such notice.

Pausing for a moment, it was contended on behalf of the respondents that under this section the urban authority could only give a general notice requiring the owner or occupier to provide sufficient and proper accommodation; on behalf of the appellant it was contended that the urban authority must by the notice specify the alterations and additions which they require to be made. I think the latter view is correct. The section provides a penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with the notice. It would, I think, be inconsistent with such an enactment that the notice should be in general terms only, as the person to whom it was given would in that case have no means of knowing how he could avoid the liability to a penalty.

But in addition, by section 7 of the same Act, an appeal to quarter sessions is given against any requirement of a local authority, and I think it was intended that on such an appeal not only the question of the necessity for some additional accommodation, but also the reasonableness or propriety of the amount of the accommodation required by the notice might be raised.

It was further contended before us on behalf of the respondents that section 4 of the Act of 1878 did not apply to this section, that section 4 enabled notice to be given only in the case of some neglect or default in relation to an existing water-closet, earth-closet, privy, or ash pit, and not in relation to alleged insufficiency of accommodation. In my opinion this contention is unsound. I think the factory inspector may give notice to the sanitary authority in respect of a neglect by the owner or occupier of a factory to comply with the provisions of sub-section 1 of section 22 of the Act of 1890. I may further point out that this seems to be placed beyond all doubt by the provisions of section 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, which provides that in every place where section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, is not in force every factory or workshop where persons of both sexes are employed shall have separate accommodation, and that a factory or workshop in which there is contravention of this section shall be deemed not to be occupied in conformity with the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. If section 22 of the Act of 1890 is in force the rights and duties of the parties must be governed by that section.

Thus far I have only considered the powers which were given to the factory inspector to put the sanitary authority in motion; but by sub-section 2 of section 2 of the Act of 1891, under which the particular question in this case arises, it is provided that where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by the factory inspector under section 4 of the Act of 1878 to a sanitary authority and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time (fixed by sub-section 2 of section 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, at one month) for punishing or remedying the neglect or default the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying as the sanitary authority might have taken. The question which arises in this case is whether the words "like proceedings for punishing or remedying" are confined to legal proceedings in respect of the neglect of an owner or occupier to comply with the notice given by an urban authority under sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Public Health Act of 1890, or whether they give the factory inspector the right himself to give a notice under sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Act of 1890 requiring alterations and additions to be made. The question is, as I have said, one of very great difficulty. The word "proceedings" is not the word one would have expected to find as applicable to a notice or requirement. Moreover, unless a requirement given by a factory inspector is subject to the appeal to quarter sessions, under section 7 of the Act of 1890, as in the case of a requirement by a local authority, I should without hesitation have come to the conclusion that a factory inspector was not entitled to give such notice. It seems to me clear that the Legislature could not, without express words, make the opinion of a factory inspector as to the amount of accommodation required final and conclusive upon the factory owner or occupier. But the words in sub-section 2 of section 2 of the Act of 1891 are "the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same," and unless we hold that the factory inspector may give the notice provided by sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Act of 1890, it seems to me that we should be giving no effect to the words "proceedings for remedying" as distinguished from "punishing." It is here I think that we get assistance in considering what is the general tendency and scope of the legislation. By the Act of 1878 the factory inspector could only give notice to the sanitary authority. The sanitary authority could only give a general notice to the factory owner. By the Act of 1890 further powers are given to the sanitary authority and an appeal is provided against the requirement. Section 2 of the Act of 1891 appears to deal with the case where the sanitary authority for some reason or other does not take sufficient steps to exercise their powers, and I think we can gather from this course of legislation that it was intended to supplement the powers of the sanitary authority by giving the factory inspector an independent power of taking proceedings for remedying and punishing in cases in which the sanitary authority neglected to act. It was contended before us by the respondents that no appeal was given in the case of a notice of requirement served by the factory inspector. I have already said that if I had come to this conclusion I should not have decided in favour of the appellant; but if the view which I have taken is correct—namely, that the factory inspector stands in the place of the local authority for the purpose of giving a notice of requirement under sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Act of 1890—then in my opinion the words "like proceedings" would render any such notice the subject of appeal under section 7 of the same Act. If this view be correct, effect would be given to that which I gather to have been the intention of the Legislature without any injustice to the factory or workshop owner. The notice given by the factory inspector will be subject to appeal, and, if not appealed against, would have the same effect as a notice given by the sanitary authority.

There remains one other contention of the respondents which must be noticed. It was urged that upon the hearing of a summons under sub-section 3 of section 22 of the Act of 1890, founded upon the notice given by the urban sanitary authority or the factory inspector, the question of the necessity for, or reasonableness of, the requirements specified in such notice could be examined. That such question cannot be raised in the case of a notice of requirement given by a sanitary authority is in my opinion decided not only by the terms of the section itself, but by the long series of decisions referred to the Attorney-General in reply. Upon such a summons, in my opinion, the only question which could be raised is whether there has been a neglect or refusal to comply with such notice. Any question as to the validity of the requirements must be raised, if at all, by appeal to quarter sessions. I do not think, moreover, that the argument that there is a distinction in the case of a notice given by the factory inspector in this respect can be maintained. It was urged that because such a question would be open in the case of proceedings taken under section 81 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, in respect of a breach of section 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, it ought also to be open in the case of proceedings taken by a factory inspector under sub-section 3 of section 22 of the Act of 1890. For the reasons I have given in the earlier part of my judgment I do not think this contention can prevail. I think that if a notice can be given by a factory inspector under sub-section 2 of section 22, it has the same effect, if not appealed against, for all purposes as a notice given by the sanitary authority. For the above reasons I am of opinion that judgment should be given for the appellant, and the case remitted to the magistrates.

My brother Darling concurs in the judgment I have read.

GRANTHAM, J.—Having had the opportunity of reading my lord's judgment, I should have been ready to accept it and simply to agree with it, but as I wrote my judgment last June I think it is well I should read it, though it having been written then in the hope of convincing some of my brothers who had not been convinced in the argument of the case it goes more into detail than I should have thought it necessary to go at the present time.

The difficulty that has arisen in this case in determining the power of factory inspectors has been caused entirely by the system unfortunately so often adopted in the present day of legislating by reference to other Acts and by incorporation of sections of earlier Acts of Parliament.

The references backwards and forwards throughout the Acts and sections of Acts in dispute are most bewildering and perplexing and I am not surprised that the magistrates misunderstood, as I think they did, their powers in the proceedings when the matters came before them.

If the history of the factory legislation of the nineteenth century is considered, and particularly that of the past twenty or thirty years, it will, I think, be found that the Legislature has advisedly done what it intended to do—viz., gone on step by step in its endeavour to compel the owners of factories to put them in a healthy and sanitary condition. Finding its earlier efforts often frustrated and foiled by the supineness or self-interest of the sanitary authorities whose aid was first sought to carry out its views, the Legislature has at last adopted more drastic measures, and as the inspectors have been, in late years, at any rate, always selected for this work on account of their special qualifications for it, the Legislature, as a last resort, has placed the inspectors in the same position that the sanitary authorities previously occupied, and given them power to order the necessary work to be done, and if not done, of enforcing the fines leviable for breaches of the law in failing to obey the inspectors' orders. It should not be forgotten that the experience of factory inspectors is gained by their supervision of factories over the whole of England, whereas the surveyor of the local authority in many cases has no experience of this kind whatever, and as the Legislature has given to the sanitary authority (as many legal decisions show) the absolute discretion of determining whether work is to be done or not, subject to the overriding decision of the court of summary jurisdiction, it would be strange indeed if this same power should not be confided to the more experienced inspector.

Not only is the sanitary inspector often inexperienced in the special requirements of factories to make them properly healthy and sanitary, but he is sometimes liable to be influenced by the factory owner, who is not infrequently one of the leading magistrates of the borough in which the factory is situate.

Let us see, therefore, whether the sequence of legislation does or does not bear out the views that I have thus far expressed.

The first Factory Act was passed as long ago as 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 73). That Act dealt not only with the morals and religious teaching of those working in factories, but also with the hours of labour and the ventilation and light of the factory. It was in fact the foundation of all subsequent factory legislation. It was amended by various subsequent Acts till we come to the Act of 19 & 20 Vict., which incorporated most of the preceding Acts and was called the Factory Act of 1856, but no sooner was that Act passed than amendments and extensions followed each other in rapid succession until after the passing of the Public Health Act of 1875 we come to the Act of 1878, which practically repealed all former Acts, and codifying as it did the existing legislation, also enlarged the powers of the sanitary authorities and brought more factories within the purview of the Act.

Unfortunately even in this comprehensive Act of 1878 the Legislature referred back to the Public Health Act of 1875, and incorporated some of its sections instead of making a complete Act.

The Acts now applying to this particular matter commence therefore with the Act of 1875 section 38 of which is in these words: "Where it appears to any local authority by the report of their surveyor that any house is used or intended to be used as a factory or building in which persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed at one time in any manufacture, trade, or business, the local authority may, if they think fit, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of such house within the time therein specified to construct a sufficient number of water-closets, earth-closets, or privies and ashpits for the separate use of each sex.

"Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding £20, and to a further penalty not exceeding 40s. for every day during which the default is continued."

That Act was extended by the Public Health Act of 1890, section 22 of which is in these words:

"Every building used as a workshop or manufactory, or where persons are employed or intended to be employed in any trade or business, whether erected before or after the adoption of this part of this Act, in any district shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed in or in attendance at such building and also where persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed or in attendance with proper separate accomodation for persons of each sex.

"(2) Where it appears that an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of this section are not complied with in the case of any building the urban authority may, if they think fit, by written notice require the owner or occupier of any such building to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such sufficient, suitable, and proper accommodation as aforesaid.

"(3) Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding £20 and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40s."

By this 22nd section, therefore, suitable accommodation was to be provided by way of sanitary conveniences having regard to the number of persons employed in any factory; and the initiation of proceedings is to be "on the report of the surveyor of the urban authority," which authority by written notice could require such additions to be made as would provide sufficient accommodation in the factory, the enforcement of their notice being by application for penalties in the usual way.

By these Acts, therefore, the local authority (that is to say, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in a borough like Ipswich) had power in such a factory as this by written notice to compel the owner or occupier for the time being to provide a sufficient number of conveniences for each sex under the penalty of a heavy fine for failure to comply with the order. There was no appeal to the magistrates against this order, but under section 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, "Any person aggrieved by any order, determination, or requirement of a local authority under the Act may appeal in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions."

To enforce the penalty, however, the local authority had to apply to the court of summary jurisdiction, which court had, however, as I have just said, no power to inquire into the merits of the order. By these Acts it will be noted that it was left to the surveyor to the sanitary authority to report to the local authority; and it can well be imagined that the surveyor, an official knowing much perhaps of bricks and mortar and of drainage, would know but little of factory requirements, and by the time that the Act of 1878 was passed it was evident that the Legislature had found the surveyor of the local authority was not sufficiently alive to the sanitary deficiencies and requirements of factories, for by the 4th section of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1878 it is expressly provided that it shall be the duty of the factory inspector to give notice to the sanitary authority of the neglect or default in the factory. The section reads as follows:

"Where it appears to an inspector under this Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, water supply, nuisance, or other matter in a factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under this Act, that inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority in whose district the factory or workshop is situate, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice and take such action thereon as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. An inspector under this Act may for the purposes of this section take with him into a factory or a workshop a medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or other officer of the sanitary authority."

It was evidently found, therefore, that the local surveyor was remiss in giving notice or in initiating these inquiries, so he was supplanted, or at any rate the factory inspector was given equal powers of initiating proceedings. But it being still hoped that the local sanitary authority would see that proper sanitary requirements were provided when attention was officially drawn by the inspector to the omission, the power to compel the owner to remedy the default was still left with the sanitary authority. It is common knowledge, however, that in many cases the local sanitary authority for various reasons declined to, or at any rate did not, act, sometimes, no doubt, because the influence of the factory owner was paramount in the borough in which his factory was situated, and sometimes from ignorance. Hence the Legislature had again to make the law more stringent and the Factory and Workshop Act of 1891 was passed. Section 2 reads as follows:

"(1) Section 4 of the principal Act shall apply to workshops conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein, and to laundries.

"(2) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under the said section 4 as amended by this Act to a sanitary authority, and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same as the sanitary authority might have taken, and shall be entitled to recover from the sanitary authority all such expenses in and about the proceedings as the inspector incurs, and are not recovered from any other person, and have not been incurred in any unsuccessful proceedings."

In other words, it having been found that the local authority would not do its duty, the factory inspector was given an overriding authority to get the work done. Power is given, it will be noticed, to the factory inspector to take the like proceedings as the sanitary authority might have taken where the sanitary authority had not taken proceedings within a reasonable time to remedy the default previously notified to them.

To find out the powers, therefore, that the factory inspector now possesses, you have only to refer back to the previous Acts to see what powers the sanitary authority previously possessed. Now by the Public Health Act of 1875 and the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the local authority had power to order certain work to be done, and the order being made, the magistrates had no power of inquiring into the reasonableness or not of the order, though the court of quarter sessions had; yet it is said when the factory inspector gives the order the magistrates have power to inquire into its reasonableness. In other words it is said that the superior authority is to have less power than the inferior.

The increased powers of the inspector do not end here, however, for the sanitary authorities having evidently excused themselves from carrying out the requirements of the inspector on the ground that a reasonable time had not elapsed to enable them to do so, an Act was passed by which they were to take their proceedings within a month instead of within a reasonable time, and in order that they should not keep the inspectors in the dark as to their intentions they were also bound to give notice to the inspector of the proceedings they were taking; the section reads thus (Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, s. 3):

"(1) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under section 4 of the principal Act to a sanitary authority, it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to inform the inspector of the proceedings taken in consequence of the notice.

"(2) In section 2 of the Act of 1891 for the words 'within a reasonable time' shall be substituted the words 'within one month.'"

What proceedings? How can it be said that proceedings meant or would include deliberations—deliberations perhaps resulting in determination not to proceed. The proceedings referred to seem to me clearly to be proceedings to remedy the neglect or default; in fact, the notice to provide the required accommodation.

What better language could the Legislature have adopted if it intended to give the factory inspectors the power it purports to give them, and I think it did give them? Whether rightly gave them or not is no question for us, as we have only to determine whether the power was given or not, but as the learned counsel ventured to suggest that the Legislature could not have intended to give equal powers to the female factory inspectors as it had given to local surveyors and sanitary authorities. I may add that as their experience is gained like that of male inspectors from a much wider area (namely, all the factories of England) than that of the local authority, whose experience is very likely limited to the one factory in his town, their knowledge is, in my judgment, likely to be much more valuable and reliable than that of any local authority or of the local surveyor of any borough of England.

When the case was first argued before my brother Channell and me I stated that I was of opinion that the order of the factory inspector was subject to the appeal to quarter sessions given to any person aggrieved by an order of a local authority, because the factory inspector has to take like proceedings as the local authority. I am of the same opinion now, but that is not the question we have to determine, which is whether or not the court of summary jurisdiction has power to inquire into the reasonableness of the order of the factory inspector, but as the question of whether "like proceedings" included like "liability to appeal to quarter sessions" was not argued out as if it had been the question in dispute I do not wish to be bound as if I had given judgment on that question.

If it was necessary to show the reasonableness of the requirement of the inspector and the ignorance of the magistrates of the usual accommodation provided in factories, I might add that by a report I have before me I find that whereas one water-closet for every seventy persons was considered by the magistrates sufficient in this case, yet in London and all the principal towns in England one in twenty to one in thirty is the minimum number provided.

With regard to the last part of the sub-section 2 of section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, as to the right of recovering expenses incurred by factory inspectors in taking proceedings being limited to expenses not incurred in any unsuccessful proceeding. I do not feel the same difficulty that some of my brothers have felt. The word "proceedings" is not limited to legal or magisterial proceedings, but includes proceedings taken to remedy defaults (the same that the sanitary authority might have taken)—namely, it may include the carrying out of structural alterations or methods adopted to remedy defects under other sections of the Acts

These alterations or methods may be unsuccessful to remedy the particular defect complained of, and therefore it would be unfair to make the owner of the factory pay for them, and to avoid that unfairness these words have been, it seems to me, inserted, but as I said as to the appeal to quarter sessions, that is not the question we have to determine. I give no opinion upon it.'

For these reasons in my judgment the case must go back to the magistrates and their decision quashed on the ground that they had no power to decide as to the suitableness or sufficiency of the accommodation.

BRUCE, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court should be for the appellant.

I think that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear evidence upon or to decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation existing in the factory.

The offence charged is an offence against the provisions of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 22.

One difficulty in the case arises from the circumstance that the alleged offence is an offence against the provisions contained in one of the Public Health Acts, while in order to ascertain the method of procedure to be adopted reference must be made to the provisions of the Factory Acts.

It is a little difficult to fit together the two series of enactments. But the best way of arriving at a right conclusion is to consider the various provisions one by one.

The section I have already mentioned—section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890—is the first to be considered, and I think that the ultimate decision in the case must depend to a large extent upon the construction of that section. The section requires by its first sub-section that every building used as a workshop shall be provided with sufficient accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences. The second sub-section enacts that where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of the section are not complied with in the case of any building, the urban authority may, if they think fit, by written notice require the owner or occupier of any such building to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such suitable accommodation as aforesaid.

The third sub-section enacts that any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding £20 and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40s.

This section is similar in terms to section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and accordingly it is enacted by the fourth sub-section of the section we have been considering that where that section is in force—and it is in force in the urban district in which the factory in question is situated—section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, shall be repealed.

The construction of section 22 demands consideration. I think that the written notice mentioned in the section means a notice to make such alterations and additions as may be required by the notice.

The section does not, I think, point to a notice in general terms stating that the provisions of the section are not complied with, but it points to a specific notice stating the particular alterations and additions which the urban authority on the report of their surveyor require.

If the notice were not a specific notice it would be unreasonable to make a person neglecting to comply with it subject to a daily penalty because, if the notice were only a general notice, the person to whom it was given might not know what were the requirements of the urban authority.

I think that this view of section 22 is supported by the decision of this court in Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board. That was a decision upon section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The words of that section are not the same as the words of the section now under consideration, but the general scheme of the two sections is the same. The court held that the requirements of a written notice given under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, were conclusive upon the justices, and could only be inquired into on appeal to the Local Government Board under section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The remedy of a person who is aggrieved by any "requirement" of a local authority under the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, is given by section 7 of that Act by way of appeal to a court of quarter sessions in cases where there is no appeal to the Local Government Board under section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

As a breach of a "requirement" under section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, involves penalties only, and does not involve the recovery of expenses incurred by the local authority, such as are mentioned in section 268 above referred to, the appeal is, I think, to quarter sessions, and not to the Local Government Board.

I may observe that the very circumstance that an appeal is given to a person aggrieved by a "requirement" of a local authority seems to me to imply that such requirement is treated by the Legislature as an act in the nature of a judgment order or determination which can only be called in question before the appellate tribunal.

I have not overlooked the circumstance that the 22nd section, which I have been considering, contemplates proceedings instituted by the urban authority on the report of their own surveyor, and not on the report of a factory inspector; and section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which was in force prior to its qualified repeal above-mentioned by section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, was to the same effect.

In the year 1878 the Legislature, I suppose because it found the surveyors of local authorities slow to act under the powers conferred upon them by section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, thought fit to confer upon an inspector of factories a power similar to that which had been conferred upon the surveyor of a local authority; and by section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), it is provided that where it appears to an inspector under that Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any drain, water-closet . . . nuisance, or other matter in a factory is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under that Act, the inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority in whose district the factory or workshop is situate, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice, and take such action thereon as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law.

Under this section the sanitary authority is authorized to take proceedings under the Public Health Act on the report of a factory inspector.

What proceedings are they to take? I think section 4 of the Act of 1878 points to a proceeding in the nature of a written notice requiring the owner to construct such number of water-closets, earth-closets, or privies for the separate use of each sex as might be required in the notice to be given under section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section, as I have already pointed out, is now repealed by section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, and it is only necessary to refer to it in order to ascertain the character of the proceedings contemplated by section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

I have not critically examined section 38, because so far as it relates to the present case it is repealed, and is superseded by the provisions of section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.

But I may observe in passing that, so far as the construction of section 38 of the Act of 1875 is concerned, the observations that I made upon the construction of section 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, seem to me to apply. I think it is clear that the requirement contained in the written notice mentioned in section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, could not be inquired into by the justices at petty sessions. The person upon whom the requirement was made had, if ordered by the justices to pay a penalty, a right of appeal against the order of the justices under section 269 of the Public Health Act, 1875. But whether on such appeal the reasonableness of the requirement would be inquired into is, I think, exceedingly doubtful. Probably it could not; but it is not necessary to determine this question, because it is quite clear that the 7th section of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, gives a direct appeal from the requirement of a local authority.

So far as I have proceeded in examining the Acts of the Legislature they amount to this: By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 38, a local authority, including an urban authority, was enabled, upon the report of their surveyor, by written notice to require a specified number of water-closets to be constructed in a factory within their jurisdiction; that requirement, if made, was conclusive upon the justices at petty sessions, who, in the case of a breach of the requirement, had jurisdiction only to adjudicate upon the penalties to be imposed.

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, s. 4, the local authority might be set in motion by a factory inspector, in which case they were empowered to take the same proceedings as if they had been set in motion by their own surveyor. And by the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, the provisions of section 38 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are repealed in districts in which the Public Health Acts Amendment Act is in force, and its provisions are re-enacted in slightly different words.

Having regard to the difficulty that might arise as to whether an appeal would lie from the order of the justices enforcing a penalty for breach of a requirement made by the urban authority to quarter sessions under section 269 of the Public Health Act, 1875, an express provision was inserted in section 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, that an appeal should lie direct from a requirement of a local authority to a court of quarter sessions.

But it is to be observed that in all these cases the local authority or urban authority had a discretion as to whether they would take proceedings or not.

They were bound to make inquiry, but they might if they pleased have refused to act upon the report of their own surveyor or upon the report of the factory inspector.

Apparently in the opinion of the Legislature the local authorities had been reluctant to act upon the report of factory inspectors in cases where proceedings ought to have been taken for punishing or remedying acts, neglects, or defaults under the Public Health Acts. Accordingly by section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, it is enacted that where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under section 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, to a sanitary authority, and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time—i.e., within one month (Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, s. 3), for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same as the sanitary authority might have taken.

What steps could the sanitary authority have taken for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default mentioned in the notice given by the inspector? They could have proceeded only under section 22 of Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, by serving a written requirement upon the owner or occupier, and in the event of the requirement not being complied with proceeding before the justices to enforce penalties.

If I am right in the conclusion which I have expressed, that the written requirement of the urban authority was, subject to an appeal to quarter sessions, conclusive as to the requirements contained in it, it seems to me to follow that when the Legislature conferred upon the inspector power to take like proceedings for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default that the written requirement of the inspector was intended to have, and has, the same force or effect as if the written requirement had been made by the urban authority.

I can give no other meaning to the words "like proceedings." If the urban authority do not act within one month after notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by the inspector, then the inspector shall be armed with their powers; he is put into their place and may take proceedings for punishing and remedying the act, neglect, or default the same in character as the sanitary authority might have taken.

Of course the act, neglect, or default must be a real act, neglect, or default, but the question is, who is to determine whether an act, neglect, or default exists, and if it exists, how is it to be remedied? I think this power is conferred upon the factory inspector, subject to the right of appeal to quarter sessions against his requirement.

I think the appeal must exist from the requirement of the inspector, just as an appeal might be brought from the requirement of the urban authority if they had by written notice made a requirement.

When section 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, enables the inspector to take the like proceedings as the sanitary authority might have taken, I think that means proceedings subject to the same conditions and the same right of appeal as proceedings taken by the sanitary authority.

To hold otherwise would be to make the proceedings taken by the inspector different in character from proceedings taken by the urban authority and to confer upon the inspector more absolute powers than those conferred upon the urban authority.

The decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Ganges, 5 P. D. 247, 28 W. R. Dig. 67, is in point. By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 25, it was enacted that the Court of Passage of Liverpool should, upon an Order in Council being made, have in admiralty matters the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities as were conferred upon the county court.

No express provision was made for an appeal from the Passage Court. Yet it was held that the words "like jurisdiction" gave the same right of appeal from the Passage Court as existed from a county court in an admiralty matter—that is, an appeal not to the Court of Queen's Bench, but to the Court of Admiralty.

I see nothing unreasonable in the construction which I think ought to be put upon the statutes. A factory inspector ought to be competent to determine such a question as the number of water-closets required for the women employed in a particular factory; and having regard to the fact that in many urban districts owners of factories are largely represented on the borough bench, the Legislature may have had good reason for allowing the appeal to be made from the "requirement" of an inspector to the quarter sessions and not to petty sessions.

PHILLIMORE, J.—This case has stood for argument three times. On the first occasion it was heard by my brothers Grantham and Channell, and I believe they differed in opinion. The second hearing was before the late Lord Chief Justice and my brothers Grantham, Bruce, and Darling, and myself. At the close of this argument my opinion was in favour of the respondents. As to my colleagues, I will only say this, that if I had then stood alone there would have been no necessity for a third argument.

Now, however, after the third hearing I understand that my lord and my brothers who with me formed the third court are in favour of the appellant; and it is only necessary to state as briefly as I can why I still remain of opinion in favour of the respondents. I agree with some of the contentions put forward on behalf of the appellant. I think that an urban sanitary authority can, "when it appears" to such authority on the report of its surveyor that the sanitary accommodation is insufficient, make a requirement which is in substance a judgment, and which subject to appeal to quarter sessions is conclusive, compelling the factory owner to provide further specified accommodation under penalties; and, which is the same thing, that upon a summons for disobedience to a requirement the justices have no power to inquire into the reasonableness of the requirement, but only whether it was in fact made and whether it has or has not been complied with (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59, s. 22).

I think, further, that a factory inspector, "when it appears" to him or her—the same phrase, "when it appears," being again used—may give a notice to the urban sanitary authority complaining of "any act, neglect, or default in relation to any . . . water-closet" (41 Vict. c. 16, s. 4), and that a deficiency of water-closets is "a neglect or default in relation to a water-closet," though the respondents contended otherwise, and that if the urban sanitary authority does not take, within a month, proceedings "for punishing or remedying the neglect or default," if neglect or default in fact there be, the factory inspector has power to make that formal requirement under a penalty which the urban sanitary authority ought to have made, and in due time to issue a summons to enforce it. In conceding this last point to the argument of the appellant I believe I am going further than a weighty authority * would go. But I think upon the whole it is right.

There, however, I stop. Primarily it is the function of the judicial tribunal upon a summons for an offence to determine upon all the elements which go to make up the alleged offence. Express words are needed to withdraw any part of the alleged offence from the determination of the tribunal.

In cases under the sanitary Acts it is often the fact that some part of the case is withdrawn from the justices and given to be decided by the sanitary authority. The Legislature has so provided, and has used apt words for the purpose, saying not "where so-and-so is the case," which would leave the point to the tribunal, but "where it appears to the authority that so-and-so is the case," which leaves the point to the authority.

There is, however, no rule of law that in all sanitary Acts the sanitary requirement must be left to the sanitary authority to determine upon. If the Legislature ceases to use apt words for the purpose the sanitary authority does not get the power.

In this very matter it is conceded that a rural sanitary authority would have no such power (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37, s. 35).

Now, "where it appears" to the urban sanitary authority it may make a requirement, "where it appears" to the inspector he may give a notice; but when he desires to issue a requirement, the condition precedent is that he shall have given notice, not of what appeared to him to be an act, neglect, or default, but of what really was an act, neglect, or default (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75, s. 2). Again, what passes to him? the power of punishing or remedying—what? an imaginary or constructive act, neglect, or default? No; a real act, neglect, or default. If there is no such real act, neglect, or default, there is nothing to punish or remedy.

There is no trace of any provision anywhere making the opinion of the inspector conclusive; and direct legislation is required to make it so. In other words, the factory inspector can in certain circumstances make a requirement which the factory owner will neglect at his peril; but just as the inspector cannot require till he has given notice to the urban sanitary authority and waited a month, so he cannot require unless in fact there is a real act, neglect, or default; and just as he must prove his notice and his month before the justices, so he must prove the act, neglect, or default. If he does the factory owner will be in peril, for the penalty will begin from the date fixed in the requirement, and not from the date of the conviction by the justices.

This is my view upon consideration of the language of the several Acts. I may add that I venture to think this conclusion gives considerable power to the inspector, and if open to some practical objections is not so objectionable as the other. In the first place, it would be monstrous to let a single factory inspector determine such a point without appeal, more especially as he is not apparently bound to hear the factory owner before making the requirement. I understand that the majority of my colleagues agree that that would be monstrous, but think that by implication there must be an appeal from the inspector to quarter sessions. I am glad that they think so, and I do not dissent. But, secondly, what is the use of bringing in the urban sanitary authority if it is merely to be given a chance to comply with the inspector's mandate, with the knowledge that if it does not it will be overruled and brought into contempt? And why interpose a month's delay—for pure form's sake—in what may be an urgent matter? If the inspector is really to determine let him do so at once. Thirdly, I can understand that if the urban sanitary authority should be supine it may be desirable to allow some other authority to do that which a member of the public could do—namely, prosecute, and thus submit the matter to the decision of a third body, the justices. But why let the single inspector overrule the whole sanitary committee and its surveyor? Again, there may be reasons for giving less power to a rural sanitary authority than to an urban sanitary authority; but the inspector is the same inspector in rural as in urban districts. In a rural district he, even if he acts with the rural sanitary authority, cannot decide; he can only prosecute. In urban sanitary districts he is to be allowed to decide, and to do this by overruling the apparently more important body. Upon the whole I should conclude in favour of the respondents, and say that the justices were right in admitting evidence to show that there was in fact no neglect or default on the part of the factory owners.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.)

Feb. 22.

In re LAKE.
Ex parte DYER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Deposit of securities to make good a breach of trust—Fraudulent preference—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 48.

A payment by a bankrupt trustee to his cestui que trust, made with a view to make good his breach of trust, is not a fraudulent preference within section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 280), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. (reported ante, p. 280).

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The motion in the court below was made by the trustees of the marriage settlement of Colonel and Mrs. Dyer for a declaration that four mortgage debentures of the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. were handed over by the bankrupt Benjamin Greene Lake, while one of the trustees of the said settlement, to his co-trustees, to make good a breach of trust, and that such delivery or transfer did not constitute a fraudulent preference.

The marriage settlement in question was executed in 1869. Lake was appointed one of the trustees in 1898. He opened an account for the trust at Child's Bank and obtained an authority from his co-trustees enabling him to draw on it in his own name alone. He realised the trust estate and invested the proceeds in other than trust securities.

By the beginning of the year 1900 the books of the bankrupt showed that he was indebted to the trust estate to the extent of £1,200.

Upon the 7th of May, 1900, he deposited in the box containing the deeds and securities belonging to the trust estate four debentures of the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co., which were his own property, and were standing in his own name.

The deposit was accompanied by a memorandum which was signed by the bankrupt and ran as follows: "I have just learnt that there is something like £1,000 of Dyer's Trust capital in the hands of the late firm. Had I known this I could not have permitted my daughter to have accepted their most generous help without which our Streatham home could not have been secured. As I am a trustee the debt is a personal one, and one which I can properly make good out of my own assets. I therefore deposit £2,000 Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway four per cent. debenture stock as security for whatever may be found due. Its intrinsic value now is from sixty to seventy per cent., and I have quite recently been offered and have refused forty."

A judgment had been signed against the debtor on the 1st of May, and a bankruptcy notice founded on that judgment was served upon him on the 9th of May. He committed an act of bankruptcy by failure to comply with such notice, and a petition was presented against him on the 2nd of June upon which he was ultimately adjudicated bankrupt.

After his bankruptcy the other trustees of the Dyer settlement requested the Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. to register the debenture stock in their names. The company refused to register them without the consent of the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy refused his consent, whereupon these proceedings were commenced.

It was admitted for the purposes of the motion that there had been a number of breaches of trust committed by the bankrupt in respect of other estates, and that in some cases he made restitution, but that in the majority of cases he had not done.

Wright, J., refused the application, holding that the relation of debtor and creditor existed between trustee and cestui que trust and that on the facts the debtor's view had been to prefer a particular trust estate from motives of gratitude and not to make good a breach of trust either from a sense of duty or from a fear of criminal proceedings.

The settlement trustees now appealed.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Everard Colt, for the appellants, contended that the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between trustee and cestui que trust, and that even if it did a trustee owed a higher duty to his cestui que trust.

They referred to Ex parte Stubbins, 29 W. R. 653, 17 Ch. D. 58; Ex parte Taylor, 35 W. R. 148, 18 Q. B. D. 295; Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419; In re Blackpool Motor Car Co., ante, p. 124, [1901] 1 Ch. 77.

Rawlinson, K.C., and Northcote, for the trustee in bankruptcy.

RIGBY, L.J., said that it was necessary that the trustee in bankruptcy should make out that the dominant motive of the bankrupt was the desire to prefer the favoured creditor over less favoured ones. In his opinion the memorandum which had been referred to as proving that fact was not sufficient proof. It was admitted that the debtor must have been moved by mixed motives. His lordship did not doubt that he had a desire to make good his breach of duty as trustee, and that he had also a desire to stand on a better footing with the cestui que trust who had treated him with great kindness and whom he had so heartlessly defrauded. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., took the same view. If on the eve of bankruptcy a debtor makes a voluntary payment, a presumption arises that it is made with a dominant view of preference. No express intention is necessary. But if there is proof that the payment is made in order to make good a breach of trust the presumption is negatived and the primâ facie inference of a view to prefer is dislodged. The inference is not conclusive, but you must look at all the circumstances. Looking at the circumstances of this case to see if there is anything to get rid of the primâ facie inference that the deposit was made with a view to make good the breach of trust, there was nothing in the memorandum to negative that inference. On the contrary the very fact of kindness might quicken a sense of duty to free himself from the shame of a breach of trust. His lordship, therefore, came to the conclusion that the deposit was made under a sense of obligation to make good the breach of trust.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed, and said that one of the elements to be taken into consideration was the state of mind of the debtor. As Lord Esher said in Ex parte Taylor, 18 Q. B. D., p. 299, he "may have been doing that which, if he had a scrap of conscience left, he ought to have done—repair his former evil deed. If you come to the conclusion that that was the dominant motive in his mind, you must hold that he made the payment, not with a view of preferring the person to whom he made it, but in order to satisfy his own conscience." In his lordship's opinion, the memorandum showed the dominant motive. The debtor had received benefits from the persons defrauded, and anyone with any conscience would feel the strongest shame and wish to repair the evil.

Appeal allowed.

YSTRADYFODWG AND PONTYPRIDD MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF NEWPORT UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Exemption of underground sewers—Extent of exemption.

Where exemption from rateability is claimed for an underground sewer vested in a public body, it must be shown, first, that the sewer is quite underground, so that the surface under which it runs is not occupied or in any way affected by it; and, secondly, that no payment is made to the owners of the sewer for the use of it by others.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (48 W. R. 382, [1900] 1 Q. B. 365) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.), on the hearing of a special case stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Monmouth on the hearing of a rating appeal: 48 W. R. 382, [1900] 1 Q. B. 365.

The Ystradyfodwg and Pontypridd Main Sewerage Board were the governing body of a united drainage district, constituted by virtue of a provisional order of the Local Government Board.

Pursuant to the powers vested in them by the said order they designed and constructed, and had since always maintained, a certain sewage carrier for the use of their district, and had erected, maintained, and worked such works, machinery, and plant as were required for conveying the sewage of the district to the sea.

The total length of the sewage carrier was about 17¼ miles, whereof nearly 2½ passed through or over land situate in the parish of Rumney, which land (excepting such part as forms part of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel) had been previously to the construction of the sewage carrier, and still was, rated and assessed for the relief of the poor. The construction of the sewage carrier within the said parish was as follows: One hundred and eighty-two yards of iron pipes carried on concrete arches above the surface of the ground, 1,021 yards of pipes laid below the surface and ordinary level of the ground, 1,890 yards carried below the surface of the ground, but covered by an artificial embankment of varying height which rose above the level of the adjacent land, and 1,246 yards of pipes (called in the special case the outfall) passing partly over and partly beneath the surface of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel. In connection with the outfall certain works had been erected by the board.

For the purpose of obtaining money for making and maintaining the sewage carrier and the necessary works appurtenant thereto, the board, in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, borrowed the sum of £156,000 from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, to be repaid with interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum by equal annual payments extending over thirty years. The proportion of the annual repayment payable in respect of the portion of the sewage carrier situate in the parish of Rumney amounted to the sum of £1,210. This sum was raised by means of rates.

Under the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 8) Act, 1896, the sewerage board obtained powers enabling them with the consent of the Local Government Board to allow the sewers of the council of any county, borough, or district to communicate with the sewage carrier vested in them. In pursuance of these powers, and with the consent of the Local Government Board, agreements had previously to the date of the making of the assessment now appealed against been made with the Dinas Powis Urban District Council, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, and the Cardiff Corporation, whereby the sewage of the districts under the control of the said local bodies was to be received and carried away by the sewage carrier of the board upon payment to the board by the said local bodies of sums levied upon the respective rateable values of the said districts at the rate of 3¾d., 4d., and 3½d. in the pound per annum respectively. In consequence of receiving these sums from the three said local bodies the board were enabled to raise sufficient money for the purpose of repaying the annual instalments of the money borrowed as aforesaid to make and maintain the sewage carrier and the works, machinery, and plant connected therewith in the parish of Rumney by two precepts at the rate of 2½d. in the pound in each year upon the Ystradyfodwg and Pontypridd area. The rate in the pound in the last-mentioned area would have had to be much increased in order to prevent the board from incurring loss owing to their yearly expenditure in connection with the sewage carrier if the money received by the rates levied outside the said area as aforesaid, being money paid for the use of the sewage carrier, had not been available for use by the board.

The sewerage board were assessed by the assessment committee for the Newport Union in respect of that portion of the sewage carrier, with the outfall and appurtenances thereof, which was situate in the parish of Rumney, in the sum of £800 gross estimated rental and £700 rateable value.

The board appealed against this assessment to the quarter sessions. It was proved before the quarter sessions that, as far as the parish of Rumney was concerned, the sewage carrier conveyed the sewage from distant towns, places, or houses through the parish, and there was no connection to or with the sewage carrier from any lands, houses, or buildings in the parish. It was also proved that the embankment varied in height from 18in. to 6ft. above the ground through which it passed; that it was covered throughout by a mound of earth which was grazed over except where a footpath ran over the top of the mound and where manholes were placed; that it was not separated by any fence from the adjoining land, and that cattle had full access upon and across it throughout its entire length. It was also proved that the land upon which the embankment lay was previously to its formation assessed and rated to the relief of the poor, and that the said land remained so rated and assessed, no change having been made by reason of the making of the embankment in the rating and assessment.

Upon these facts the quarter sessions found that the portions of the sewage carrier which lay under the surface of the ground or in the embankment were not liable to be rated at all, but that the gross estimated rental of the other portions of the sewage carrier in the parish of Rumney was £145 (whereof £40 was the gross estimated rental of the outfall and works in connection therewith), and that the rateable value thereof was £105, and they accordingly allowed the appeal to this extent, subject to a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

The Divisional Court were of opinion that the portions of the sewage carrier which lay under the surface of the ground and in the embankment were liable to be rated as well as the portion which lay above the surface, and they reversed the decision of the quarter sessions.

The sewerage board appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—ROMER, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: Since the decision by the House of Lords in the Erith and West Ham cases, relied on by the appellants, we think it must be taken that the authorities which decided that certain underground sewers of public bodies were not liable to be rated are not based on sound principle and must be regarded as anomalies in rating law. These authorities will certainly not be extended; and to enable new sewers, which would be primâ facie rateable according to ordinary principles, to escape from liability, it must be shown by their owners that they fall strictly within the narrow limits of the authorities we are referring to. On examination of the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, which is the leading one of the authorities in question, it will be found that the sewers there held not rateable had the following features: (1) They were quite underground, so that the surface under which they ran was not occupied or in any way affected by them, and (2) no payment was made to the owners of the sewers for the use of them by others. We think that all sewers which on general principles are primâ facie rateable, and which are not protected by prior decisions, should be held rateable, unless the two features above mentioned are found to exist in relation to them. With regard to the first feature, it is true that in the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham it was ruled that for rating purposes no distinction existed between a sewer carried underground and one carried upon an embankment; but after the decision of the House of Lords above mentioned, and the observations of Lord Herschell, L.C., at p. 600 of the report of that decision, we think it can no longer be considered that that ruling is law. With regard to the second feature, it appears to us from the judgment of the court in the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works that that feature was treated as of great importance. In the judgment of the court delivered by Lush, J., he observes significantly that the sewers he was dealing with were "not at present the subject of a beneficial occupation," and he proceeds to say that "no payment is made to the board for the use of them." We gather that if any such payment had been made the decision would have been the other way. Is is true, judging from more recent authorities, that the judgment ought not to have been based on such a distinction as that pointed out; but the appellants here cannot take advantage of that error on the part of the judges who decided the case in order to extend in their favour the ambit of an anomalous case based on no sound principle. And further, we cannot find in any reported case where sewers have been held not rateable that it has been proved that payments were being made for the use of those sewers by others, and that this fact has been called to the attention of the court. It was suggested by the appellants that by the abovementioned decision of the House of Lords a principle was laid down that no sewers are rateable when the surface is rated both before and after the sewers are made, and the surface assessment remains unaltered. We cannot find that any such principle was there laid down. Lord Herschell, L.C., whose reasons for the judgment of the House were concurred in by all the members present, stated at p. 598 of the report why the older cases, which decided that underground sewers were not rateable, were allowed to stand. He, in substance, pointed out that those sewers had for a long period before the decisions in question been deemed free from rateability, and that it would not be just to make them rateable after they had been for so long a period deemed free from rateability. And he further observed that until the sewers in question (which in fact were wholly underground) were made no rateable subject-matter existed where the sewers were; so that if the sewers were abandoned the rateability of the places where they existed would cease. And we think it is with reference to these observations that he says, on p. 600, that he had already stated the only ground on which the exemption of the sewers generally could, in his judgment, be rested. We can find nothing in his address to justify the assertion that he formulated or stated the principle urged by the appellants. Having regard to what we have already said, it follows that the sewage carrier in the case now before us ought to be rated, and that the appeal should be dismissed. This carrier is new, and cannot claim an exemption from rateability for a long period. It is to a great extent above or on the surface, and even as to the part not immediately on the surface we cannot say that it is so far below the surface as in no way to affect it. Moreover, in this case we think that the sewage carrier in the parish of Rumney, being one continuous construction, should be dealt with as a whole, and that it would not be right, as to the part below the surface, to dissever the sewer, and to say as to that part that it is to be taken as an independent sewer, and be separately treated for the purpose of rating. In respect of the above matters this sewage carrier does not fall within the protection of the anomalous authorities we have referred to, and on principle it clearly ought to be rated. Moreover, in respect of another matter, it is not within the last-mentioned authorities, for it is stated in the case that the owners, the appellants, receive substantial yearly payments from other bodies—namely, from the Dinas Powis Urban District Council, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, and the Cardiff Corporation—for the use of the sewage carrier by those bodies, and the cost of constructing and maintaining the carrier is to a large extent defrayed out of these payments.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

App. Bankruptcy. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 18.

In re TOMKINS & CO.
Ex parte THE DEBTOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Petition by company—Officer of the company—Amendment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 148.

Any person bonâ fide chosen by a company to be their agent for the presentation of a bankruptcy petition becomes an officer for that purpose.

Where, therefore, the person so nominated is only a clerk, and not in any ordinary sense an officer of the company, he thereby becomes sufficiently for the purposes of section 148 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, an officer of the company to present the petition, although his appointment under the seal of the company was only made subsequently to the presentation of the petition.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Registrar Linklater giving liberty to the petitioning company to amend their petition, and the question raised was whether a clerk was an officer of the company for the purpose of presenting a petition in bankruptcy.

On the 22nd of September, 1900, Eastwood & Co. (Limited) presented a petition in bankruptcy against Tomkins & Co. in respect of a judgment debt for £76.

The acts of bankruptcy alleged in the petition were that executions had been levied by seizure and sale of the goods of the debtors under two writs of fi. fa. which goods were sold by the sheriff on the 11th and 20th of July, 1900.

The petition was signed as follows: "For Eastwood & Co. (Limited), Henry J. Byrne, duly authorized under the seal of the company."

It appeared that Byrne was a clerk in the employ of the company and that he did secretarial work for the company, and by a resolution of the directors passed on the 10th of November, 1892, he was authorized under the seal of the company to take all necessary steps in bankruptcy against debtors to the company on behalf of the company.

At the hearing of the petition on the 22nd of November, 1900, the objection was taken that Byrne was not an officer of the company within section 148 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that for all or any purposes of the Act a corporation may act by any of its officers authorized in that behalf under the seal of the corporation.

The learned registrar found as a fact that Byrne was not an officer of the company within the meaning of section 148, and ordered that the petitioning company should be at liberty to amend their petition by authorizing an officer of the company under seal to execute the petition notwithstanding that the acts of bankruptcy would not be available for a fresh petition.

From this order the debtors now appealed.

H. T. Kemp, for the debtors, referred to Ex parte Culley, 27 W. R. 78, 9 Ch. D. 307; Ex parte Dearle, 33 W. R. 440, 14 Q. B. D. 184; Ex parte Dunhill, [1894] 2 Q. B. 234; In re Maund, 43 W. R. 207, [1895] 1 Q. B. 194.

P. M. Francke (with him A. H. Carrington), for the petitioning creditors, referred to In re Collier, 8 Morr. 80; In re Whitley, 8 Morr. 149.

RIGBY, L.J., said that in this case the amendment to the petition made by the registrar had been objected to on the ground that according to the true construction of section 148 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it was necessary that any person appointed to present a petition in bankruptcy on behalf of the company should be an officer of the company, and that, as there was no officer of the company at the time when the petition was originally presented, there ought not now to be any substitution of an officer of the company. In the view which he took of this case it was not important to go into the question of amendment. Section 148 merely said that a company may act by any of its officers, and did not mean that the person appointed to act on behalf of the company must be an officer. He did not think that the Legislature by section 148 intended to impose upon a company the task of appointing a person who within any definition of the term must be an officer. No doubt when they were dealing with other enactments, when they were dealing with applications to make an officer of a company liable, it was necessary to determine what was meant by an officer and who was an officer; but he considered that any person bonâ fide chosen by a company to be their agent for the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy became thereby an officer of the company for that purpose, and that the person who was originally nominated by the company in this case, though only a clerk of the company and not in any ordinary sense an officer of the company before he was appointed under the seal of the company, became thereby sufficiently for the purposes of this Act an officer of the company to present the petition. It followed that the petition was a good petition from the first and did not require amendment, and that the application to amend was misconceived and unnecessary. It followed also that the registrar was mistaken in considering himself bound to allow the amendment, and the amendment ought not to have been made. Under these circumstances the debtors complained of the amendment. Suppose the amendment was wrong, what good did they get by that? Nothing. The petitioners said that the amendment was good. They could get no good by that, because the petition was good before. He thought that the amendment was unnecessary, but with regard to costs both parties were wrong to a certain extent—the debtors in putting a strained construction on the Act, and the petitioning creditors in insisting upon the amendment. There would therefore be no costs of the appeal. The petition being good from the first, it would come before the registrar in the ordinary course, and he would have to proceed upon it as a good petition.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and STIRLING, L.JJ., agreed.

Appeal allowed.

ASHTON VALE IRON CO. v. CORPORATION OF BRISTOL. (a.)

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 18, 92, 123—Notice to treat—Withdrawal of notice—Power to give fresh notice.

Where notice to treat for the compulsory purchase of land is given under the Lands Clauses Act, and such notice is subsequently withdrawn, a second notice to treat may be given in respect of the same property, or a part thereof.

This was an appeal against a decision of Byrne, J., on the 11th of August last, the question being as to the validity of a notice to treat for the compulsory purchase of land belonging to the plaintiff company given by the defendant corporation under the powers conferred on them by the Bristol Dock Act, 1897, with which the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was incorporated.

The question was whether when a notice to treat has once been given and withdrawn, as it may be under section 92, when the landowner has given a counter-notice requiring the whole of his property to be taken, the company or corporation giving the first notice has power to give a second notice to treat for the same property or a smaller part of it.

On the 2nd of May, 1899, the corporation gave notice to the plaintiffs to treat for a part of their land.

On the 18th of May, 1899, the plaintiffs gave a counter-notice requiring the corporation to take a larger portion of their land.

On the 8th of December, 1899, the plaintiffs issued a writ in an action for the determination of the question whether the defendants were entitled to take a part only of the plaintiffs' land.

On the 12th of December, 1899, the corporation served a notice withdrawing their original notice to treat, and on the 16th of December they served on the plaintiffs a second notice to treat in respect of the same land.

On the 4th of January, 1900, the plaintiffs served a second counter-notice under protest.

On the 10th of February, 1900, the defendants gave notice to summon a jury to assess the compensation.

On the 26th of February, 1900, a motion in the action was heard by Byrne, J.; but before he had pronounced his judgment the corporation on the 5th of March withdrew their second notice to treat, and on the next day they served a third notice to treat applying to the same property with some exceptions.

On the 26th of March, 1900, the plaintiffs served a third counter-notice under protest.

Byrne, J., held that the corporation had power to withdraw their notice to treat and that their third notice to treat was a valid notice.

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Leslie, for the plaintiffs, contended that after the withdrawal of the first notice the compulsory powers of the corporation were at an end.

Cripps, Q.C., Freeman, Q.C., Lyttelton, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the corporation, argued that if the notice was not accepted by the landowner it was reduced to a nullity, and that the landowner was sufficiently protected by the restriction imposed by the Act (section 123) as to the time within which the compulsory powers might be exercised.

RIGBY, L.J., said that the first notice was met by a counter-notice requiring the corporation to take the whole of the property under section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. That entitled the corporation to withdraw their notice to treat. It was not necessary to consider what was the exact meaning of withdrawing a notice in every possible case, but at any rate after the counter-notice had been served the corporation were entitled to withdraw their notice, and did so. The effect of that was to relegate the corporation to the position they were in before the first notice was given. They had therefore a right to serve the second notice. The second notice was also met with a counter-notice, which entitled the corporation to withdraw. They did withdraw, and the result was the same as in the case of the first notice. Then the third notice was given, which was now the only notice in existence. The other notices had been swept away by the act of the persons who withdrew them. His lordship then examined the terms of the third notice, and held that it was valid.

ROMER, L.J., said that it was contended that after the corporation had given their first notice, and had withdrawn it, their powers were at an end. It was true that if promoters gave notice to treat to a landowner in respect of his land they could not go back from that notice if the landowner insisted upon holding them to it; but if the landowner, for any good reason, permitted the promoters to withdraw or said that the notice was bad in any way his lordship saw no reason why, if that notice was withdrawn, and the time allowed the promoters for the exercise of their compulsory powers was still running, they might not serve a fresh notice. It was admitted that in one case where promoters had given a notice to treat they could withdraw—viz., where the landowner required other lands to be taken as being part of the lands which the promoters were bound to take. The corporation, therefore, had power to withdraw the earlier notices in this case, and the effect of that was to put them in the same position as if no notice had ever been given. It could not be said that the promoters by withdrawing had elected never again to give a notice to treat in respect of the same piece of land. At the most it could only be said that the promoters had not elected at that time to go on with their notice at the risk of having to take the lands comprised in the counter-notice. It was conceivable that at a later time they might elect to run that risk. The appellants' contention must go to this length, that if a notice to treat was withdrawn because it was said by the landowner to be invalid the power of the promoters to take the land would be absolutely gone even though the original notice was shown to be valid. It was to be borne in mind that a notice to treat was a mere indication to the landowner that the promoters desired to take the land and wanted the landowner to have the money payable to him duly ascertained so that the purchase might be completed. The appeal would be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

In re HAYWARD.
TWEEDIE v. HAYWARD. (a.)

Executor — Right of retainer — Marriage settlement — Covenant to pay money after decease of testator — Insolvent estate—Right of trustee to sue.

The executor of an insolvent estate, being also tenant for life of a sum covenanted to be paid by the testator's executors or administrators in his marriage settlement, cannot retain such sum out of testator's assets where there are trustees of the settlement who have the legal right to sue for the said sum so covenanted to be paid.

Loomes v Stotherd, 1 Sim. & S. 458, discussed.

Further consideration.

This was a point touching the right of retainer of an administratrix of the will annexed, which had been referred to the judge by the master on the further consideration of an administration action for the administration of the testator's estate, in which Messrs. Tweedie, suing on behalf of themselves and all other creditors, were plaintiffs, and the widow of the testator, who was also his executrix and devisee of his real estate, was defendant.

The facts of the case were as follow: By a settlement made on the marriage of testator and defendant the testator (Hayward) covenanted with the trustees thereof, who were the said plaintiffs, that his executors or administrators should pay to them the sum of £5,000 with interest for the same at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the day of his death, on the trusts therein mentioned, under which trusts the defendant was, in the events that had happened, entitled to a life interest. And the deed empowered the executors or administrators of Hayward to pay the whole or part of the amount to the trustees immediately after Hayward's decease. There were no children of the marriage. Hayward died leaving an insolvent estate, having by his will made his wife his residuary legatee, but appointing no executor. After his death an order was made on the 27th of October, 1896, for the administration of his estate, and the usual accounts and inquiries were directed. Administration with the will annexed had been granted to the widow.

The defendant as widow, personal representative, and devisee of Hayward, claimed to retain the sum of £5,000 out of his real and personal estate on behalf of herself and the trustees of the settlement in preference to the other creditors. The debt had been proved for by the plaintiffs, and £500 had been allowed in respect thereof without prejudice to the defendant's claim.

The facts relating to the certificate are more fully set out in the judgment.

Norton, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the creditors, having the conduct of the said proceedings.—The widow is not entitled to retain the sum as she has not the right to sue for it. The right to sue is in the trustees: In re Dunning, Hatherley v. Dunning, 33 W. R. 760, 54 L. J. Ch. 900.

Rowden, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant.—When an executor is also a trustee of the debt he is bound to exercise his right of retainer. In any case an executor may retain out of assets as well a debt due in trust for himself, as a debt due to himself: Cockcroft v. Black, 2 P. Wms. 299; Loomes v. Stotherd, 1 Sim. & St. 458. In the case of In re Dunning the solicitor was not a trustee. It is not possible to treat a defaulting solicitor or a debtor as a trustee. In fact, Cotton, L.J., in his judgment states that no doubt existed as to the right of a trustee to retain.

Norton, Q.C., replied.

BYRNE, J.—In this case a question arises as to the right of the executrix to retain in respect of a life interest to which she is entitled. There was a covenant with trustees in a settlement that in case the intended marriage should take place the executors and administrators of the husband should, within six calendar months from his death, pay the trustee or trustees the sum of £5,000 with interest for the same at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the day of the death of the husband, with power for the executors and administrators to pay the trustee or trustees part or the whole of the said sum of £5,000 immediately after the decease of Hayward with interest thereon to the date of payment. Then there were trusts declared with reference to the £5,000 under which, in the events which have happened, the wife became entitled to a life interest in the fund. An administration action has been brought with reference to the husband's estate and the master has made a certificate in which he finds that claim No. 44 by "Richard Walter Tweedie and Michael Forbes Tweedie and the defendant Ada Mary Hayward is allowed without prejudice to the question whether the said defendant Ada Mary Hayward has a right to join in the said claim." Messrs. Tweedie are the trustees of the settlement. There is also a finding in the certificate in respect of this indenture of settlement stating the covenant and saying that "such last-mentioned sum"—that is, £5,000 with interest at 5 per cent. from the day of the testator's death—"has been proved by the trustees of the said settlement as a debt against the testator's estate and has been allowed"; and it also finds that "under and by virtue of the said indenture of settlement the reversionary interest in the said sum of £5,000, subject to the life interest therein of the defendant, belongs to the testator's estate." Now the reason of the form of the certificate as to claim 44 as it stands was that the question might be raised whether the defendant the administratrix has a right to retain in respect of her life interest in the £5,000.

Now I think myself that the case is covered by the authority in the Court of Appeal in In re Dunning, Hatherley v. Dunning. For the purpose of explaining that decision the facts are sufficiently stated in the commencement of Cotton, L.J.'s, judgment. "The testator acted as solicitor to the trustees of his marriage settlement, under which his wife took a life interest with remainder to his children. This fund got into the testator's hands and was not accounted for, and for it he is clearly liable. But the claim of his executrix to retain this debt out of his assets stands on a wholly different footing. The right to retain arises wholly from the fact that, as a creditor by suing at law and obtaining judgment could get priority for his debt, and an executor who was also a creditor could not sue himself, he was allowed the same advantage as he would have gained had he been able to sue, and was allowed to retain the amount of his debt in priority to other creditors. And he was allowed this right even in a case where he was trustee only of the amount due, or where he was himself beneficially entitled to the debt, though it was actually payable to another person as trustee for him." Then the learned judge proceeds to deal with the particular case, saying, "The retainer has been allowed on the footing of the widow's life interest being valued as if it were an annuity owing to her from the testator, besides being allowed in respect of his children's right in remainder. Now if the right to receive the debt and the liability to pay the same were centred in the same person, it would be right to allow the retainer. But here the executrix was not the person in whom the right to recover the debt was vested, as there existed at the testator's death trustees of the settlement who were competent and bound to sue for and obtain judgment against the executors for the amount, or to take proceedings for administration of the estate." I need not refer to the rest of that judgment. Lindley, L.J. (in his judgment in the same case), referring to the case of Cockcroft v. Black, speaks of it as reaching the farthest point in reference to the right of retainer, which, as he explains, is "a somewhat anomalous privilege, and it has often been laid down that it ought not to be extended, and it has never yet been extended to the degree asked for here." I think myself that every word of the decision of the late Lord Justice Cotton in that case applies to the present case. In the present case there are trustees who are competent to sue for, and might have sued for, the amount of the debt. I should have left the case there, simply saying it was covered by authority, except for the fact that the case of Loomes v. Stotherd has been dealt with and relied on as an exact authority in the books of long standing on this point. In reference to the report of that case, which is also reported with rather a fuller statement of facts in 1 Law Journal (O.S.) Ch., p. 220, I find that there were two points argued in that case. The first point—a very important point—decided was that a devisee has a right to retain a debt due to himself or to his trustee out of the produce of the estate devised to him; and the other point was as to the costs of the administration—namely, in what order they should come with reference to the right of retainer. But the facts in that case—and here I have been assisted by Mr. Wood and Mr. Norton's junior by their having referred to the record of the case—appear to have been, as quite shortly stated in the report, that £1,674 was found due from the estate to the trustees of the testator's marriage settlement upon a bond for securing £2,500 for the benefit of the defendant and her children as it is expressed in the report. It appears that the trusts were in effect for the defendant for life with some special power of paying some debts and then with remainder to the children, so that in fact the defendant had only a limited interest in the fund. At the end of the argument for the defendant it was said (1 S. & S., at p. 461) "The circumstance that the defendant is not the trustee, but the cestui que trust of this debt, cannot make any difference in a court of equity." No doubt that is perfectly true in the case of a simple trustee for another person. The Vice-Chancellor says: "At common law an heir could retain for his own speciality debt; so a devisee under the statute must have the same right as an heir. An executor may retain his own debt or the debt of his trustee, and therefore a devisee may retain for his own speciality debt or the debt of his trustee, and if the devisee be also the executor of a deceased creditor he may first retain for his own debt and next for the debt of his testator." Then his lordship deals with the question of the costs of the suit, and says, "But the devisee cannot retain his debt in priority to the costs of the suit." So far as the report goes it appears, as I have said, simply to be a decision upon the points I have mentioned; but undoubtedly that was a case where a devisee, a defendant, was allowed to retain out of the proceeds of the estate, having only a limited interest in the fund. The case has not got into any of the text-books to which I have been referred as an authority for the proposition for which it is now invoked, nor have I been referred to any case, nor do I think that there is any case, in which it has been followed as being an authority for the purpose for which it is now sought to be used. Therefore I have not the same difficulty about an old standing case that I should otherwise have had from thinking that it has been followed or treated as being an authority for this, that the tenant for life or cestui que trust is entitled to retain, although there are trustees competent to sue for the corpus of the fund in which she has a life interest. In any case I should have felt bound to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal; but I thought it right, as this point was raised, and counsel were so good as to look into the matter fully in the Record Office, to say I do not think that this case of Loomes v. Stotherd is now to be regarded as an authority for the proposition for which it was invoked.

In re GRAY AND OTHERS (SOLICITORS). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Mining lease—Negotiations—Third-party order—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

Where, under the usual third-party order for taxation of a lessor's solicitor's bill of costs in the preparation of a mining lease, the lessees objected that they were not liable for certain items for preliminary negotiations which were included in the bill, and in particular for fees paid to a mining expert and correspondence with him; and the question was whether their liability was altered by reason of a third-party order to tax having been obtained by them; and the taxing-master having decided that the lessees had rendered themselves liable for these fees by reason of their having obtained the third-party order to tax,

Held, that the third-party order did not alter or enlarge the scope of the liability upon the existence of which the order was based. The court was bound to look at the nature of the items, and to consider whether, apart from the order, the applicant was under any liability to pay them. Although the solicitor may put in one bill, as against his own client, a series of items, some of which may go beyond the liability of the third party, the third party does not, by obtaining an order to tax, render himself liable to the whole bill, unless there is a contract—express or implied—to this effect. The bill accordingly was referred back to the taxing-master to review his taxation.

This was a summons by lessees to review the taxation of a bill of costs of the lessor's solicitors, and the question was with reference to the liability of the lessees for certain items for preliminary negotiations which were included in the bill, and in particular for fees paid to a mining expert and correspondence with him, and whether this liability was altered by reason of a third-party order to tax having been obtained.

In 1895 the Delcoath Mine (Limited) were desirous of obtaining a mining lease of some property in Cornwall belonging to a Mr. Bassett, and in March of that year a correspondence and negotiations with a view to a lease being granted were commenced with Mr. Bassett and his advisers, and continued until August, 1899, when the lease and counterpart were executed.

In March, 1900, the usual third-party order to tax was obtained under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, on the petition of the Delcoath Mine (Limited), the lessees, in which it was alleged that the solicitors, Messrs. Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, were employed by Mr. Bassett, as lessor, to prepare the lease; that the said solicitors, on the 26th of October, 1899, delivered unto the petitioners their bill of fees and disbursements amounting to £301 12s. 4d., which the petitioners were liable to pay, but were advised ought to be taxed, and the petitioners submitted to pay what should be due thereon after taxation.

The taxing-master taxed the bill and made his certificate. He allowed certain items which the lessees objected to, and which consisted of charges for preliminary negotiations, and in particular for fees paid to a mining engineer, who was consulted on behalf of the lessor, and various correspondence with him.

The reasons alleged in support of the objections, and dated the 17th of July, 1900, were as follows:

(1) The Delcoath Mine (Limited), being lessees of certain mines, and Messrs. Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, being the solicitors for Mr. Bassett, the lessor thereof, the items complained of consist—(a) Of charges made in respect of advice obtained by the lessor, his solicitors or agent, for the purpose of enabling the said lessor to formulate the terms to be inserted in the demise of the mines in question, and of fees paid to mineral experts for giving such advice, such items being in part costs of "negotiations"; or (b) of charges for the counterpart of the lease.

(2) In the absence of special agreement, a lessee is not under any liability to pay to a lessor any such costs, and no such special agreement exists in this case.

(3) Although the bill is being taxed at the instance of the lessees, as third parties under section 38 of the Solicitors' Act, 1843, the lessees have not by obtaining the order for taxation become under any greater liability to pay the costs, charges, and expenses of the lessor's solicitors in respect of "negotiations" or counterpart of the lease than they were under prior to obtaining such order.

Then followed a schedule, giving in detail the various items in the bill to which exception was taken.

The taxing-master's answers, dated the 23rd of July, 1900, were as follows:

"There are two points involved in this case—

(1) A lessee is by law liable to pay his lessor for the costs of the lease: see Grissell v. Robinson, 3 Scott 329, 3 Bing. N. C. 10.

These costs are limited to such as are properly incurred in the drawing, settling, and completing the lease, and do not include the costs of the counterpart thereof: see In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895], 1 Ch. 73.

(2) In this case the lessee obtains an order to tax the lessor's solicitors' bill under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, as a party liable to pay. What is he liable to pay? His liability covers all charges which the lessor is liable to pay his solicitors, in the matter of the lease, as between the solicitor and the party chargeable, and not as between the party liable to pay and the party chargeable.

I have taxed the bill on these lines, and the charges allowed are fair and proper, except that I have bowed to the decision of In re Negus, and taken off the costs of the counterpart, which, apart from this decision, I should have allowed as a charge properly payable by the lessor to his solicitors, and also by the third party: In re Holliday and Godlee, 58 L. T. Rep. 301, 36 W. R. Dig. 56."

On the 10th of August, 1900, the lessees took out the present summons asking that their objections might be allowed and the matter referred back to the taxing-master to vary his certificate accordingly. Being a mining lease, it was admitted that the scale fee did not apply.

Eve, Q.C, and Romer, for the lessees.—Though the lessee only obtains a third-party order to tax on the footing that he is bound to pay what is due to the solicitor from his own client (In re Fyson, 9 Beav. 117; In re Massey, 13 W. R. 797, 34 Beav. 463), which may be more than the client, had he paid it, could have recovered from the third party, still the third party is only liable to pay the proper costs for preparing, settling, and completing the lease, and the third-party rule does not prevent the taxing-master from considering the question of the liability of the third party: In re Negus. By obtaining a third-party order to tax the lessee does not thereby become liable to pay for the costs of proceedings or other matters which he would not have been liable for had no third-party order been obtained; the lessee's common law liability is not increased by reason of his having a third-party order. In In re Holliday and Godlee the question was solely whether or not costs of reference to arbitration were excessive. The lessor's solicitor may be entitled to costs for negotiations leading up to the lease Savery v. Enfield Local Board, 42 W. R. 33, [1893] A. C. 218, but this cannot include fees to mining experts.

Ex parte Prickett, 3 Swans. 130, was also referred to.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the lessor's solicitors.—The lessor would have been entitled to recover the fees from the lessees had he paid them, and the lessees are therefore liable for all that he is properly liable to pay. The lessor could not have safely granted the lease without the advice of a competent mining engineer, and the lessees are therefore liable for this.

They referred to the following cases: Grissell v. Robinson; In re Martin, 37 W. R. 497, 41 Ch. D. 381; In re Carthew, 32 W. R. 940, 27 Ch. D. 485; In re Field, 33 W. R. 553, 29 Ch. D. 608; In re Emanuel and Simmonds, 34 W. R. 613, 33 Ch. D. 40; Savery v. Enfield Local Board; In re Negus; In re Holliday and Godlee; Humphreys v. Jones, 34 W. R. 1, 31 Ch. D. 30.

Romer, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—This is an application to review a taxation which raises a question of importance and difficulty. [His lordship then stated the facts, and having read the objections and taxing-master's answers, continued:] It is necessary to consider first what is the position of a lessee at common law with reference to the costs of a lease, and then how far, if at all, that position is altered by reason of an order to tax by a lessee under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.

Now it was decided in 1836, in Grissell v. Robinson, that a lessor who has paid his own attorney his charges for drawing a lease can recover the money from the lessee as money paid by the lessor to the use of the lessee. Evidence was there given that it is the custom for the lessor's attorney to prepare the lease at the expense of the lessee.

Jennings v. Major, 8 C. & P. 61, has been treated by text-writers as a decision that the lessor must pay for a counterpart of the lease, if he requires one, unless the lessee has expressly agreed to pay for it. And in In re Negus, Chitty, J., held that a lessee is under no liability to the lessor in respect of charges for the counterpart. In Lock v. Furze, 13 W. R. 971, 14 W. R. 403, 19 C. B. N. S. 96, it was asserted by counsel that fees to counsel and surveyors are never allowed. The reporter adds that the court intimated a doubt about it, and it was arranged that the £65 expenses should be reduced by £20, which appears to have been the exact amount of those fees. The question did not, therefore, arise for decision, but Erle, C.J., says: "Of this sum it is agreed that £20 shall be deducted, as the amount of counsel's and surveyor's fees, which are never allowed." I doubt whether this dictum is in accordance with existing usage so far as counsel's fees are concerned.

On principle the lessee must be held to have impliedly contracted to indemnify the lessor against expenses properly incurred in preparing the lease. In a case where the aid of a skilful conveyancer is reasonably required in settling the draft lease, I think the lessee ought to be liable to pay his fees: see Helps v. Clayton, 13 W. R. 161, 17 C. B. N. S. 553, at p. 568, where the liability of a husband to pay the costs of a marriage settlement is discussed, and Nicholson v. Jeyes, 1 W. R. 278, 22 L. J. Ch. 833.

I think, therefore, that if the lessor had paid his solicitors and sued the lessees, he could not have recovered anything antecedent to instructions for lease, and in particular could not have recovered the fees of the mining expert. This is in accordance with the law as between mortgagor and mortgagee, for in the absence of a special bargain the costs of a valuation of the property with a view to the loan are not allowed in taking the mortgage accounts: Field v. Hopkins, 44 Ch. D. 524, 38 W. R. Dig. 134.

It remains to consider what difference is made when the lessee elects to tax under the third-party clause. Now it is well settled that the bill to be taxed is the bill between the solicitor and his own client; and that the third party can only tax it as the condition of paying what is due to the solicitor from his own client, which may be more than the client, if he had paid it, could have recovered over from the third party: see In re Fyson; In re Massey. If, for example, in a case to which the scale fee would be applicable, the client makes an agreement with the solicitor under section 8 of the Act of 1881 that an item bill shall be delivered, I think the third party cannot complain. He must tax on the footing of the agreement.

A strong illustration of this principle is found in the case of In re Holliday and Godlee. There a local board agreed to purchase a piece of land at a price to be determined by arbitration, and the agreement contained a clause that the board should pay to the vendors all the costs of the agreement and of the reference to arbitration, and of deducing and evidencing the title and the assurance to the board, such costs to be paid on the basis of Schedule II. to the general order, and not on the basis of Schedule I. The arbitration took place, the price was fixed, and the property conveyed. The vendors' solicitors sent their bill of costs to the local board, and the usual third-party order for taxation was made. Objections were taken to a number of payments made to surveyors and mining engineers who had been called as expert witnesses. The local board objected that the payments were excessive and unreasonable. The solicitors answered that the witnesses were called and the payments were made with the approval of the vendors. North, J., held that the taxing-master had taxed the bill properly, having regard to the order which had been made, on the ground that, as between the vendors and the solicitors, all the payments had been authorized. "It is urged," he said, "that it is a great hardship on the purchasers to be obliged to pay any costs which the vendors chooses to authorize. The answer to that is, that the 'costs of reference' mentioned in the agreement means costs properly incurred; the purchasers are not bound to pay more, but, if the vendors demanded more the proper course for the purchasers was either to refuse to pay and await an action by the vendors, or to have the bill of costs referred to an expert for arbitration." It follows, therefore, that with respect to any piece of business properly inserted in the bill which the third party is liable to pay, it is not open to the third party to object that payments sanctioned by the client are excessive.

In the present case it was conceded by counsel for the solicitors that certain charges inserted in the bill, though proper as between the solicitors and their client, ought to be excluded from the bill, and the master has taken this view. I refer to charges with reference to a writ for specific performance of the agreement for a lease. The master has also struck out from the bill the costs relating to the counterpart lease, although such costs were clearly proper as between the solicitors and their client.

How is the line to be drawn? There is great difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory answer. I think the true view is that the third-party order does not alter the nature or enlarge the scope of the liability upon the existence of which the order it based. This view is supported by Chitty, J.'s, judgment in In re Negus. In that case there was an agreement for a lease not containing any express agreement by the lessee to pay the costs. A bill was delivered by the lessor's solicitors, and an order for taxation was obtained under the third-party clause. Chitty, J., held that the scale fee should apply, but that, as the scale fee included the costs of a counterpart lease, which the lessee was not liable to pay, a deduction ought to be made from the scale fee. Chitty, J., deals with this point as follows: "The other point remains—viz., that this is a third-party taxation, and the general rule is that a third party stands, as between himself and the solicitor whose bill he is taxing, in the position of the party chargeable. But that rule does not prevent the taxing-master from considering the question of the liability of the third party. This has been decided, and by way of illustration I may refer to In re Brown, 15 W. R. 1030, L. R. 4 Eq. 464. The trustee in that case was liable, as between himself and the solicitor who was defending his bill as against the cestuis que trust, for the items impeached, but Lord Romilly held that those items were properly disallowed by the taxing-master because they could not have been charged as against the trust estate. The solicitor had pointed out to the trustee, as was his duty, that he would not be allowed to charge; but still the trustee insisted upon the work being done, and yet these items were struck out from the bill when it was taxed by a third party. Now it is part of the general law (though it is unnecessary to go into the authorities), that in the case of lessor and lessee, the lessee is not bound to pay for the counterpart, and the scale fee prescribed by Schedule I., Part II., includes the counterpart; the words in Schedule I. are, 'Lessor's solicitor for preparing, settling, and completing lease and the counterpart,' and the decisions upon these rules generally show that the business contemplated by the rules must be wholly performed by the solicitors in the transaction in order to make the scale remuneration apply. There was a counterpart in this case, and it is plain that the landlord was liable to his solicitors to pay for this counterpart; the taxing-master in applying the scale, as he did, according to the amount of the rent, has necessarily included the charge for the counterpart, in respect of which there is no liability on the part of the tenant to the landlord; consequently it was argued for the tenant that the scale fee could not apply on this third-party taxation. In my opinion that argument cannot be sustained, for these rules, having—as has been well explained by Lord Halsbury in the case of Savery v. Enfield Local Board—been made for the purpose of preventing disputes on taxation, and providing some guidance as to the mode in which charges should be made, prescribed and fixed a gross sum for each document prepared, which could be known beforehand to any person able to employ a solicitor; and I cannot conceive it to have been the intention of the framers of rules that whilst the landlord had to pay, say, a minimum £5 to his solicitor, still the solicitor might be entitled to charge £10 or £20 on the non-scale system as against the lessee. My opinion is that this contention cannot prevail, and I think the taxing-master was right in taxing this bill in the manner he has done, as being the bill that the landlord has to pay. There is a novelty in the point about the counterpart, and I think that the only solution of this supposed difficulty that is reasonable and right is this—that the taxing-master should tax, as he has done this bill, as he would have taxed it as between the solicitor and landlord, and then seeing that the tenant was only liable for the preparing, settling, and completing the lease, he should have made a reasonable deduction from the scale in respect of the counterpart. The parties here have been very reasonable, and they do not require me to send the bill back to the taxing-master upon this small point; they have agreed that 5s. for the stamp duty on the counterpart, and 18s. in respect of the proper costs in relation to the counterpart, as distinct from the lease itself, should be deducted from the amount which the third-party taxing has on the present occasion to pay."

In re Negus has been followed by the taxing-master somewhat unwillingly, so far as the counterpart is concerned. But every word of the judgment seems to me to apply equally to the fees of the mining expert which he has allowed. The governing idea of Chitty, J.'s, judgment is that even on a third-party taxation the court is bound to look at the nature of the items, and to consider whether, apart from the order, the applicant is under any liability to pay them. In other words, although the solicitor may put in one bill as against his own client a series of items, some of which may go beyond the liability of the third party, the third party does not by obtaining an order to tax render himself liable to the whole bill. With respect to matters falling within his liability under a contract, express or implied, he cannot dispute the amount properly payable as between the solicitor and his own client, but in other respects his liability is not increased by obtaining a third-party order to tax. In the present case the petition only alleged that the solicitors were employed by Mr. Bassett, as lessor, "to prepare a lease," and the submission to pay contained in the order must be limited to what properly results from such employment.

I have carefully considered several cases which have arisen under express contracts by the lessee to pay the lessor's costs, and the application of the scale to such circumstances (In re Field, In re Emanuel and Simmonds, Savery v. Enfield Local Board, and In re Horn and Francis, 45 W. R. 72, [1896] 2 Ch. 797), but I have not derived much help from them. They only decided what business was covered by the scale fee. They did not raise the question which presents itself in the case with which I have to deal.

The result is that the bill must be referred back to the taxing-master to review his taxation in respect of the scheduled items. The respondents must pay the costs of the application.

MACKELLAR v. HORNSEY. (a.)

Practice—Striking out defence—Frivolous and vexatious—Abuse of process of court—Admissions in correspondence—Judgment for plaintiff—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 4; ord. 32, r. 6.

In an action for specific performance of an agreement to purchase leasehold property, the court, upon the pleadings and correspondence, having come to the conclusion that the defence was a dishonest one, and put in for the purpose of gaining time, ordered it to be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, and gave immediate judgment for the plaintiffs.

Motion.

The plaintiffs as trustees under the will and codicil of George Mackellar, who died in 1893, entered into an agreement with the defendant, dated the 7th of November, 1900, whereby they agreed to sell, and he to purchase of them, certain leasehold premises in Dover-street, Piccadilly, which were used as an hotel, for £3,075. Of this sum £307 10s. was to be paid down at once, and the remainder on the 3rd of December, 1900, which was fixed as the date for the completion of the purchase. The business was to be carried on until completion at the risk of the purchaser. The defendant paid the deposit money as agreed, and subsequently entered upon the premises and commenced making extensive alterations. In consequence of delay in completion, correspondence followed between the solicitors for the plaintiffs and the defendant and his solicitor, and on the 28th of December, 1900, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors, "There is not the least doubt that I shall be able to complete this matter in a few days. In the meantime, as you are aware, I am spending a considerable sum in doing this property up—viz., staircase, four reception rooms, and front of building."

The plaintiffs issued the writ in this action on the 29th of December, 1900, and delivered their statement of claim on the 8th of January, 1901.

The statement of claim stated the above facts, and alleged that the defendant had accepted the title of the plaintiffs, who had always been ready and willing to carry out the agreement on their part, but that the defendant refused to pay the balance of the purchase-money or to complete. It claimed specific performance of the agreement.

The defendant put in a defence as follows:

(1) He does not admit that the plaintiffs are such executors and trustees as alleged.

(2) He does not admit that he entered into the agreement of the 7th of November, 1900; or if he did, that the agreement (if any) he entered into is sufficiently or correctly set forth in the statement of claim; or that any provisions to the effect therein stated are contained in such agreement.

(3) The plaintiffs have not made out a title to the premises mentioned in the agreement, nor has the defendant accepted such title.

The plaintiffs now moved the court to strike out paragraphs (1) and (2) of the defence under ord. 25, r. 4, as frivolous and vexatious, and as an abuse of the process of the court; and that judgment should be given for specific performance as claimed. They filed affidavits proving the necessary facts, and making the correspondence an exhibit.

Astbury, K.C., and Edward Ford, for the plaintiffs.—The defence is vexatious and should be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4. The correspondence contains admissions which entitle us to judgment under that rule, and under ord. 32, r. 6, which states the admissions may be "on the pleadings or otherwise": Remmington v. Scoles, 45 W. R. 580, [1897] 2 Ch. 1.

Ashton Cross, for the defendant, submitted that such a course would be to decide the action on motion by affidavits.

BUCKLEY, J.—Upon the unanswered statements of the statement of claim and the admissions made in the correspondence I come to the conclusion that this is a dishonest defence, put in merely for the purpose of gaining time. I am glad to find that Remmington v. Scoles is an authority that I can strike out the defence as an abuse of the process of the court. The plaintiffs do not press for the third paragraph to be struck out, but I order paragraphs (1) and (2) to be struck out; and I give judgment for the plaintiff for specific performance, with costs up to and including the application. There will be the usual inquiry in chambers as to his title.

EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway—Repairs—Extraordinary traffic—Person "by or in consequence of whose order" traffic has been conducted—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23—Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12, sub-section 1 (c).

The defendants, on the 2*nd of March,* 1898, entered into a contract with a firm of contractors to carry out for them certain building operations. On the 16*th of March,* 1898, they entered into another building contract with another firm. The site of both buildings was in the plaintiffs' district, and the works involved the carriage of exceptionally heavy traffic along certain roads within the plaintiffs' highway district, and they were put to extraordinary expenses in repairing them. The work under the first contract was completed on the 5*th of April,* 1899, and under the second contract on the 23*rd of September,* 1899. The writ in this action was issued on the 22*nd of December,* 1899.

Held, that the defendants were persons "by or in consequence of whose order" the traffic was conducted within the meaning of section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, and were liable for the extraordinary expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in repairing the roads, but that the proceedings to recover the amount in respect of the damage caused in carrying out the first contract were too late, having been commenced more than six months after the completion of hat contract.

Action tried before Bigham, J , without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the highway authority for the Epsom district, and they brought this action to recover the amount of extraordinary expenses incurred by them in repairing certain highways in that district under circumstances that are set out sufficiently fully in the judgment.

Macmorran, Q.C., Cunningham Glen, and Swinburne-Hanham, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the decision of this case turned on the true construction of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, as amended by section 12 of the Locomotive Act, 1898. By the latter Act the words "by whose order" in the earlier Act were altered into "by or in consequence of whose order." The alteration was made in consequence of the decision in Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard, 46 W. R. 111, [1897] A. C. 633, and was passed to meet such a case as the present. It is impossible to separate the damage done to the roads under each of the contracts. The work must be treated as a whole, and the period of limitation does not begin to run until the completion of that work. The damage done can only be tested by comparing the extraordinary with the ordinary traffic over the roads during the whole time the work ordered to be done was being executed: Hill v. Thomas, [1893] 2 Q. B. 333, 41 W. R. Dig. 85; Etherley Grange Coal Co. v. Auckland District Highway Board, 42 W. R. 198, [1894] 1 Q. B. 37.

Dickens, Q.C., and Daldy, for the defendants.—The extraordinary traffic was not caused by or in consequence of any order of the defendants: Lapthorn v. Harvey, 49 J. P. 709. Moreover, the surveyor's certificate is insufficient, for it merely shows the average expenses of repairing the roads in question, whereas it ought to show the average expenses of all the roads in the neighbourhood: Reg. v. Williamson, 45 J. P. 505.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 10.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: The question in this case is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants the cost of repairing the damage done to some roads in their district by certain exceptionally heavy traffic thereon. They contend that the traffic came on to the roads by or in consequence of the order of the defendants, and that therefore the defendants are liable under section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, as amended by section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898. The facts are these: The defendants in the year 1898 entered into agreements with two firms of contractors for the erection of a temporary hospital and for the alteration of certain existing buildings so as to adapt them for use as a permanent hospital. The site of both buildings was in the plaintiffs' district, and the works involved the carriage of exceptionally heavy traffic along certain roads in the district. The work under one of these contracts (Kirk & Randall's) was completed by the 15th of April, 1899. On the 12th of July, 1899, the plaintiffs' surveyor granted a certificate in the following form for the purpose of complying with the requirements of section 23 of the Act of 1878: "Extraordinary Traffic.—I hereby certify that, having regard to the average expenses of repairing highways along the line of traffic to the Horton Asylum temporary buildings, extraordinary expenses to the amount of £484 15s. 11d. have been incurred by you in repairing such highways by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon. In calculating the above amount I have ascertained the cost of repairs of these roads for the past five years and have deducted the average annual cost from the total expended.—(Signed) Edward R. Capon." The writ was issued on the 22nd of December, 1899.

The first question is whether the defendants are persons "by or in consequence of whose order" the traffic was conducted within the meaning of the two Acts of Parliament. Under the earlier Act the persons made liable were those persons "by whose order" the traffic was conducted. By the later Act the words "by or in consequence of whose order" are substituted for the words "by whose order." In the case of Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard, 46 W. R. 111, [1897] A. C. 633, the question arose as to the meaning of the expression "by whose order" which occurs in the earlier Act. In that case Lord Gerard had contracted with several persons for the delivery at his residence of certain material. Extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the statute were incurred by the road authority in repairing the roads over which the materials were brought to the house, and the plaintiffs sought to recover the amount from Lord Gerard. The House of Lords held that inasmuch as Lord Gerard had bought the material "delivered," he had nothing to do with the conduct of the traffic along the roads; that the traffic was conducted by the order of the persons who had sold the goods "delivered," and that, therefore, Lord Gerard was not liable. In the Court of Appeal, Lopes, L.J., had read the words "by whose order" as equivalent to the words "in consequence of whose order"; and had come to the conclusion (differing from the other members of the court) that Lord Gerard was liable. The Lords did not think that this view was right, but they do seem to me to have expressed an opinion (which, of course, was obiter) that, if it had been possible to give the words of the statute the meaning which Lopes, L.J., gave to them, then Lord Gerard would have been liable. The amendment in the Act of 1898 was introduced in consequence of the decision in Lord Gerard's case. The words "by whose order" were discarded, and the words "by or in consequence of whose order" were substituted. There can be no doubt that the object of the Legislature was to alter the earlier Act in such a way as to bring a case like Lord Gerard's within its scope. Whether the Legislature has succeeded may be open to doubt, but I am of opinion that it has succeeded, and that if Lord Gerard's case had been decided under the later Act Lord Gerard would have been held to be liable. Then is there any distinction in principle between Lord Gerard's case and the present case? In the former the building owner contracted for the delivery of the building materials on his land; in the latter the building owner (the London County Council) contracted for the erection of the buildings on their land. In each case the same consequence follows from the contract—namely, that the materials are conducted along the road. The only difference is that in the one case the materials belong to the building owner as soon as they are delivered, whereas in the other the materials do not belong to the building owner until they are worked into the structure by the contractor. In both cases orders were given—that is to say, contracts were made—and in both cases the consequence of the orders or contracts was that the traffic was conducted along the roads. I think that the plaintiffs are entitled on this, the main question in the case, to succeed.

But then it is said that inasmuch as the two building contracts were made before the later Act came into force—namely, before the 1st of January, 1899—no orders within the meaning of the Act can be said to have been given at all. But I think it is not the giving of the order which creates the liability; it is the doing the damage, and therefore, though the contracts were made before the new Act, yet if, and to the extent that, damage was done afterwards, I think the defendants are liable.

Another point was taken on behalf of the defendants. It was said that in respect of the damage done in the execution of Kirk & Randall's work the proceedings to recover the amount were begun too late. I think that is so. The damage done by Kirk & Randall was, in my opinion, the consequence of their particular building contract, and, therefore, clause (b) of sub-section 1 of section 12 of the Act of 1898 applies. That provision is that "proceedings for the recovery of any expenses incurred after the passing of this Act shall be commenced within twelve months of the time at which the damage has been done, or, where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract or work extending over a long period, shall be commenced not later than six months after the completion of the contract or work." Kirk & Randall's contract was completed on the 15th of April, 1899, and the writ was not issued until the 22nd of December, 1899. Finally it was said that the form of the surveyor's certificate was not sufficient because it does not appear on its face that in making it regard has been had to "the average expenses of repairing highways in the neighbourhood" within the meaning of the 23rd section of the Act of 1878. I think nothing of this point. I am quite satisfied that the certificate did make it appear to the plaintiffs that extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the section had been incurred; and, if it did that, it was a certificate which complied with the requirements of the law.

The amount recoverable by the plaintiffs must, therefore, be ascertained in accordance with the principle I have laid down, and I trust neither party will spend any more of the ratepayers' money in litigating this question.

"THE SAVONA." (a.)

Ship—Charter party—Damage to cargo—Goods carried into England and Wales—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6—Reasonable care of cargo—Cargo unloaded at port of refuge—Refusal to carry on—Excepted perils.

Case in which a master of a vessel laden with a cargo of coals, having been compelled to put into a port of refuge and discharge the cargo in order to repair his ship, was held justified in refusing to carry on the cargo which had in parts been saturated with sea water and become heated.

This was an action in rem under the sixth section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, instituted on behalf of the owners of a cargo of coals laden on board the ship Savona against The Savona to recover for the breach of charter-party in not delivering the cargo at the agreed port of discharge.

The petition alleged that by a charter-party dated the 27th of October, 1899, made between the plaintiffs and defendants, it was agreed that The Savona should load at Cardiff a cargo of coals, and being so loaded should proceed to Cape Town and there discharge the cargo; that the coals were loaded in due course and The Savona started with them to Cape Town, but owing to stress of weather was obliged to put into Falmouth for repairs; that the defendants there discharged the cargo and in breach of the terms of the charter-party refused to load it again and carry it on to Cape Town; and that the defendants alleged and the plaintiffs denied that the coal had been rendered by perils of the sea unfit to carry on to Cape Town.

The defendants set up a defence that on the voyage bad weather was met with and both ship and cargo thereby sustained damage; that the cargo became wet and damaged and with the plaintiff's assent, and necessarily, was discharged at Falmouth; that it was then found to be in an unfit state to be reloaded and carried on; and that the defendants were never required by the plaintiffs to carry it on, but were excused from doing so by reason of excepted perils—namely, perils of the sea.

May 9.—On this day the suit was heard before the judge in court (Barnes, J.) assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 11.—BARNES, J.—This is an action by the owners of a cargo of coals lately laden on board the ship Savona "against the owners of the ship Savona" for damages for what is alleged to be a wrongful refusal on the part of the defendants to carry the cargo to Cape Town, and, in the alternative, for a contribution to general average from the defendants. The Savona had been chartered, on the 27th of October, 1899, by the Castle Mail Packet (Limited) to load a cargo of coals at Cardiff, and to proceed therewith to Cape Town and deliver the same there. The freight was to be 19s. 9d. per ton, of which two-thirds, less 5 per cent. for all charges, was to be paid in London within eight days of the final sailing of the vessel. The vessel started on her voyage after loading the cargo and she met with extremely severe weather so much that when she was somewhere off Finisterre she was compelled to put back to Falmouth. The evidence of the master shows that she met with very severe weather, sustained a variety of damage, and that a large quantity of water had found its way to different parts of the ship and down into the cargo. When the vessel reached Falmouth it was found necessary to discharge the cargo, partly, as I understand, because of the necessity of doing so arising from the condition of the ship herself, and partly also because of the condition of the cargo, which the surveyors who saw it as it was discharged found to be heating in several places, and to be damaged largely by sea-water in different parts of the ship and down into the cargo. Thereupon the plaintiffs and the defendants appointed surveyors to examine the cargo as it was discharged, and these surveyors attended throughout the discharge. One of them who was called stated that he saw the cargo on thirty different occasions when it was being discharged. The surveyors who had been so appointed —one of them, Mr. Buckley, who went at the request of Messrs. Donald Currie & Co., the shippers of the cargo, and the other, Mr. Downing, who, I think, acted on behalf of the defendants, reported from time to time. I think we have had only the report of Mr. Buckley read, but as far as I read the evidence, substantially he and Mr. Downing agreed about the points which are specified in that report which was put in. The report of Mr. Buckley of the 12th of January, when the ship had first come back, wound up by saying that he was of opinion that "the risk would be too great for the vessel to proceed with the cargo to Cape Town," and when the discharge was finally completed, which was about the 22nd or 23rd of February, he wrote this report: "Having carefully considered the facts stated in my daily reports, I am of opinion that the condition of the coal renders it totally unfit for reshipment for any port beyond the tropics." Now the owners of the coal in the meantime had abandoned it to their underwriters, and, as far as I can follow from the correspondence, the underwriters had sent down a surveyor, who saw the coal, and there is a letter of the 17th of January from Messrs. Fox & Co., who acted as agents to Messrs. Donald Currie & Co., to the effect that they gathered that, under all the circumstances, the surveyor did not consider that it would be wise for the voyage to be continued. None of the surveyors who inspected the cargo at that time on behalf of the underwriters were called at the hearing of the case, and the only persons who inspected this cargo with anything like accuracy, and whose reports and evidence have been before us, were the surveyors who acted on behalf of the owners of the ship and the owners of the cargo. Now I have said that the whole of the cargo appears to have been discharged by about the 22nd of February. There then came some correspondence. On the 7th of March the firm who acted for the owners of the ship wrote to Messrs. Donald Currie & Co. asking what course they propose to adopt with regard to the cargo, and saying that the owners of the ship proposed to abandon the cargo, and were claiming for their loss of freight against their underwriters. To that letter Messrs. Donald Currie & Co., on the 9th of March, wrote: "We beg to inform you that the underwriters have declined to agree to the abandonment of the cargo, and consequently we see nothing for it but for the ship to complete the voyage." That letter is treated by the plaintiffs as being a request to the defendants to carry the cargo on, and the prior letter is treated as a refusal on the part of defendants to carry it on. Thereupon the writ in this action was issued on the 28th of March last, claiming the damages which I have referred to, and a contribution in general average. It seems to me that the case must be dealt with as at the date at which this action was commenced—namely, on the 28th of March, 1900. At that time the plaintiffs in the case had insisted that the cargo must be carried on, though I think it is clear that they did not themselves desire this to be done, but were forced to take up that position by their underwriters. The defendant shipowners, on the other hand, had contended that the cargo ought not to be carried on. The question, therefore, to be decided is whether at the date of the issue of the writ there was a breach of contract on the part of the shipowners, because it must be made out that there was a breach at that time in order to establish a right of action. The evidence of this consists practically of the reports of Mr. Downey and Mr. Buckley, who saw the cargo and advised upon it up to that date, with the exception of the underwriters' surveyors, who have not been called, though they seem to have seen the cargo. Mr. Buckley and Mr. Downey were of opinion that the cargo was not fit for reshipment, and they substantially maintain that opinion up to the present time, based upon the condition of the coal as seen by them as it was discharged. The further evidence which has been given by the plaintiffs and defendants is with reference to what took place after that date. The plaintiffs called an expert analyst who saw this cargo on the 27th of April, and another expert analyst, Dr. Dyer, who, in consequence of Mr. Nimmo's report on samples, made an analysis of the coal though he did not see the cargo itself. Mr. Addie saw the cargo on the 31st of March—that is, after the date of the writ—and Mr. Milbank, of the Salvage Association, saw it on behalf of the plaintiffs on the 5th of May. Now, the evidence of these gentlemen, dealing with it broadly, is to the effect that the cargo is in a condition to be carried to its destination. The evidence of those who saw the cargo on behalf of the defendants is, from first to last, that it is not even now fit to be carried on, though Professor Lewis, a very experienced chemist, considers that whilst it was not fit to be carried on at the date of the writ—namely, the 28th of March, it could now be re-shipped and carried on if the small coal which has been produced by the different handlings of the cargo were eliminated from it. It seems to me that the result of the evidence is to show these two facts: first, that the cargo was not fit to carry on and was not fit for reshipment at any time prior to the issue of the writ; secondly, that it is at the present date fit to be carried on provided the cargo has eliminated from it the large portion of small coal which according to the evidence would constitute a source of danger in respect of spontaneous combustion if it were shipped with the rest of the coal. Assuming that to be the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence, a question of very considerable difficulty arises; but before I deal with it I will dispose of one point raised by the plaintiffs—namely, that in the course of the discharge of the cargo, whoever was responsible for the care of it—that is, the master acting through his agents—might have separated the wet coal from the dry, and placed the dry coal in a position to be reshipped. That seems a practical question, which the defendants have met by evidence that, having regard to the general nature of the wetting which the coal had received—that is, wetting not over the whole of it, but in a great many places it was not a practicable matter. I have consulted the Elder Brethren about this, and—taking the evidence upon the point given by the defendants, which is, I think, correct—their opinion is that it would not have been a practical matter to have separated the dry coal from the wet; in other words, that there was nothing wrong in the mode in which the coal was discharged or in the mode of storing the coal ashore, or in dealing with it in the way it was in fact dealt with.

Having disposed of that point, I come to the question which I have to solve with regard to the unfitness of the cargo and its subsequent fitness for reshipment if something was done to it, which seems to me to go to the root of this case. Shortly before the issue of the writ the plaintiffs said, really for their underwriters, "The cargo must go on," and the defendants said, "We cannot take it on." I have to consider what then and there ought to have been done—in other words, whether the master committed a breach of contract by refusing to carry the cargo on, which I have found was at the time unfit to be reshipped and carried to its destination in safety. This, I think, is really, after the findings of fact, more a matter of law than of fact. But there is one matter about which I have asked the Elder Brethren their opinion because it fortifies the position which I think is the correct one to take up having regard to the law applicable to this case, and that is whether from a practicable point of view the master of the ship, who had been informed by everybody who saw the cargo up to that time, including the surveyors on both sides, that it could not be carried on safely, would be justified in taking the risk of reloading it and carrying it on. On this point the Elder Brethren take a strong view, and say that no master, having regard to the danger which was to be anticipated of spontaneous combustion and to the materials for forming a judgment which both sides placed before him at that time, would have been justified in taking the risk of reshipping the cargo. It is said, however, that that will not get rid of the difficulty, because, as matters have subsequently turned out, by waiting two months or so, the cargo, after something has been done to it, might be reshipped, and that the plaintiffs, acting for the underwriters, are proceeding to reship it, and have chartered a ship for that purpose. But I do not think this case can be decided by what happened afterwards, except as a test of what was the true state of things at the time when the question of breach has to be considered.

The position, therefore, is this: At the time when this action was commenced everybody agreed that it could not be reshipped with safety, and I have stated the view as to the risk which the master would have taken on himself by acting in defiance of that opinion. It seems to me that, regarding the matter at that time, there was nothing to show how long it might possibly be before those concerned could come to the conclusion that the cargo could be reshipped. Then the master, looking at the matter from the point of view of time, would have to face the position: "I cannot ship this cargo now. Everybody agrees that the risk would be too great. How long am I to wait until it is possible to do so?" That was a problematical matter, as is shown by the fact that some of the experts called maintain that even now it is not fit to be reshipped. How long is a master face to face with that position to wait till he can make up his mind that he can carry the cargo without risk to the ship and to the lives of those on board of her. I do not think that the observations that were referred to by counsel, and which are to be found in Notara v. Henderson, are precisely applicable to this position, but they illustrate the difficulty in which a master is placed who has to face the position whether he shall reload and carry a cargo or not. In that case, Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the court, said: "A fair allowance ought to be made for the difficulties in which the master may be involved. The performance of such a duty whether it be for the joint benefit of the shipowner and the shipper or for the benefit of the shipper only could not be excused by reason of insignificant delay not amounting to deviation; and there are many cases of reasonable delay in ports of call for purposes connected with the voyage though not necessary for its completion which do not amount to deviation. It could not be insisted upon if a deviation were involved. The place, the season, the extent of the deterioration, the opportunity and means at hand, the interests of other persons concerned in the adventure whom it might be unfair to delay for the sake of the part of the cargo in peril; in short, all circumstances affecting risk, trouble, delay and inconvenience must be taken into account. Nor ought it to be forgotten that the master is to exercise a discretionary power, and that his acts are not to be censured because of an unfortunate result, unless it can be affirmatively made out that he has been guilty of a breach of duty."

In this case it appears to me that the plaintiffs—the nominal plaintiffs because they represented the underwriters, left the master to deal with the matter and determine it. The correspondence undoubtedly shows that, especially the letter in which the plaintiffs say, "We see nothing for it but for the ship to complete her voyage." What was the master to do? My opinion is that he was, taking all the circumstances into consideration, justified in saying that the cargo could not safely be reshipped, and that he must refuse to do it; that he was not bound to wait for weeks, or it might be months, to ascertain whether it would be fit at some future date when something had happened in the way of further drying or something had been done to it in the way of screening. The only other point I think it necessary for me to refer to is this, that I have found as a fact on the evidence that even now it is not safe to reship this cargo without the separation of the small coal as indicated by Professor Lewis. With regard to that point the witnesses said that there were no facilities for carrying out the separation at Falmouth, and that the time and money which would be involved were out of all question. That element, I think, comes into consideration in arriving at the decision at the time, because it is not merely a question of risk of reshipment or of waiting, but it is also a question of the cost which would have to be incurred if the master has to act to produce a state of safety at a later period. If the time and expense involved are out of all proportion to the value of the cargo, which is the opinion of those who have given evidence on this point and about which there is no conflict, I think that that further element must be taken into consideration in determining at the time whether the master is then and there bound to decide to take the cargo on. A strong point made by the plaintiffs is that they say "Someone else is willing to do it," but that is at a long period afterwards, when circumstances have entirely changed and it is to be done under a contract by the underwriters, who are bound to pay all the forwarding expenses. That is not the same position as if the reshipment had been taken up at the simple risk of merchants on one side with the shipowners to deal with on the other side.

The case is one of some difficulty, but, exercising the best judgment I have been able to form and having regard to all the facts, I am of opinion that there was no breach of contract by the shipowners entitling the plantiffs to recover in this action. There is an alternative claim for general average expenditure, but there may be a question with regard to that as to whether any right of action can be maintained in rem in respect of a claim for general average. The only right of action in this case is a right of action under the sixth section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, giving the right to sue for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owners of The Savona. It has not been shown that there has been any wrongful refusal to pay general average, and as the defendants have agreed to accept service in this country in an action in personam for general average if any such action be brought, the claim for general average will by consent be struck out of the proceedings in the present suit.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 22; Feb. 22.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTRIC LIGHTING CO. v. MAYOR, &c., OF THE CITY OF LONDON. (a.)

Contract — City of London Corporation — Interest of member — Illegality — City of London Sewers Act, 1848, s. 42—City of London Sewers Act, 1851, ss. 53, 57.

The fact that a commissioner of sewers or an alderman or common councilman of the City of London is interested or concerned in a contract made by the Commissioners of Sewers with a company, by reason of his being a shareholder in such company, is sufficient to render the contract null and void.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J., of the 4th of May, 1900.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that three several agreements—(1) an agreement dated the 19th of May, 1890, and made by and between the Brush Electrical Engineering Co. (Limited) and the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London; (2) an agreement dated the 28th of May, 1890, and made by and between the Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate (Limited) and the said commissioners; and (3) an agreement dated the 5th of February, 1891, and made by and between the Brush Electrical Engineering Co. (Limited) and the said commissioners—were valid and subsisting.

The three agreements were transferred to the plaintiffs by two indentures, dated the 21st of August, 1891.

The defendants, who were the successors in title and office of the Commissioners of Sewers, pleaded by way of defence to the plaintiffs' claim that, at the respective times when the contracts and indentures were made and thereafter, persons being Commissioners of Sewers and persons being members of the court of aldermen, and persons being members of the common council of the City of London were, or became, directly or indirectly, interested or concerned in the said contracts, and that by reason thereof, and by virtue of section 42 of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848, the said contracts were and became null and void.

The contracts in question were for lighting the city by electricity.

The city had been lighted under these contracts since 1891, but in 1898, the defendants, in consequence of certain facts which then came to their knowledge, repudiated the contracts.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action.

It appeared that at the date of the contracts some of the commissioners, aldermen, and common councilmen were shareholders in the Brush Co. and also in the plaintiff company, and it was contended on behalf of the defendants that that fact rendered the contracts null and void.

The question depended upon the construction of the City of London Sewers Acts, 1848 and 1851.

The Act of 1848, after repealing certain earlier Acts and vesting the power of lighting in the commissioners, and providing for the appointment of the commissioners and their meetings, quorum, and the like, enacted in section 33 as follows:

"And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the commissioners, or any committee appointed by them, to enter into and contract in the name of the commissioners with any persons for the execution of any works directed or authorized by this Act to be done by the commissioners, or for furnishing materials or labour, or for any other matters or things whatsoever necessary for enabling them to carry the purposes of this Act into full and complete effect, in such manner, and upon such terms, and for such sums of money, and under such stipulations, regulations, and restrictions as the commissioners or such committee shall think proper."

The Act then provided, by section 41, that the commissioners were not to be personally liable on such contracts, and section 42 enacted as follows:

"That no person, being a commissioner, or a member of the court of aldermen of the common council of the city, shall be directly or indirectly interested or concerned in any contract which shall be made or entered into by or on behalf of the commissioners for the execution of any works by this Act directed or authorized to be done or executed, or for furnishing materials or labour, or for any other matter or thing whatsoever, upon pain that every such contract shall be null and void, and that the person who, being a commissioner, or a member of the said court of aldermen or of the common council, shall be so interested or concerned therein shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £100 to any person who shall sue for the same, to be recovered in any of the superior courts by action of debt or on the case."

The Act also enabled the commissioners to contract for the supply of water (section 55) and to contract with gas companies or other persons to supply gas or light to the city by any other mode (section 116).

By the Act of 1851, which was passed in order to continue the earlier Act (which would otherwise have expired) with such variations and additions as had been shown to be necessary, it was (by section 53) enacted as follows:

"That no person, being a commissioner, who is a shareholder in, or surveyor, solicitor, or agent for any gas company, water company, paving company, or any work, undertaking, or speculation the contracting with or the promotion or carrying out of which shall be discussed at any meeting of the commissioners, shall be eligible to sit or vote as a commissioner while such subject is under the discussion of the commissioners.

Farwell, J., was of opinion that the Act of 1848 contemplated that the commissioners would enter into contracts of two sorts—(1) for the construction of works or supply of materials to the city which would become their own property, and which he called "construction contracts"; and (2) for the supply of water for cleansing or of gas or other illuminant for lighting the city by companies or persons owning waterworks or gasworks or the like; that the contracts in question in this case fell under the second head; that sections 33 to 42 formed a group of sections dealing with construction contracts; and that notwithstanding the generality of the language of section 42, that section applied to construction contracts only. Moreover, section 42 ought to be read with section 53 of the Act of 1851, and (in his opinion) it would be idle to enact that a commissioner who was a shareholder in any contracting company should not be eligible to vote on the contract if the mere fact of his being a shareholder rendered it impossible that any contract could be entered into. Lastly, he thought that if section 42 was ambiguous, as he held it was, the more reasonable construction ought to be preferred. He therefore made a declaration in favour of the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment of RIGBY, L.J., in which he concurred: After careful consideration of the provisions of the Act of 1848, of the judgment of Farwell, J., and of the arguments addressed to us, I am quite unable to concur in the construction put upon the Act by the learned judge. This, speaking broadly, consists in treating all the sections of the Act from 33 to 42, both inclusive, as dealing only with what the learned judge calls construction contracts, leaving all other contracts, as, for instance, lighting contracts, outside their provisions, with the remarkable result that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 42, there is nothing to prevent any commissioner, alderman, or common councillor from having the largest interest in any contract with the commissioners not a construction contract. In contradiction of this construction, I hold that the sections above-mentioned do, in one part or another, deal with every possible contract that the commissioners can enter into by virtue of the Act, and that the provision contained in section 42, whatever its effect, is to be applied to every such contract; and I proceed to refer to the different sections of the Act, so far as it seems to me necessary for establishing that proposition. Section 33 authorizes the commissioners or any committee appointed by them (no authority to any such committee is conferred elsewhere in the Act) to contract for the matters hereinafter mentioned: (a) The execution of any works directed or authorized by the Act to be done by the commissioners. This would plainly authorize a contract for constructing sewers, though the power to deal with sewers is not, except by general terms, given or referred to by sections 33 to 42 inclusive, or previously to section 53. (b) The furnishing of materials. This would clearly authorize a contract with quarry owners in Wales, for instance, to furnish hundreds of tons of granite sets to be delivered at any appointed place in the city. Such a contract could by no ingenuity be described as a construction contract. (c) The furnishing of labour. This might extend to the laying down of the granite sets so as aforesaid purchased or other dealings with materials supplied, or to some totally independent purpose unconnected with the supply of materials—e.g., the watering or sweeping of the streets. Some of these contracts might possibly, others could not properly, be described as construction contracts. (d) Any other matters or things necessary for enabling them to carry the purposes of the Act into full and complete effect I can hardly imagine words better calculated to exclude any ejusdem generis construction than these last, even if it were possible to indicate any one genus to which all the contracts coming under heads (a) (b) and (c) could be referred, which I do not think it is. Obviously a lighting contract would be within these general words, and I do not know any contract for purposes of the Act which could be excluded. If the precedent words of the section were to be treated as cutting down the generality of the subsequent words, it would only be by a construction which would render both the execution of works and the supply of materials or labour essential to every contract. For this there can be no reason, and such a construction cannot be accepted. [His lordship then discussed other sections of the Act of 1848, and continued as follows:] It does not require argument to prove that all contracts dealt with in section 33 are also referred to and dealt with in section 42, and it is almost impossible to suppose such one-sided legislation as would apply the stringent provisions of that section to construction contracts only and leave it lawful to any commissioner, alderman, or common councilman to have the largest interest in any contract with the commissioners that is not a construction contract.

As to the meaning of section 42, the important point for decision is whether a corporator or shareholder of an incorporated company is or is not interested directly or indirectly in any contract entered into with the company. It was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff company that as a general rule he is so interested, and indeed to deny that would be equivalent to saying that in case of a contract within an incorporated company no person whatsoever is interested though the whole fortunes of the corporators or shareholders may depend upon the contract—a contention which is manifestly absurd. But, beyond what I think may fairly be called the main contention—viz., that only construction contracts are within section 42—the plaintiffs have contended, and the learned judge has in their favour held, that the Act of 1851, and particularly section 53 thereof, proves that under the special legislation affecting the Commissioners of Sewers a shareholder is not considered as being interested in a contract made by his company, though he must necessarily share in any profits or loss that might be the result thereof. If there were words in the Act of 1851 necessarily involving that conclusion, effect must be given to them; but no mere conjecture based on probable grounds would be sufficient for the purpose. The argument of the plaintiffs, adopted by the learned judge, turns entirely upon section 53 of the Act. That is a section not relating to concluded contracts, but to discussion and votes antecedent to contracts. It refers only to commissioners, and not to aldermen or common councilmen, though they are dealt with by section 42 of the Act of 1848. The section was obviously intended to extend still further the disabilities of commissioners, and there is nothing to indicate that any relaxation of the provisions of the earlier statute was intended. But, whilst providing that no commissioner being a surveyor, solicitor, or agent of a company with whom it is intended to enter into a contract shall sit or vote, it applies naturally the same provision to a shareholder of the company. It would be strange, indeed, if a surveyor, solicitor, or agent were prevented from sitting or voting and a shareholder permitted to do both. But from the fact that a commissioner shareholder is prohibited by section 53 to sit or vote upon the question of entering into a contract with his company, it has been argued that he could not be possessed of such an interest as under section 42 of the Act of 1848 would render the contract, if and when made, null and void. It would be unnecessary, it is argued, to prevent him from sitting and voting if the fact of his holding shares would of itself avoid the contract. The argument loses sight of the fact that a shareholder commissioner might, by taking part in and voting as to the expediency and policy of a contract with his company, exercise perhaps a decisive influence on the entering into such contract and yet might not, when the contract was signed, be any longer a shareholder or any longer a commissioner, in either of which cases the contract would be unaffected by section 42. There is, in fact, no necessary connection between section 42 of the earlier and section 53 of the later Act, and it would be illogical and merely conjectural to assume that the later section should interpret the earlier.

The conclusion I arrive at is that a shareholder commissioner, alderman, or common councilman is interested within section 42, and that the existence of his interest is sufficient to render a contract with his company null and void. The fact that express provision has been made by Parliament that a member of an ordinary municipal council shall not be precluded, by being interested only as a shareholder of an incorporated company, from taking part in making a contract between his company and the corporation of which he is a member only emphasises the distinction in this respect between ordinary municipal corporations and the city corporation, as to which no similar Parliamentary provision exists, or apparently ever has existed. Mr. Danckwerts pointed out that in legislation relating to the City Corporation clauses substantially similar in effect to section 42 of the Act of 1848 have been regularly inserted from a time long anterior to the date of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, down to the present time. This disposes of the suggestion that the legislation of 1848 was a mere experiment, which, being found unsatisfactory, was amended in 1851.

Turning now to the facts of the present case, so far as they are relevant, we find from the statement of claim and the particulars to paragraph 4 of the defence, which are admitted to be accurate, the facts hereinafter stated. With regard to the central and western districts the Brush Co. obtained provisional orders, with the consent of the Commissioners of Sewers as local authority, and those orders were confirmed by an Act of Parliament not containing any statutory power of assigning the contracts which might be made with the promoters. The Brush Co. entered into contracts with the Commissioners of Sewers, dated, as to the central district, the 19th of May, 1890, and, as to the western district, the 5th of February, 1891, as to electric light. At each of those dates a common councilman was a shareholder in the Brush Co., and each of the two contracts was null and void ab initio. Notwithstanding this, by a deed dated the 21st of August, 1891, the Brush Co. affected to convey the contracts to the plaintiff company, but this assignment could not render valid the contracts which were already null and void. We have only to give effect to the provisions of the statutes, and have not a dispensing power, even if we were disposed to exercise it. With regard to the contract as to the eastern district, dated the 28th of May, 1890, it appears that the Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate (Limited), the contracting parties, had no shareholder whose existence would render null the contract; and, although it appears that the Board of Trade might have revoked the provisional order but for the assurance of the Commissioners of Sewers that the syndicate would be financed and the contract taken over by the Pioneer Co. and the City of London Co. respectively, and that both those companies were disabled from entering into any valid contract with the Commissioners of Sewers, yet, on the assumption, which I see no reason to doubt, that the contract of the 28th of May, 1890, was originally entered into in good faith, I can find no provision in the Acts of 1848 and 1851, or either of them, entitling us to set it aside.

STIRLING, L.J., read a judgment to the same effect.

THE COURT declared that the first two contracts were invalid, but did not interfere with the third; and, on the ground that each party had in part succeeded and in part failed, no costs were given in either court.

Appeal allowed.

EASTWOOD BROTHERS (LIMITED) v. HONLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Sewers—Prescriptive right of drainage—Trade effluents—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 17, 21—Public Health Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 17—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), ss. 4, 7, 16.

Where the owners of buildings have acquired a right to discharge drainage into a public sewer through a connection lawfully made, that right extends to the discharge of trade and manufacturing effluents, and section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, does not justify a local sanitary authority in cutting off the connection with their sewer, even although it is shown that the discharge of the trade effluent prejudicially affects the disposal of the sewage matter conveyed through the sewer.

Decision of Byrne, J. (48 W. R. 614), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 48 W. R. 614).

The plaintiff company were the owners in fee of land and mills at Honley, near Huddersfield, known as Thirston Mills, where they carried on the business of woollen and worsted manufacturers. They acquired the property in 1890 as successors in title to a firm of Eastwood Brothers, who in their turn had derived title through a firm of Dearnley, Drury, & Co.

In the year 1853 a drain was constructed from the mills which carried the trade effluent discharged in the processes of manufacture into a ditch or channel known as Thirston Dyke, and that channel discharged into a drain known as the May Brook, and so into the River Holme. There was no interruption in the user of that drain for trade effluents so long as it discharged into Thirston Dyke.

In the year 1885 the Honley Local Board, which at that time was the local sanitary authority for the district within which the mills were situated, projected and carried out a sewerage system under which they constructed a sewer near the Thirston Dyke, and, as it appeared from the evidence, the workmen of the board, without any special directions and without previous communication with the then owners of Thirston Mills, took up the drain from the mills at the point where it met the new sewer, and made a connection between them; so that from 1885 to the present time the drain had ceased to discharge into Thirston Dyke, and the effluent from the mills had passed through the sewer into the River Holme.

Thirston Mills had since 1853 been from time to time enlarged, and there was some evidence to the effect that the volume of the trade effluent had increased in recent years, but that there had been no material change in its character.

Under the Local Government Act, 1894, the Honley Local Board became the Honley Urban District Council.

In 1896 a joint committee was formed of the Honley Urban District Council and the South Crosland Urban District Council for the purpose of making main sewers for the two districts, and in 1897 that committee acquired land for the construction of outfall and purification works.

Under a provisional order of the 10th of April, 1897, a joint sewerage board was constituted which superseded the joint committee, but its duties and functions affected only main sewers made by the joint board, and sewers already made by either of the two district councils remained vested in and under the control of the council in whose district they were situated.

The defendant council being advised that the discharge of the trade effluent from Thirston Mills into their sewer was on account of its temperature and for other reasons prejudically affecting the disposal of the sewage matter and exposing them to liabilities under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, informed the plaintiffs of their intention to cut off the connection between the sewer and the drain from Thirston Mills. The plaintiffs accordingly commenced this action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from disconnecting the drain in accordance with their threat.

Byrne, J., granted an injunction, holding that effluents produced in the course of a trade or manufacture may be included among the matters discharged into a public sewer through a connection lawfully made, and that the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, s. 7, did not justify the defendants in cutting off the connection made with their sewer, even though it could be shown that the trade effluent prejudically affected the disposal of the sewage matter conveyed through the sewer.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Asquith, K.C., and Clayton, for the appellants, contended that they were under no obligation to receive into their sewers anything but domestic sewage and not trade effluents.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiffs, argued that they had a right to send their trade effluent into the sewer, and that in any event the defendants had no right to cut off the connection, but must have recourse to the ample remedies given them by the Public Health Act.

The principal cases referred to were Attorney-General v. Clerkenwell Vestry, 40 W. R. 185, [1891] 3 Ch. 527; Ogilvie v. Blything Sanitary Authority, 67 L. T. Rep. 18, 41 W. R. Dig. 153; Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council, 45 W. R. 454, [1897] 1 Q. B. 384, 625.

RIGBY, L.J., said there was some difficulty in the case owing to the vague way in which it was brought forward. There was no doubt, however, that the plaintiffs had for a considerable time discharged an effluent into the sewer, and a trade effluent as well as domestic sewage. Byrne, J., saw no reason for thinking that the liquid discharged from the drain into the sewer would prejudicially affect the disposal of the sewage. The defendants now come before us and say that they are under no obligation to receive anything into their sewers except domestic sewage, and allege that the trade effluent in question is prejudical to the disposal of their sewage. I think that under the circumstances they are not entitled to cut off the connection, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., agreed.

STIRLING, L.J., said: Whether you look at section 21 of the Public Health Act, 1875, or at section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, there is no ground for disturbing the order of the court below. If section 21 applies there is an absolute right to discharge the effluent into the sewer. If the right is qualified by section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act it seems to me that the facilities given by that Act ought not to be withdrawn unless the case falls within one of the provisoes of the section, which has not been shown to be the case here.

Appeal dismissed.

CHESSUM & SONS v. GORDON. (a.)

Practice—Judgment or order—Correction of mistake—Certificate of taxing-master—Accidental omission in bill of costs—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 28, r. 11.

A plaintiff, who had obtained judgment for a certain sum with costs, carried in his bill of costs for taxation, but one item which ought to have been included was accidentally omitted. After the taxing-master had given his certificate the mistake was discovered.

Held, that the court had power to order that the item should be referred to the taxing-master, and that his certificate should be amended.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., directing the taxation of certain costs.

The action was brought by builders against a building owner. At the trial before Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and a jury, judgment was ordered to be entered for the plaintiffs for an amount to be ascertained by a special referee with costs. The referee duly made an award, and the plaintiffs' solicitors took up the award, at the same time paying the referee's fees, which amounted to £160 11s. 8d. Formal judgment was entered for the plaintiffs for the amount fixed by the award with costs to be taxed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

So far we have not got to any conclusion as to the precise meaning of the words "profits available for dividend," but there is no difficulty in surmising what they must mean. They must mean profits which are properly applicable for payment of dividends, and when we go to clause 74 of Table A we find a provision which, so far as I know, is the only provision—there may be others, but there is this at any rate—which provides for a limitation of the profits which are applicable and can properly be applied for payment of dividends, for we find that "the directors may, before recommending any dividend"—that takes the matter quite clearly out of the profits available for dividend—set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they may think proper as a reserved fund to meet contingencies or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the works connected with the business of the company." It seems to me that one of the duties, perhaps the very first duty, they have to undertake when they formulate a statement of account of the profits for the period they are dealing with is to determine what they shall set apart for a reserve fund, and when they have set it apart they must invest and settle it, and from that moment when they have set apart the reserve fund it is no longer a fund of profit available for dividend.

Then clause 5 does not in any way deal with what they set apart as a reserve fund. They have power to do it; as prudent men they ought to do it, to meet any contingencies. They ought to apply their minds to determine whether or not it shall be done, whether a reserve fund shall or shall not be created, and from that moment clause 5 of the memorandum, and articles 11 and 12 of the special articles of the company, have nothing whatever to do with the matter. They must divide the sum which remains after deducting the reserve fund. As I said before, there may be some other things to be done first—I have not had my attention called to anything, but there may be—but if there are, then the other funds must be set apart too, and it is only when you have set apart these that you can begin to estimate, and ultimately set apart in the form of dividends any profits which are available for a dividend.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not think this is an easy case. I think, moreover, that it is extremely probable that the question which has been raised upon this particular memorandum of association and these particular articles is one which may affect a great many companies. Of course one knows that the forms which are used are in common use. But although I think the case a difficult one, and the point a difficult one, I agree that it is not necessary to take time to consider it, because these cases probably are decided better freshly after hearing the arguments than after deferred consideration.

The question which we really have to decide is a question of the construction of clause 5 in the memorandum of association. It is really a question what is the meaning of the words "the profits from time to time available for dividend." In considering that question both sides have invited us to treat clause 5 of the memorandum as an ambiguous clause, and to construe it in the light of the articles, and I propose therefore to do so. I think that the words "profits from time to time available for the dividend" in clause 5 mean the net profits after deducting all proper appropriations by the directors. I said in the course of the argument that I did not think that it could mean the net profit balance as shown by the profit and loss account. I do not think that anybody contended that it did mean that. If it does not mean that, it seems to me that there is no resting-place between that and saying that it is the net profit after deducting all sums properly appropriated by the directors before they arrive at the sum out of which the dividends are to be paid. If they had the power and they chose to appropriate a portion of the profit balance, as shown by the profit and loss account, to the replacement of so much of the capital as had been expended for revenue purposes, nobody denies that they could do that, and, on the other hand, nobody says that there is an obligation on them to do that. It is a matter within their discretion so to appropriate the profit balance. They might, if they chose, appropriate the whole profit balance without making any such appropriation for the purpose of replacement of capital. That being so, I think that this question arises, whether this appropriation of part of the profit balance to the formation of a reserve fund to meet contingencies is a proper appropriation by the dirictors, and I think it is a proper appropriation by the directors.

Everyone seems agreed that it is a proper appropriation by the directors if article 74 of Table A is an article which is in force. The articles here begin by saying "In so far as these articles do not exclude or modify the regulations contained in the table marked A in the first schedule to the Companies Act, 1862, the last-mentioned regulations shall, so far as the same are applicable, be deemed to be the regulations of the company." Then one finds later on in clause 34 that articles 52, 53 and 54 of Table A shall not apply. That being so, it is plain that article 74 is not expressly excluded, and it only can be excluded because of its inconsistency with something that one finds expressly provided in the memorandum of association or the articles. I see nothing in the memorandum or the articles to exclude article 74. On the contrary, if I had to construe clause 5 of the memorandum without the assistance of the contemporaneous articles I should not say that there was anything in clause 5 inconsistent with the power of the directors to set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they thought proper as a reserve fund. But if one must turn to the articles to construe the memorandum—a thing which I always do with very great hesitation—I think that article 74 in this case is not excluded, and if it is not excluded and is to be treated as written into the special articles, and one turns to those articles to construe the clause, a fortiori there is nothing in clause 5 to prevent the directors setting aside out of the profits of the company such a sum as they think proper as a reserve fund; because I think that the word "profits" in the 5th clause means profits after deducting all sums properly appropriated by the directors out of the profit balance shown in the profit and loss account.

I wish to say that I am always sorry if one has to come to a conclusion which may possibly be a conclusion which business people would not arrive at, and I confess that I had some doubt as to whether business people might not read "profits" in clause 5 of the memorandum of association in a different way from that which I am reading it. When I look at the report of the directors themselves at the very moment they are dealing with this subject-matter, the wording of the report looks as though they do not use that word "profit" in the way I am taking it. Although they do not use the word "profit" they do say "Out of the sum available—viz., £13,225 11s. 4d., it is recommended that the dividend be declared at the rate," &c. It rather looks as though they themselves, the directors, who were making this reserve fund, thought that the profits available for dividend were the whole sum of £13,225 11s. 4d., but whatever they may have thought, it is the province of the court to determine what that expression means, and according to my view it does not mean the £13,225, but it does mean that sum less so much of it as the directors have, within their powers, properly set aside as the reserve fund to meet future profits.

ROMER, L.J.—The point involved is, I think, a somewhat difficult one, but it has been very well argued on both sides, and I cannot say that I have had much difficulty myself in coming to a conclusion upon it. In particular I must say that I think the arguments on behalf of the respondent could not have been better put than they were by Mr. Nepean. As we are differing from my brother Kekewich I think it right to state my reasons in my own language.

I think that the words "available for dividend" in the memorandum of association following the word "profits" are intended in some shape or form to modify the word "profits," and I think the phrase "profits from time to time available for dividend" in the memorandum means profits which, after making all proper deductions, remain for the purpose of paying dividends. One may arrive at the point of view I am taking by consideration of another point. What is the period of time you have to consider when you have to ascertain within the memorandum of association what are the profits available for dividend? I think it is the time after you have already properly ascertained the profits which are applicable for the payment of dividend and not any prior time. Then is there any difficulty in the way of that construction by reason of the wording of articles 11 and 12? I cannot see that there is at all. In my view the word "profits" in articles 11 and 12 must be taken to mean the same profits as are referred to in the memorandum of association—that is to say, "profits available for dividend," just as much as if those words had been repeated in those articles. This is borne out by the fact that in dealing with articles 11 and 12 all the payments there mentioned are described as payments of dividends.

Then with regard to the articles of Table A undoubtedly this is clear, that articles 72, 73, and 74 are not expressly excluded, and it is to be borne in mind that when any articles of Table A are to be expressly excluded you find in these articles of association those articles specified, and I think it is a fair deduction from that, that those who prepared the memorandum and articles of association must have had articles 72, 73, and 74 in their minds, and did not think it necessary to expressly exclude them. So in my opinion certainly those articles ought to be considered to be included unless there is some grave reason why you should exclude them. I am bound to say that I see no reason why you should exclude them at all; on the other hand, I do see great difficulty in the way of holding that you should exclude them, and especially article 74. In my opinion article 74 of Table A is included in these articles of association.

There is only, however, one further point on which I think it right to say a word. With regard to article 74, as at present advised, I do think that that article 74 is modified to a certain extent—that is to say, I do not think that article 74 could be used for the purpose of creating a reserve to be applied in equalizing dividends. That is my present opinion, though I need not express any concluded opinion upon it, because it is not before me, but I point that out, as otherwise it might be held that article 74 might be worked for the purpose of creating an injustice as between the owners of the founders' shares and the owners of the ordinary shares. For these reasons I agree that the appeal ought to succeed.

The portion printed elsewhere contained matter pirated from the plaintiffs' copyright. The book was published and sold by B. A. was ignorant of the piracy till notified of the same by the plaintiffs.

Held, that there was no partnership between A. and B., and that A. had not caused the printing of the pirated portion of the book within the meaning of the statute; but that, inasmuch as A. had not altered the statement "Printed by A." to suit the facts, A. was not entitled to costs.

In this case a company known as "Kelly's Directories (Limited)" sought to restrain the defendants Gavin and Lloyd's, their managers, servants, printers, publishers, and agents, from printing, publishing, selling, and delivering, and otherwise disposing of any copy of a book called Lloyd's Merchants' and Shippers' Diary for 1900, which the plaintiffs contended contained a piracy of a book of which the copyright belonged to the plaintiffs.

The facts were shortly as follows: Gavin conceived the idea of bringing out the book in question, and approached Lloyd's with a view to obtaining the benefit of Lloyd's name in the publication thereof. This resulted in an agreement which was embodied in a letter signed by Gavin of the 25th of May, 1899, of which the terms were as follows: "In reply to your favour of the 17th respecting the printing and publication of a work to be called Lloyd's Diary of Merchant Shippers, I agree to the following—First, for the use of Lloyd's name I will pay the committee" [of Lloyds'] "a subsidy of £100 a year, 5 per cent. upon all moneys received from advertisements appearing in the diary, and 5 per cent. upon all moneys which accrue to me," &c. "I will pay the committee for printing the diary 25 per cent. of the actual cost of printing and machining," &c.

By the third clause Gavin guaranteed that the total minimum profit to the committee should not be less than £200 a year, and it was understood that when the profits reached £500 Gavin was to be free from any payment in such year of the £100 subsidy.

By the seventh clause "The information in Lloyd's Diary for Merchant Shippers should be the same as is inserted in Lloyds' Shipping Diary, with the exception that the international parts of the directory shall not be included in the Merchant Shippers' Diary, but in the event of any new literary features being introduced for the purpose of rendering the work more attractive to merchants, they shall not add to the clerical labour involved in the compilation of the Shipping Diary and shall be submitted to you" [Lloyd's] "for approval, such approval it is understood, however, is not to be unreasonably withheld."

Then by clause 8 it was provided that "the same clerical labour shall still be performed by Lloyd's for the Merchant Shippers' Diary as is now performed for Lloyd's Shipping Diary." Then there was an undertaking as to the binding. By clause 10 Lloyd's were to be entitled to refuse the insertion of any advertisements which might be of an objectionable kind, but beyond this all matters relating to the form and character of advertisements, reading matter, sale and price of the work should be decided by Gavin.

By clause 12 Gavin was to pay all expenses incidental to the production of the Merchant Shippers' Diary, such as paper, binding, postages, &c.

The agreement was to continue for fourteen years, unless after two years it was found that the Merchant Shippers' Diary did not pay, in which case Gavin was to have the right to discontinue the publication of the same.

The preparation for bringing out the book went on, and certain lists were prepared by Gavin and sent abroad. For the purposes of the book Gavin wrote to the secretary of Lloyd's: "I send you herewith the copy of the letter I would suggest your writing to the agents" [Lloyd's agents abroad]. "If you will send me over the paper I will have it manifolded and send it back for you to sign." The enclosure as originally drawn purported to show an intention on the part of the committee of Lloyd's to publish this book, and put the committee forward in fact as being the intended publishers and the persons to give the advertisements. But the letter was altered and ran as follows: "It is the intention of the committee to sanction the publication of a diary for 1900 intended to circulate amongst merchant shippers. The information which you have been good enough to supply in connection with the Shipping Diary has been, I understand, greatly appreciated by shipping firms in this country, and I would deem it a favour if you would kindly supply me for the new diary the information in the enclosed form." Ultimately it was published, and as manifolded was signed on behalf of Lloyd's, and was used to obtain from Lloyd's agents abroad the information required by Gavin for getting on with his book. Gavin sent out certain lists, and it was clearly shown to the satisfaction of the judge that whatever lists were supplied abroad, or however Gavin got the information for the particular portion of the book in question, there had been a clear case of copying from the plaintiff's book.

Matters went on and at a certain point it became apparently impossible for Lloyd's to do the printing of the whole book so as to get it issued at the proper time. They printed up to p. 83, but no more, except a certain portion of the advertisements at the end of the book. An agreement was then come to varying the terms of the original agreement—viz., that at Gavin's request he was to be at liberty to get such portion of the book as could not be printed by Lloyd's printed elsewhere. Gavin had the rest of the book, including the portion complained of, printed elsewhere, and the portions so printed were sent to the binders and bound up with the portion printed by Lloyd's. The front page, which was printed by Lloyd's before the new arrangement last referred to had been come to, or contemplated, contained the full title of the book and the words "Printed at Lloyd's, Royal Exchange, London."

The question before the court was whether under the circumstances Lloyd's had made themselves liable under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 15, which provides that "if any person shall in any part of the British Dominions after the passing of this Act print or cause to be printed, either for sale or exportation, any book in which there shall be subsisting copyright without the consent in writing of the proprietor thereof, or shall import for sale or hire any such book so having been unlawfully printed from parts beyond the sea, or knowing such book to have been so unlawfully printed or imported shall sell, publish, or expose to sale or hire, or cause to be sold, published, or exposed to sale or hire, or shall have in his possession for sale or hire any such book so unlawfully printed or imported" then certain penalties are imposed. It was not suggested that Lloyd's knew that the book had been unlawfully printed or that they were aware of the piracy committed by Gavin.

Levitt, K.C., and E. Ford, for the plaintiffs.—Having regard to the agreement existing between Lloyd's and Gavin and to the fact that the former had supplied the means of assisting Gavin to obtain the information required for the book through their agents abroad, and that the title-page contained the statement "Printed at Lloyd's," Lloyd's must be held to have caused the printing of the portion of the book complained of within the meaning of the Act. The relationship between Lloyd's and Gavin was in the nature of a partnership.

T. E. Scrutton and F. D. Mackinnon, for Lloyd's.—There are no cases exactly in point. The statute is perfectly clear. The statement on the title-page "Printed at Lloyd's" does not act by way of estoppel against Lloyd's.

They referred to Russell v. Briant, 8 C. B. 837, and Lyon v. Knowles, 11 W. R. 266, 3 B. & S. 556, as being decisions on similar words in a similar statute, 3 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2.

The defendant Gavin did not appear.

BYRNE, J.—It has been proved to my satisfaction as against the defendant Gavin, and is not disputed by the defendants Lloyd's, that as to a portion of this work there has been a clear case of copying and infringement of copyright. The real point as between the plaintiffs and Lloyd's is whether they are responsible in the circumstances for the pirated portion of the work. There are, as far as I know, no cases decided under this particular section, but there are authorities that have been decided under a section having somewhat similar words in another Act. The first case cited was Russell v. Briant. [His lordship then reviewed the case, and continued:] The second case referred to was Lyon v. Knowles. [His lordship proceeded to review the case, and continued:] Now, of course these are only illustrations of what may be considered as causing a representation within the other Act, but they do help to this extent, that in reference to representation the court came to the conclusion that the meaning of causing to do the act complained of meant either by the person himself or his agent. Now what I have got to do here is to see whether, the whole of the order for the printing which is complained of having been given by Gavin with the sanction of Lloyd's—it is true by agreement with Lloyd's—I can fairly regard the printer who actually did the work as being an agent of Lloyd's for the purpose of printing the book. First of all there was no partnership between Gavin and Lloyd's. It is true that there was an agreement between them for the printing and publication of a certain work. It is true that they were to receive profits by reason of the publication of the work contemplated. It is true that they were to allow the use of their name as a sort of authority for the book—that is to say, they allowed it to be stated that it was published under their supervision, and they were content to allow it to go forth to the world with the title-page stating that it was printed by Lloyd's, of the Royal Exchange, London. I have said no partnership was constituted by the agreement, and I do not think, having given it careful consideration, that I should be justified in holding that the printing by a third party, who was not a party to the agreement, that having been done in consequence of orders given by Gavin and paid for by Gavin, I do not think I should be justified in saying that that was something done by an agent of Lloyd's. I think that by allowing their name to appear on the title-page, Lloyd's have not made themselves liable as actual printers of this book. But I am bound to say, having regard to the whole of the facts, that I do not think I ought to give them any costs of the action. I think the plaintiffs are entitled in this case to an injunction against Gavin with costs, but are not entitled to costs as against Lloyd's.

STANFORD v. ROBERTS. (a.)

Settled land—Building—Existing occupation—Additions or alterations—Necessary or proper—Present intention for future letting—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13 (ii.).

An alteration in a building may be made "to enable the same to be let" within section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, even although the building is occupied under existing tenancies, if the alterations are made with the present intention of enabling the building to be let at some future time.

Such an alteration is necessary or proper if it is such as a prudent man absolutely entitled would make in his own interests.

Adjourned summons.

This summons was taken out for obtaining the sanction of the court to the application of certain capital moneys standing in court to the credit of the settled estate being applied in making alterations in a building part of the estate for the purpose of preventing dry rot.

In May, 1900, the trustees of the Stanford estate purchased the building in question, Copthall House, Copthall-avenue, in London, under an order of the court.

The house was a large one containing some 150 rooms. These were let to stockbrokers and stockjobbers and others, for offices.

This house was clearly, his lordship said, purchased, not for the residence of the beneficiaries, but as an investment by the letting of the rooms.

In the basement there were thirty-three rooms, let to some seventeen tenants. The floors of the basement were constructed of wooden boards resting upon sleeper joists over a bed of concrete, and were a little below the external area. The consequence was that there was no ventilation through the joists and nearly all the floors became more or less affected with dry rot.

Builders had been employed in the case of four of the rooms to replace the floors with concrete and wooden blocks upon the concrete.

According to the evidence of the surveyor the proper course to adopt was to take up the floors and substitute concrete and wooden blocks over the whole of the basement, and that that was the only radical and satisfactory cure for the conditions obtaining in the building. If the then floors were patched up, the dry rot was certain to return, and there was considerable risk of its spreading throughout the building. If new floors were provided in the above manner there would be a permanent improvement. The presence of dry rot caused great inconvenience and annoyance to tenants, and rendered it impossible to relet the rooms at a fair rent. The sum of £59 odd had been properly expended upon the four rooms already altered, and it would require £400 more to complete the basement.

There were capital moneys belonging to the estate in court, and the application was by the plaintiff, who was the tenant for life, that the sum of £459 odd might be authorized to be raised thereout for the above purposes.

Wace, for the plaintiff.—The proposed repairs are additions or alterations, reasonably necessary and proper for enabling the house to be let, and such as the court can allow under section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890: In re De Teissier's Settled Estates, 41 W. R. 184, [1893] 1 Ch. 153; In re Lord Gerard's Settled Estates, [1893] 3 Ch. 252.

He also referred to In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 219, [1894] 1 Ch. 485.

S. O. Buckmaster, for infant tenant-in-tail, defendant.—These are not repairs within the section. The section only allows structural alterations, and not such as these, which are only for the purpose of enabling a higher rent to be obtained by the tenant for life. Moreover, these alterations are not "to enable the house to be let," as it is already let. The decisions in In re De Teissier's Settled Estates and in In re Lord Gerard's Settled Estates, which are relied on to show that contemplated letting in the future is sufficient, turned upon the fact that the tenants for life wanted the buildings for their own occupation.

E. F. Ball, for the trustees.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question is one of importance having regard to the number of applications under this section. I think these repairs are additions to or alterations of the building within the section. I think they are substantial and structural alterations. I also think that they are necessary or proper. The test is whether they are such as an absolute owner of the property, if he were a prudent and a reasonable man, would do in his own interests. I think they are. The next question is, are they made to enable the building to be let? Now substantially all the rooms are let. Consequently these alterations are not for the purpose of enabling the house to be let immediately. But is that necessary? In In re De Teissier, 41 W. R., at p. 185, [1893] 1 Ch., at p. 159, Chitty, J., says, with regard to repairs coming within this sub-section 13 (ii.): "In my opinion there must be a present intention to let, if not an immediate prospect of letting, before any application under this sub-section can be properly made." This view is approved of by each of the Lords Justices in In re Lord Gerard's Settled Estates. In my judgment a present intention to let the building, either at the present, or at some future time, is sufficient to satisfy the section. I am far from saying that whenever a tenant for life comes to the court and says that he wants alterations to be made, to enable the house to be let in the future, they should be authorized. The jurisdiction is discretionary, and must be exercised having regard to all the circumstances of the particular case. There will be a reference to chambers to ascertain the proper amount to be allowed for these repairs.

Solicitor — Costs — Payment on account — Taxation— Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 41.

The plaintiff had paid the amount of an account sent in by his solicitor, which account was not, however, a "bill of costs" inasmuch as it did not set out the particular items charged. More than twelve months after such payment, the plaintiff took out a summons for delivery and taxation of the solicitor's bill of costs. No bill of costs had been delivered at the date of the hearing of the summons.

Held, that the payment on account could not in the circumstances be made referable to the bill of costs which would be delivered after the hearing of the application; and that the plaintiff was entitled to the common form order for delivery and taxation, notwithstanding the payment made upwards of twelve months before the issue of the summons.

Summons for delivery and taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs.

The plaintiff employed the defendant as his solicitor. From time to time in 1898 the plaintiff paid certain sums on account.

In January, 1899, on an account being sent in by the defendant, the plaintiff paid the balance and received a receipt for the same. The account, however, did not show the particular items charged, and in consequence was not sufficient as a "bill of costs."

The summons was issued on the 22nd of January, 1901. No bill of costs was sent in previous to the hearing of the application.

By the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 41, the payment of a bill of costs shall not preclude the court from referring such bill for taxation "provided the application for such reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment."

Mark Romer (Younger, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff.

Hughes, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendant.—The court will not order taxation as well as delivery of a bill of costs. The object of ordering the delivery of a bill is to see whether there are such special circumstances as would cause it to be taxed: Duffett v. McEvoy, 10 App. Cas. 300, 33 W. R. Dig. 238. If a bill is delivered after a payment on account, the court will hold the payment so made to be referable to the bill subsequently delivered: Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, [1892] 2 Ch. 343, followed in In re Thompson, 42 W. R. 462, [1894] 1 Q. B. 462. Taxation, therefore, will not be ordered as the payment was made upwards of twelve months before the issue of the summons.

Mark Romer, in reply.—In Hitchcock v. Stretton previous payments were held referable to a bill delivered after the issue of the summons. That decision was commented on by the Court of Appeal in In re Baylis, 44 W. R. 533, [1896] 2 Ch. 107; and the principle will not be extended. Here there has been no delivery of a bill either before or after the issue of the summons.

JOYCE, J.—No bill of costs has been delivered either before or after the issue of the summons. I find no case in which a payment on account has been made referable to the bill when none has been delivered at the date of the application to the court. There must be the common order for the delivery and taxation of a bill of costs.

LAMBERT v. MAYOR, &c., OF LOWESTOFT. (a.)

Local government—Highway—Defect in sewer causing hole under surface of road—Subsidence—Nuisance— Highway authority—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 19.

In an action against an urban sanitary authority for damages for injury sustained by a horse while passing along a highway, owing to one of its feet going through the crust of the road into a hole underneath, it was proved that this hole was caused by a defect in a mortar joint in a sewer running under the highway, which defect was caused by rats working through the mortar. The sewer had been constructed by a private body, and had been taken over by the defendants many years before the accident. Under the weight of the horse the crown of the road gave in, thereby causing the injury. Nothing had occurred to give the defendants warning that there was anything wrong with the sewer, and there was no evidence of negligence on their part.

Held, that, in the absence of negligence on the part of the defendants, the action was not maintainable. The responsibility of the defendants to maintain the sewer rested upon the Public Health Act, 1875, and no action would lie for injury caused by the execution of that statutory duty unless it had been negligently performed.

Further consideration.

This was an action to recover damages from a local authority, and was tried at Norwich by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., when he held that there was no evidence of negligence, and dismissed the jury and reserved for further consideration the question whether the action could be maintained in the absence of negligence.

The plaintiff carried on business in Norwich, and the defendants were, under the Public Health Act, 1875, the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Lowestoft.

The plaintiff brought his action to recover damages for injuries sustained by a horse while passing along a road in the said borough, owing to one of the horse's feet going through the crust of the road into a hole underneath. Under the road was an old brick sewer, constructed about 1863.

The road was taken over by the defendants in 1886, when it was made up and manholes placed at certain points communicating with the sewer, and new gully pits constructed, which were connected with the existing drains, for surface water.

The sewer was at a depth of four or five feet, and the drains from the gully to the sewer were between eight and nine feet in length.

It was proved that the junction of one of the drains with the sewer had been made of mortar, and that at some time rats had worked through the mortar of the joint and had subsequently made a hole of about two feet in diameter underneath the surface of the road.

Under the weight of the plaintiff's horse the crown of the road gave in and the horse was injured.

There was no evidence that the defendants were aware of the defect in the sewer.

Witt, K.C. (E. E. Wild with him), for the plaintiff.—The question here is whether the defendants are liable for damages by reason of the fact that the drain was in such a condition that the road became excavated and in consequence subsided. The defendants are the authority responsible for the maintenance of the sewers and are therefore liable, apart from negligence, if owing to a defect in a sewer a hole is caused under the surface of the road and the surface subsides thereby causing injury to a horse on the road. This sewer was taken over by and became vested in the defendants, it became defective and caused the existence of a nuisance, and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover: Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson, 4 App. Cas. 256, 27 W. R. Dig. 139: see also the remarks of Lord Herschell in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke, [1895] App. Cas. 433, at p. 441, 43 W. R. Dig. 74.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment: In this case the plaintiff brought an action against the Mayor and Corporation of Lowestoft to recover damages for injuries sustained by a horse while passing along Cambridge-road, Lowestoft, owing to the horse's foot going through the crust of the road into a hole underneath. Running along the middle of that road was an old brick sewer constructed about the year 1863 by the Ipswich Building Society. The road was taken over by the defendants in the year 1886, when it was made up and manholes placed at certain points communicating with the sewer, and the old gully pits replaced by new and larger ones which were connected with the existing six-inch drains which had been put in to take surface drainage when the sewer was originally constructed. The sewer was at a depth of some four or five feet and the length of the six-inch drain from the gully pit to the sewer was between eight and nine feet. It was proved before me, and I find as a fact, that the junction of the six-inch drain with the sewer had been made in mortar, and that at some time rats had eaten or worked through the mortar of the joint and had subsequently made a hole of about two feet in diameter underneath the surface of the road. The crown of the road had given in under the weight of the horse, thereby causing the injury. After the accident the road was repaired by the defendants and the joint made good in cement. It was proved before me, and I find as a fact, that it was the common practice in the year 1863, and for some years afterwards, for sewers to be made in the way in which this sewer was constructed—namely, with mortar joints for the connecting drains. Nothing had occurred to give the defendants warning that there was anything wrong with the sewer and drains or with the road. A previous subsidence in the road, which was suggested as having been brought to the notice of the defendants some years before the accident, was proved at the trial to be in no way connected with, and I find that it was not connected with, either the sewer or the connecting drains.

I held at the trial, and still hold, that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence on the part of the defendants which caused or contributed to the accident. I therefore discharged the jury, the counsel on both sides agreeing that the court, or if necessary, the Court of Appeal, should have the power to draw any inferences of fact necessary to decide the case.

Upon further consideration before me counsel for the plaintiff did not rely upon negligence, nor was any argument addressed to me to show that I was wrong in holding that there was no evidence of negligence to go the jury, but the plaintiff sought to recover on the ground that the existence of a hole under the road caused by a defect in the sewer constituted a nuisance, and that the defendants, as the authority responsible for the maintenance of the sewers, were liable apart from negligence.

In my opinion this contention cannot be successfully maintained. The responsibility of the defendants to maintain the sewers rests upon sections 13, 15, and 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875. In fulfilling those duties they are acting under statutory authority, and it is now clearly established that under ordinary circumstances no action lies for injury occasioned by the execution of statutory duty unless it has been negligently performed: Geddes v. Proprietors of Bann Reservoir, 3 App. Cas. 430, at p. 455, 26 W. R. Dig. 259; Bateman v. Poplar Board of Works, 36 W. R. 501, 37 Ch. D. 272; Thompson v. Mayor of Brighton, 42 W. R. 161, [1894] 1 Q. B. 332, at p. 341; Stretton's Derby Brewery Co. v. Mayor of Derby, 42 W. R. 583, [1894] 1 Ch. D. 431, and many other cases. It was, however, argued that if the condition of the sewer which had been taken over by and vested in the defendants did in fact cause a nuisance, the plaintiff could recover apart from negligence. In support of this view the case of the Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson, 4 App. Cas. 256, 27 W. R. Dig. 139, and particularly the language of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke, [1895] A. C., at p. 441, 43 W. R. Dig. 74, explaining that case, was relied upon.

I am clearly of opinion that neither of these cases are sufficient to support the argument of the plaintiff. In the Bathurst case not only might the plaintiff have recovered upon the ground of negligence but, as pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in the Sydney case, the defective drain had caused the road to become dangerous, and no steps had been taken by the defendants in that case to prevent accidents although they were well aware of the condition of the road. Their lordships in the Bathurst case found that the appellants had caused a nuisance in the highway by the construction of the drain, by their neglect to repair it, and by leaving a dangerous hole open and unfenced. In my opinion the expressions of the Lord Chancellor at p. 441, upon which great reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff, must be construed with reference to the subject-matter under discussion, and were not intended to lay down a general rule that, simply because an accident has occurred in a road due to a latent defect in a sewer, the defendants, whose duty it is to maintain the sewer, are liable, apart from negligence. I find that in this case there was nothing to warn the defendants that there was anything wrong with the sewer, nor could they by the exercise of any reasonable care have discovered the existence of the hole under the road until the accident happened. I therefore dismiss the action and give judgment for the defendants with costs.

Mine—Quarry—Stone or "other minerals"—Sand and gravel—Quarries Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 47), s. 1 —Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), ss. 11, 28*—Regulation of Railways Act,* 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 78), s. 6.

By section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894, it is provided that "This Act shall apply to every place (not being a mine) in which persons work in getting slate, stone, coprolites, or other minerals, and any part of which is more than twenty feet deep, and every such place is in this Act referred to as a quarry under this Act."

Held, that gravel and sand are minerals within the meaning of this section.

Held, also, that the getting of sand and gravel by a railway company for their own use as ballast, out of land belonging to them, is not an act done "in the course of working the railway," within the meaning of section 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1871.

Special case.

This was a case stated by the justices of the peace for the county of Norfolk for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court.

The informations, three in number, alleged that the respondents, being the owners of a certain quarry, had committed breaches of sections 11 and 28 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, as applied by the Quarries Act, 1894, in failing on certain dates to cause an abstract of the said Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act with the name and address of the inspector of the district and the name of the owner or agent appended thereto to be posted up in legible characters in some conspicuous place at or near the said quarry where it might be conveniently read by the persons employed; and further, that they were guilty of an offence against the said Act in failing to send, within twenty-four hours, notice in writing to the inspector of the district of an accident and of the loss of life occasioned thereby which occurred at the said quarry.

The following facts were proved or admitted before the justices:

The respondents were the lessees, for the purpose of taking ballast, of a certain place in the parish of Corpusty, in the county of Norfolk, called the "Corpusty Ballast Siding," by the side of their line of railway and running back 150 yards from the main line, and by their workmen, from time to time, got therefrom gravel and sand which was used by the respondents for the maintenance and repair of their line, and was only used for such maintenance and repair.

The place was more than 20 feet deep with a slope of 40 to 50 feet in length in its deepest part and was within the limits of deviation shown on the deposited plans of the railway.

No abstract of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, was posted up at or near the said "Corpusty Ballast Siding" on either of the dates mentioned in the said informations.

On the 15th of March, 1900, a fatal accident occurred to one of the defendants' workmen who was engaged in taking gravel or sand from the said place. Such accident was caused by the bulging out of a quantity of sand and gravel from the sloping face of the said ballast siding.

No notice of such fatal accident was given to the informant, the inspector of the district, as required by section 2 of the said Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act.

It was stated by the respondent's solicitor, and the statement was not challenged by the appellant, that notice of the accident was given to the Board of Trade.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that gravel and sand were included within the term "other minerals" in section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894, and that a place where such substances were got was within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Quarries Act, 1894. For the respondents it was contended that such substances were not minerals within the meaning of the said section, and were not included in the term "other minerals," as they were not ejusdem generis with "slate," "stone," or "coprolites," which are therein specifically mentioned.

It was also contended by the respondents that taking gravel and sand from the said "Corpusty Ballast Siding," whenever the same might be required for the maintenance or repair of the railway, was not working within the meaning of section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894, on the ground that (1) the respondents did not take the said gravel and sand for the purpose of making profit out of the same; and (2) that the said gravel and sand were not taken systematically, but only whenever the same were wanted for the maintenance and repair of the said railway.

It was further contended for the respondents that as the gravel or sand was taken for railway repairs or maintenance, and as the said "Corpusty Ballast Siding" was within the limits of the land authorized to be taken for the use of the railway it was not subject to the provisions of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, but was only subject to the general railway Acts, which require notice of accidents to be given to the Board of Trade.

The justices determined "that the place was used by persons" working habitually whenever ballast was wanted; that "the regulations had not been posted nor notice of the" accident given; that the things taken out were gravel and sand, and that they were not minerals within the meaning of section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894, and on this ground they dismissed the informations, giving no determination as to whether the working was otherwise "a place within the meaning of the Act."

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the justices ought to have convicted the respondents.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Sutton, for the appellants. —Gravel and sand are minerals within the meaning of section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894, so also in point of fact are all things which are under the surface of the soil and which may be quarried. Both gravel and sand are only small particles of stone. The expression "other minerals" in section 1 is used in the widest possible meaning. In the case of Midland Railway Co. v. Checkley, 15 W. R. 671, L. R. 4 Eq. 19, Lord Romilly, M.R., at p. 25, says: "Stone is, in my opinion, clearly a mineral, and in fact everything except the mere surface, which is used for agricultural purposes; anything beyond that which is useful for any purpose whatever, whether it is gravel, marble, fire-clay, or the like, comes within the word mineral, when there is a reservation of the mines and minerals from a grant of land; every species of stone, whether marble, limestone, or ironstone, comes, in my opinion, within the same category." In Hex v. Gill, 20 W. R. 957, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 699, Mellish, L.J., at p. 712, says: "The result of the authorities . . . appears to be this: that a reservation of 'minerals' includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit. . . ." See also the judgment of Lord Herschell in the case of Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, 37 W. R. 627, 13 App. Cas. 657, at pp. 682-3. Hex v. Gill was approved of and followed in the case of Earl of Jersey v. Guardians, &c., of Neath Union, 37 W. R. 388, 22 Q. B. D. 555; Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 559, expressing his opinion that the definition of minerals by Mellish, L.J., in that case was correct. The object of the Act in this case should be looked at, which was that people in the act of working quarries should be protected from some substance, whether gravel or stone or slate, falling upon them without notice being given to the proper authority. The magistrates were wrong in their decision and there ought to have been a conviction.

McCall, Q.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the respondents.—The decision of the magistrates was right. The finding is a finding of fact which there was evidence to support. The meaning to be attributed to the words "mines and minerals" depends in each particular case upon the facts of the case. If, in the present case, those words had been meant to be used in the wide sense, the Legislature would have said so. It was never intended that every sand-pit was to be a quarry under this Act, and the present case does not come within the words or the intention of the Act. This is in no sense a stone mine. As regards the protection of the workmen, this case is amply provided for by section 6 of the Railway Regulations Act, 1871, under which notice of any accident accompanied by personal injury or loss of life must be given to the Board of Trade—which notice was given in this case. It could never have been intended that two notices should be served, one on the Board of Trade and the other on the Home Office. The getting of the sand in this case was a "working" of the railway within the Railway Regulations Act, 1871.

KENNEDY, J.—In my opinion our judgment ought to be for the Crown. It seems to me that every requisite has been proved to bring the case within the Quarries Act, and that the judgment which we are asked to give is upon a question of law.

The place in question is a place from which gravel or sand is taken for the railway company by workmen as they want it. It is not suggested that it is a place which in its character in respect of size or otherwise is not within the purview of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Quarries Act, 1894. The object of those Acts is plain—namely, to afford protection and also to ensure investigation for the benefit of workmen who are working in certain places where there are special dangers. The regulations of the former Act are to apply by section 2 of the latter Act to quarries, and, while this Act does not define a quarry, section 1 provides that it "shall apply to every place (not being a mine) in which persons work in getting slate, stone, coprolites, or other minerals, and any part of which is more than twenty feet deep, and every such place is in this Act referred to as a quarry under this Act."

Now, that the word "minerals" in an Act of Parliament, or in a legal document, primâ facie includes such things as sand and gravel is, I think, clearly settled, and I see nothing in the Act or in this case which should narrow that which would be, primâ facie, the full and wide meaning of the term "minerals."

In this case we have workmen employed in a place, some part of which is more than twenty feet deep, and in which the things that were being gotten were minerals. Under the circumstances it appears to me that the requisites of the Act have been satisfied. The magistrates, apparently, have decided, on the ground that the things that were being gotten—namely, sand and gravel—were not minerals within section 1 of the Quarries Act, 1894. In my opinion they were wrong.

Then it was suggested, by counsel for the respondents, that it ought to be held that the place, and the case of accidents happening there, are governed by section 6 of the Railways Regulations Act, 1871, and that this place was a place in which men were employed in the working of the railway, and, therefore, that the Acts previously referred to do not apply; and that, if in the course of working this railway an accident happens it ought to lead merely to notice being given under that section. In my opinion this was not an accident in the course of working the railway within the meaning of section 6 of the Act of 1871. Further, I think that the respondents, whether or not it be their duty under the aforesaid section 6 to give notice of an accident happening in this quarry, which is formed and has come into being in the construction of a railway siding, are certainly bound by the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Quarries Act, 1894, to give the notices thereby required. Therefore in my opinion the case ought to be decided in favour of the appellants, and the matter ought to go back to the magistrates.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question really to be determined is whether gravel and sand can be taken to be included in the word "minerals" as used in this statute. Now it is perfectly clear, from the cases already cited, that "minerals" is a word with a meaning which is very indeterminate. Sometimes, in statutes, it has a very restricted meaning, sometimes it has a very wide meaning, and, in some cases, it has been held to include gravel. Now in order to find whether the expression is used in its wide or narrow sense, I think we must do what Lord Herschell, in his judgment in Glasgow v. Farie, said ought to be done—namely, that the object of the Legislature should be looked at. It is perfectly plain that the object of the Legislature was to prevent people being injured by stone and such-like things falling upon them, and that object would not be obtained if a number of stones of such small size as to be properly denominated gravel did not come within the provisions of the Act. Further, it was stated that the present case is provided for by section 6 of the Railways Regulations Act, 1871. I think the distinction pointed out by the Solicitor-General—namely, that that Act applies to something which takes place in the working of a railway, is a good one, and I am inclined to think that that statute does not cover this case. It seems to me that the object of the Legislature really was to give to people working in places which are not metalliferous mines the same protection which they had given to people working in places properly called metalliferous mines. Otherwise we should have to hold that the object of the Legislature was to protect people upon whom slates, or stones, or coprolites, or any other mineral which was something like a slate, or stone, or coprolite, might fall, but that it did not, and intentionally did not, profess to protect anybody who might have gravel falling upon him. I cannot think that that was their intention. My opinion is that the Act intended to protect all those people who in working in the earth at a depth of more than twenty feet had not been protected by the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, and that with that object it uses this word "minerals," and that, therefore, the widest intention must be given to such word, and not the narrowest, and if that is so there is authority for saying that "minerals" may mean gravel, and in this case I think it does.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HAWKINS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Policy of life insurance—Settled property—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 50), ss. 1, 2, 3.

A. was tenant for life of certain estates, and B., his son, was tenant in tail in remainder. A. had effected several mortgages on his life interest to secure payment of certain debts, and he had also effected several policies on his life by way of further security. A family arrangement was entered into, under which B. concurred in the execution of a disentailing deed, and a further deed of resettlement was executed by A., B., and certain trustees. Under the said arrangement a sum of money was raised by way of mortgage on the estates to pay off A.'s incumbrances, and the aforesaid policies were assigned to the said trustees, who were to receive all moneys (if any) which should, during the life of A., become payable under any of the policies and apply the same towards the discharge of the mortgages, and A. undertook, out of the income of his life estate, to pay the premiums on the policies and the interest on the mortgage. The residue of the income was to be paid, as to two-thirds to A., and as to one-third to B. On the death of A. in 1898, the trustees received all the moneys due under the policies and paid the same to B.

Held, that, on A.'s death, B. was liable under the Finance Act, 1894, to pay estate duty on the policy moneys, they being an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased" within the meaning of section 2, sub-section 1 (d).

Information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of certain life insurance policies.

Prior to the 13th of July, 1897, considerable landed estates were vested in one Henry Ashhurst Hawkins, the father of the defendant, for life, with remainder in tail male, and considerable personal property was held upon corresponding trusts.

The said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins had borrowed the sum of £70,000 upon mortgage of his said life interest, in order to secure the payment of debts incurred by him, and he had effected policies on his life for sums amounting in the whole (exclusive of bonuses) to £69,500, and had given them by way of further security. He had also incurred other unsecured debts.

By an indenture or deed of family arrangement, dated the 13th day of July, 1897, and made between the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins of the first part, the defendant Henry Hawkins of the second part, and certain trustees of the third part, it was witnessed that in pursuance of a family arrangement under which the defendant Henry Hawkins executed a disentailing deed, he the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins covenanted to pay the interest on the said sum of £70,000 during his life, and it was thereby agreed and declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the aforesaid policies on the life of the said H. A. Hawkins upon the trusts and subject to the provisions thereinafter declared and contained concerning the same. And it was thereby agreed and declared that the trustees should receive all the moneys (if any) which should during the life of the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins become payable under any of the said policies (but the trustees should not without the consent in writing of the said Henry Hawkins, his executors, administrators, or assigns, commute any bonus from time to time credited in respect of any policy or policies or permit the same to be applied in the reduction of any premium or premiums) and should pay or apply the same moneys or such part or parts thereof as should under the same indenture of mortgage be capable of being so paid or applied in or towards the discharge of the said sum of £70,000 or so much thereof as might for the time being be secured by the said indenture of mortgage. And it was also agreed and declared that subject and without prejudice to the trusts and provisions thereinbefore contained the said trustees should hold the said policies, moneys, and accumulations in trust for the said Henry Hawkins, his executors, administrators, and assigns. And the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins thereby covenanted with the trustees and with the said Henry Hawkins that he would not do or suffer anything whereby the said policies or any of them might become void or voidable, and that if any such policy had or should become voidable he would forthwith at his own cost do all things necessary for restoring the same, and that if any such policy or any new policy to be effected as thereinafter mentioned had or should become void, the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins would forthwith at his own cost effect or enable the trustees to effect a new policy or policies on his life in the names of the trustees in the like amount or amounts. And that every such substituted policy should be held upon the trusts of the said original policies. And that he the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins would punctually pay the annual premiums and other sum or sums of money (if any) necessary for keeping on foot the said original policies and any substituted policy or policies, and would forthwith deliver the receipt for every such payment to the trustees. And it was further witnessed that Henry Ashhurst Hawkins as beneficial owner conveyed unto the said trustees all his life estate and interest under certain previously recited indentures and the disentailing indenture, or in the hereditaments and premises comprised in or subject to the same indentures or any of them: To hold the same upon the trusts thereinafter declared (that was to say) upon trust to pay out of the rents, profits, and income of the said hereditaments and premises the interest on the said sum of £70,000, and the annual premiums and other sum or sums of money from time to time payable for keeping on foot every policy specified in the third schedule to the now stating indenture, and every other policy (if any) effected in pursuance of the covenants in that behalf thereinbefore contained, and the expense of repairing buildings or insuring against fire, and to pay the surplus of the said rents, profits, and income as to two-thirds thereof to the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins, and as to the remaining one-third thereof to the said Henry Hawkins, his executors, administrators, and assigns. But subject if such surplus should exceed £3,000 to a provision for creating a fund for payment of any succession duties which might become payable by reason of the falling in of leases as in the now stating indenture mentioned.

All the said policies were effected by the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins and all the premiums which were paid thereon were paid by him during his life. The said policies belonged at the date of the said indenture of the 12th of July, 1897, to the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins absolutely, subject only to the agreement carried into effect by the said deed of family arrangement. The said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins died on the 10th day of May, 1898. No moneys became payable under any of the said policies during his life. After his death the trustees of the said indenture of the 13th of July, 1897, received all the moneys (including bonuses) payable under the said policies, and they paid or accounted for the same to the said Henry Hawkins. Under these circumstances the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that estate duty had become payable under section 2 (1) (d) (or if not then under the other provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1894) in respect of the moneys received under the said policies of assurance as property passing on the death of the said Henry Ashhurst Hawkins within the meaning of those sections, and they caused application to be made to the defendant for payment of such duty, but the defendant refused to pay the same and contended that no such duty was payable.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins with him), for the Crown.—After the disentailing deed had been executed there was a resettlement, under which the defendant only took, according to the decision in the case of Earl Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198, an equity of redemption, and it was only on that interest, and not on the full value of the estate, that the Crown now claimed duty. This family arrangement did not amount to a purchase by the defendant of the policies, so as to be exempted by virtue of section 3 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, from the payment of estate duty. The practical effect of this arrangement was to substitute the policies for what was taken out of the family estates by the mortgages. Duty is therefore payable in respect of the policies by virtue of section 2 (1) (d): Brown v. Attorney-General, 79 L. T. Rep. 572, 47 W. R. Dig. 83. The present case is still stronger than that one. This is not a commercial transaction at all, but merely a family arrangement. Attorney-General v. Dobree, 48 W. R. 413, [1900] 1 Q. B. 442, decides the present case.

Counsel also cited Fryer v. Morland, 25 W. R. 21, 3 Ch. D. 675.

Haldane, Q.C. (J. F. H. Bethell with him), for the defendant.—The case of Attorney-General v. Dobree does not apply to the present case. In that case there was a marriage settlement. This was not a mere family arrangement; the deceased and the defendant were not on good terms, and the bargain was carried out at arm's length. It was not a case of a substitution of one sum for another, as was suggested. There had been a transaction by which the defendant took the policies for money or money's worth. The policies were therefore exempt from the payment of estate duty by virtue of section 3 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894. In substance there was a purchase for valuable consideration, and the defendant ought not to be called on to pay estate duty.

Counsel cited Lord Advocate v. Earl of Fife, 11 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th Ser.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case it is needless to recapitulate all the detailed facts which are set out in the information. There is no doubt at all that those facts are set out very correctly; and we accept also (it being admitted by the Attorney-General on behalf of her Majesty) that the parties here concerned (the present defendant and the deceased, his father) at the time when they entered into the transaction were at arm's length and the father at the time in bad health.

Shortly, the position was this: There had been a condition of the property and of the relations between father and son which placed the son in the position of being entitled to deal with it. The father is in difficulties and insolvent. The son is also no doubt desirous of getting some income for himself and is acting for his own interest. Between the two an arrangement is come to which involves the inclusion in a settlement of the moneys arising from policies of insurance upon the life of the father—I will not say in substitution for but coincidently with their disappearance from the settlement by reason of what was done in cutting off the entail and in entering into this family arrangement.

Now it seems to me that it is impossible under those circumstances to say that these policies do not come under section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, and that there ought not to be an estate duty paid upon these moneys. It appears that the contention against this is that whatever might have been the effect of sub-section (1) (d) upon the passing of these policies, had there been no section 3, sub-sections 1 and 2, we ought to say there is no liability to estate duty because of the terms of section 3 of the Act, sub-sections 1 and 2, and that we ought to say that there has been a bonâ fide purchase from the deceased by the defendant for a consideration in money or money's worth, and that there has been, not a succession, but merely a performance of part of that which was to be got by the purchase being payable only upon death.

Now it seems to me that that is not the true relation of the facts. It seems to me that there really was, whether you call it a settlement or a family arrangement, or any other name, that which for the purposes of this Act, and in the terms of this Act, was an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased," and which is taxable "to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased." This arrangement was not an assignment of these policies to the son. It was an arrangement by which an interest passed to the son in those policies under the terms of the settlement upon the death of his father—that is to say, a succession—a valuable interest which accrued to him by surviving his father. In that way, it seems to me—and on that ground alone—that this case may be distinguished from Lord Advocate v. Earl of Fife. There it was found that there was an actual assignment to the son of the policies. The son took them over as part of the distinct bargain by which the father was relieved of considerable difficulty. The son, in other words, became assignee. Although he could not at the time actually realize, he would have had the right to deal with these policies [illegible] surrender as he pleased. That is not the [illegible] is really an arrangement made by [illegible] effect, because he becomes survivor, gets an interest in the proceeds of these policies upon the death of his father.

The case of the Brown v. Attorney-General seems to me to throw some light upon the kind of principle by which these cases ought to be decided. For example, is it in substance here a purchase, or is it in substance an arrangement—a settlement by which a benefit passed on the death of the father? We cannot apply the exact case, the circumstances are different, but it seems to me that it is a stronger case here, where there is no attempt at a purchase really, but merely a benefit on the other side.

The case of Attorney-General v. Dobree has been cited. That is a case in this court, but I agree with Mr. Haldane that it is not a binding authority in the present case. You have got there unquestionably an element which does not exist here; you have there the fact that the only original consideration was the consideration of marriage. Now I think that is a sufficient distinction. I think it is not a decision in any way binding or covering this case, because, here, if there is any consideration, it is not a question of marriage but a question of the benefits which the son was giving to the father by concurring in the acts which cut off the entail and made these other arrangements possible, and is in a sense to be treated as a bargain and consideration, although not to my mind a transaction of purchase at all. There is a bargain, there is an arrangement. The arrangement is in one form a settlement, or in another a family arrangement, for the benefit, it may be, of both parties, but it does not constitute a purchase within section 3. I think the judgment, therefore, must be for the Crown.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Shortly before the 13th of July, 1897, considerable landed estates appear to have been vested in one Henry Ashhurst Hawkins for life, remainder to his successor in tail male, and considerable personal property seems to have been held upon corresponding trusts. Henry Ashhurst Hawkins, the father, was in considerable difficulty; he had borrowed something like £70,000 upon mortgage of his life interest, and he had effected policies to very nearly the same extent on his life. Besides that, he had a considerable debt unsecured, and for which, I suppose, he could not in any way give any security. The son was also in difficulty. He was dependent upon his father's bounty, and could get nothing from his father, and he had borrowed under an order of Kekewich, J., and had had his reversion charged to meet the expenses of his education. In those circumstances a transaction was effected by two deeds. First of all the estate was disentailed in the ordinary way and, subject to a joint power of appointment, was settled upon Henry Ashhurst Hawkins for life, remainder to Henry Hawkins in fee. Secondly, Henry Hawkins, the son, joined in a mortgage and enabled his father to transfer the mortgages from his life estate to a mortgage on the land; in other words, he joined with his father in mortgaging the fee simple of the property for £70,000. He also concurred in asking the trustees to assign £16,000 of the settled personalty generally for the benefit of Henry Ashhurst Hawkins, the father. In return he got the sum of, possibly, £2,000 himself; he got provision made for the payment of his debt that otherwise would have been a reversionary charge, and he got an income for himself during his father's life of a thousand a year. The settlement of these matters may be taken in substance to balance that £16,000. But to balance the incumbrance created on the fee of £70,000 the father brought into settlement the policies on his life, which were worth very nearly the same amount. In other words, the £70,000 was taken out of the settlement in the form of a mortgage on the land; £69,500 was brought into the settlement in the form of policies, and as far as the son was concerned the benefit with the burden would accrue to him. But on the other hand Henry Hawkins had no interest in the property except his allowance until his father's death, and on his father's death he would succeed to the property less by £70,000 and more by £69,500.

Now, the House of Lords have, if I may say so respectfully, given effect to common sense by the decision in the case of Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. The son does not pay duty on the whole estate of the property, but only on his beneficial interest in the estate of the landed property. On the other hand, why is he not to pay duty on the other property which is brought in in substitution? It seems to me that the mere statement of the facts is enough to show that the judgment in this case must be for the Crown.

I can conceive that an arrangement might have been made in which this case would become like that of Lord Advocate v. Earl of Fife, a case in which I respectfully entirely agree. If the arrangement had been that the son was to have these policies out and out—if, in fact, the policies had not been brought into settlement, but assigned to the son, then this case would have been like that case. But they are not the son's policies. They are brought into settlement, and express directions are given in case bonuses are received or in case the terminable policies become realized, when the money is to be applied in relief of the settled estates, and not to go to the son. I think it is conceivable under the clause which Mr. Haldane read to us that if the father had lived long enough there might have been some balance on the policies which might have come to the son. If the father had lived over the ten years, and the terminable policies had been paid in full, it might have been that the surrender value of the other policies with their bonuses would have come to more altogether than £70,000, and that amount would more than have paid off the mortgage of £70 000. But those events did not happen, and in the result the son found the estate diminished on the one side and added to on the other; and he is asked to pay on the value. There must therefore be judgment for the Crown.

Company — Special resolution — Requisite majority — Declaration of chairman—Conclusive evidence—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 61.

The declaration of the chairman of a company meeting that a special resolution has been duly carried is conclusive, unless challenged by means of a poll demanded by five members; and, in the absence of any evidence of mala fides on the part of the chairman, the court will not receive evidence impeaching the declaration.

In re Horbury Bridge Coal, &c., Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109, distinguished.

This was an appeal against the refusal of Kekewich, J., to restrain the defendant company and their directors from acting on certain resolutions, which purported to have been duly passed by the shareholders as special resolutions for the winding up of the company, and the sale of its assets to a new company to be formed.

The plaintiffs were shareholders in the company, who alleged that these resolutions had not been properly passed.

The plaintiffs filed affidavits to the effect that a motion for the adjournment of the meeting had been declared by the chairman to be lost. Considerable uproar had ensued, during which the chairman had put the resolutions for the winding up of the company and had declared them carried, though, owing to the disturbance, most of the shareholders were unaware that anything was being done, and had no opportunity of voting on the resolutions.

Affidavits were filed in reply on behalf of the company that shareholders who were further away from the chairman than the plaintiffs had heard the resolutions put and voted on them, that the first resolution had been carried unanimously, that a large number of shareholders had voted in favour of the other resolutions, while very few had held up their hands against, and that the chairman had accordingly declared the resolutions duly carried.

Under section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, a declaration of the chairman that a special resolution has been carried is to be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same.

Kekewich, J., held that the resolutions were duly carried, and dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Kirby, for the appellants.—Notwithstanding section 51 of the Act, the chairman's declaration ought not to be accepted as conclusive evidence that the resolutions were duly carried, because his own affidavit proves that he declared them carried without ascertaining whether there was a three-fourths majority in favour of them or not.

Manning (Warrington, K.C., with him), for the defendants. — The chairman's declaration is conclusive: In re Gold Co., 27 W. R 341, 11 Ch. D. 701; In re Hadleigh Castle Gold Mines (Limited), [1900] 2 Ch. 419.

Kirby, in reply, referred to In re Horbury Bridge Coal, &c., Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109.

RIGBY, L.J.—Upon all the evidence there is a good deal of contradiction, and I have no doubt a good deal of exaggeration, it may be on both sides, but as the natural outcome of the evidence I consider that the learned judge, Kekewich, J., has come to a right conclusion, that the chairman of the meeting did put the resolutions, notice of which had been given, and which had to be carried as special resolutions before the scheme could go on effectively, and that he did declare those resolutions carried, and that the entry of that declaration was made in the books of the company. Upon the authority of In re Gold Co., and the case of In re Hadleigh Castle Gold Mines, in which it was followed and explained by Cozens-Hardy, J., with regard to extraordinary resolutions, the conclusion ought to be, and our conclusion is, that the resolutions were passed and declared to be carried. That would preclude any inquiry into the number of shareholders who voted for or against, because under the regulations of the company it is not necessary to inquire into the proxies.

I think the explanation is that which was suggested. It may be that there were a majority present at the meeting who were opposed to these resolutions—I do not know; it is possible that there was—but their opposition was made unavailing, and they recognized it to be unavailing, from the knowledge that there were a large number of proxies which were taken to overrule such opposition. Whatever be the cause I consider that the resolutions were duly declared to be passed, and must be taken to have been passed by the requisite number of shareholders.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L J.—I entirely agree. It was suggested that the case of In re Horbury Bridge Coal, Iron, and Waggon Co. is an authority that, although in the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862, the word used is "conclusive," it is not to be read as conclusive, but as primâ facie conclusive. The words of the section are "A declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same." I do not agree with this contention, and I think when the case of In re Horbury Bridge Coal, Iron, and Waggon Co. is looked at it decides nothing of the sort. I thought at first that the interlocutory observation of Sir George Jessel had reference to the 51st section, but Stirling, L.J., has called my attention to the fact that that was not so and that he was referring really to the 37th and 38th articles of the articles of association of that particular company which are set forth on p. 110 (11 Ch. D.), in which the words used are "A declaration by the chairman that a resolution has been carried, and an entry to that effect in the book of proceedings of the company shall be sufficient evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution," and it is in reference to those words that Sir George Jessel says (11 Ch. D., at p. 114): "Sufficient evidence in the absence of evidence to the contrary, but not conclusive evidence." He was not dealing with the 51st section at all, and really when one comes to look at the short statement of facts by Sir George Jessel the whole thing is quite plain. The question was whether Mr. Kippax had been properly appointed liquidator, and then Sir George Jessel states: "The facts for the purpose are beyond controversy. There were five persons present corporeally. One of the five held what was called a proxy, but it has been admitted for the purpose of the argument by the respondents that that is not to be taken into account. Of the five persons present two only voted for Mr. Kippax. Three voted against him. The two who voted for him held more shares in the company than the three who voted against him, and according to the law of this company there was a vote for every share. No poll was demanded and consequently no poll was taken." That is the statement, and the next point is whether the chairman rightly decided that Mr. Kippax was duly elected because the two persons, including himself, who voted for Mr. Kippax held more shares in the company than the three who were against it, and Bramwell, L.J., said: "First, a poll was not demanded, and secondly, there was no waiver of a poll." Under those circumstances it seems to me that that case when it is looked at does not affect the question as to the word "conclusive" in the 51st section at all.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have only this to add, that as regards the passage in the 51st section which has been commented upon by Vaughan Williams, L.J., I entirely agree with the reasoning of Cozens-Hardy, J., in the case of In re Hadleigh Castle Gold Mines which came before him; and as regards In re Horbury Bridge Coal, Iron, and Waggon Co. I should only wish to add this: That it appears to me, as has been pointed out by the Lord Justice, that the 51st section did not come at all in question there. The statement of facts on p. 111 was this, "The company being in difficulties a meeting was held which had been summoned for the purpose of passing an extraordinary resolution under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 129, that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not by reason of its liabilities continue its business." To that resolution, of course, the 51st section would apply, but what happened was this, "Five shareholders only attended, and a resolution to the above effect was passed unanimously." That resolution having been unanimously passed, what they proceeded to do was to appoint a liquidator, and that was a resolution which was not required to be a special resolution. The evidence as to what followed was this, "A motion was made and seconded that Mr. Kippax should be appointed liquidator," and upon that there was a dispute as to who voted on that. But the 31st article of the company's articles of association did apply, and consequently, it seems to me, as has already been said, that case is not an authority to the contrary of what we have decided.

BROWN v. PETO. (a.)

Mortgage—Lease by mortgagor in possession—Sporting rights over mortgaged land not in occupation of mortgagor—Validity—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 18.

A lease by a mortgagor in possession of a house and adjoining premises included the right of sporting and shooting over a portion of the mortgaged property, which was in the occupation of an agricultural tenant, to whom it had been, previously to the mortgage, leased with a reservation of the sporting rights.

Held, that, as against the mortgagee, the lease was valid under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the judgment of Bigham, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff claimed from the defendant (1) possession of a house and premises known as Knowlton Court; (2) a declaration that the defendant had no right of shooting or sporting over the Knowlton estate; (3) mesne profits.

In the year 1887 Knowlton Court, consisting of a furnished house, stables and gardens, some demesne lands, and about 1,900 acres of agricultural land known as the Knowlton estate, was mortgaged to the plaintiff's predecessors in title, Lewis D'Aeth, the beneficial owner, being in possession. At that date the agricultural land was leased to agricultural tenants, but the shooting and sporting rights were reserved to the landlord.

On the 26th of November, 1890, the mortgage being still subsisting, D'Aeth, the mortgagor, granted a lease of the whole estate, except the 1,900 acres, to the defendant for a term of years. The lease comprised Knowlton Court and the gardens and other lands belonging thereto, and "the right of shooting and sporting over the whole of the lessor's Knowlton estate, containing about 1,900 acres."

The interest due under the mortgage having fallen in arrear, a foreclosure order was made. Subsequently the plaintiff contended that the lease granted to the defendant was not a valid lease under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and that the defendant was, therefore, only a yearly tenant. The plaintiff gave the defendant notice to quit as a yearly tenant.

Bigham, J., held that the lease was valid as against the plaintiff, and the learned judge accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 18: (1) A mortgagor of land while in possession shall, as against every incumbrancer, have, by virtue of this Act, power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged land, or any part thereof, as is in this section described and authorized. (3) The leases which this section authorizes are: (i.) An agricultural or occupation lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years; and (ii.) a building lease for any term not exceeding ninety-nine years.

Dickens, Q.C., and Warrington, Q.C. (Morton Smith with them), for the plaintiff.—The lease does not come within section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Under that section a mortgagor of land in possession has power to grant an occupation lease of the mortgaged land, but he cannot by the lease grant an easement, such as the sporting rights, over other land not included in the lease: Dayrell v. Hoare, 12 A. & E. 356; In re Gladstone, 48 W. R. 531, [1900] 2 Ch. 101. Section 18 does not contain any words similar to those to be found in section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "any easement, right, or privilege of any kind."

Bray, Q.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the defendant.—The lease was a valid lease. The word "land" in section 18 must be construed by reference to the definition clause, section 2, the effect of which is that land may include incorporeal hereditaments. Dayrell v. Hoare was decided before the Act of 1881, and therefore is no authority. Even if there is no power in a mortgagor to grant a lease of an incorporeal hereditament by itself, this lease does not cease to be an occupation lease of land and is not invalidated because it includes the right of shooting over another part of the land.

Dickens replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: Upon the 3rd of August, 1887, Mr. Lewis Narborough Hughes D'Aeth, who was the owner of Knowlton Park estate, in the county of Kent, mortgaged it in fee to secure an advance of £30,000. The estate consisted of a furnished mansion-house, stables, and gardens, of some demesne lands, and of agricultural lands of about 1,900 acres in extent. At the time of this mortgage the 1,900 acres were leased to agricultural tenants, the shooting thereon being reserved, as is very commonly the case, to the landlord, Mr. D'Aeth. These shootings were thus severed from the occupation of the agricultural lands, and were reserved to the landlord. After this mortgage Mr. D'Aeth was left in possession and enjoyment of the estate by the mortgagees. Upon the 26th of November, 1890—that is, about three years after the mortgage—Mr. D'Aeth, by lease under seal, demised the whole estate excepting the 1,900 acres (which were then, as before stated, in lease to agricultural tenants), together with the shootings over the 1,900 acres, to the defendant, Mr. Peto, for a term of fourteen years from the 25th of March, 1890, at the rental of £383 per annum. The parcels of this lease become, in my opinion, material when considering, as I must do, whether the lease is an occupation lease so as to come within the meaning of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. They are, first, the mansion-house, with stables, out-buildings, gardens, and pleasure grounds, containing 11 acres or thereabouts, together with the furniture and fixtures and other effects in the mansion-house; secondly, part of the park opposite the house containing 45 acres or thereabouts; thirdly, a parcel of meadow land known as Dog Kennel Pasture containing 8a. 0r. 5p. or thereabouts; fourthly, the right of shooting and sporting over the whole of the lessor's Knowlton estate containing about 1,900 acres. In my judgment this is a lease of a very common description, where a landlord is letting his mansion-house, grounds, and shooting reserved over lands leased to agricultural tenants, and was a well-known lease both before and since the Act of 1881. It is sought by the mortgagee in the present action to eject Mr. Peto some four years before the lease has expired upon the ground that it is not authorized by the Conveyancing Act of 1881. Many points have been taken and argued, but the above point goes to the whole root of the case, and if Bigham, J., was right in holding as he did, that the lease was a valid lease and within the Act, no other points arise. That section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, was passed to enable mortgagors to grant leases, as well as mortgagees is plain, and that the section also enacts in express terms what kind of leases mortgagors and mortgagees may grant is equally clear. Now what is it that section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enacts. To ascertain this I must read section 18 and section 2, the interpretation section, together. It enacts that a mortgagor of lands—that is, of tenements and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal—while in possession shall as against every incumbrancer have by virtue of the Act power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged tenements and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, or any part thereof as in the section is described and authorized—that is to say, an agricultural or occupation lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, or a building lease for any term not exceeding ninety-nine years. This section also enacts that every such lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, and shall contain a covenant by the lessee for payment of rent and a condition of re-entry on non-payment thereof. This being the section, the question arises whether the lease of the 26th of November, 1890, is "any such lease of the mortgaged premises," or in other words whether the lease comes within either of the three classes of leases which section 18 of the Act of 1881 expressly authorizes a mortgagor in possession to make—viz., an agricultural lease, an occupation lease, or a building lease. I agree that it is not an agricultural lease, nor is it a building lease; but why is it not an occupation lease? It is a lease by which the mansion-house and the stables and gardens, part of the park, and the incorporeal hereditaments—that, is the right of shooting, severed as it was when the lease was made from the 1,900 acres, are leased to the defendant for him to occupy. Why is this not an occupation lease? It is a lease, as I have before said, of a very common description, and for myself, if not fettered by authority, I should have had no doubt but that it was an occupation lease. It was argued that a lease of the shooting per se would not be an occupation lease, for that no rent could be reserved, and that no right of re-entry could be reserved; but why could not both of these be reserved by contract? However, I do not decide this point, for what I have to deal with is not a lease of shooting per se, but a lease of a house, stables, and lands, and coupled therewith, and as incident to the occupation thereof, is the right of shooting over the lands already let to other lessees. It is argued on behalf of the mortgagees that the case of Dayrell v. Hoare, shows that the lease of the 26th of November, 1890, is an invalid lease, because, as the lease in that case was held not to be in accordance with the power granted in that case, so the present lease is not in accordance with the power given by section 18 of the Act of 1881. But in my opinion this argument is fallacious, for the two powers are not the same. Dayrell v. Hoare was decided in the year 1840, and had, of course, nothing to do with the Conveyancing Act of 1881 or the express statutory power given thereby to mortgagors to grant leases. The question which was raised in Dayrell v. Hoare upon demurrer was whether a lease which demised part of the premises, with the right of shooting over the whole, was a good execution of a power authorizing a lease of "the said several estates, hereditaments, and premises so given and limited"; and it was held that it was not, because that power did not authorize a lease of part of the land with liberty to sport over the rest, Littledale, J., holding the lease bad on the ground that the entirety in the particular part was not demised, for the demise must be of the whole which covers the part demised, and Patteson, J., saying that the power does not contemplate the separation of the incident from the land. It is quite true that Dayrell v. Hoare was approved of by Sir Nathaniel Lindley in the case of In re Gladstone, Gladstone v. Gladstone, where that learned judge says: "The decision in Dayrell v. Hoare was plainly right, both under the old law and under the new law—namely, that a power for a tenant for life to lease settled estates or any part or parts thereof did not authorize a lease of part of the land with liberty to sport over the rest. It is clear that a power to lease land cannot enable a donee of the power to impose a burden on the land." I do not doubt the accuracy of Dayrell v. Hoare or of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in In re Gladstone; but in the present case the Conveyancing Act expressly enacts that the donee of the power may grant occupation leases for not exceeding twenty-one years, and that such leases may consist of both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. In the present case the right of shooting was severed before the lease in question was granted, and was an incorporeal hereditament, the leasing of which the Act of 1881 expressly authorizes. Take the case of a lease by a mortgagor in possession of a mansion-house and grounds, together with a right of way over lands leased to agricultural tenants, why would not such a lease be a good occupation lease within the Act? It seems to me that it would, and if so, the lease of the mansion-house and grounds in the present case, together with the right of shooting over lands leased to agricultural tenants, would equally be within the Act. The case of Dayrell v. Hoare is no authority as to the true construction of section 18 of the Act of 1881, and the learned judges who decided that case and Sir Nathaniel Lindley in In re Gladstone were not dealing with what was the meaning of an express power to grant occupation leases of both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments, which I have to deal with in this case. I can find nothing in the Act of 1881 to show "a contrary intention" so as to exclude the interpretation of the word "land" in section 2 (ii.), as including tenements and hereditaments corporeal and incorporeal, as was sought to be made out by the learned counsel for the mortgagees. In my judgment the lease in the present case is an occupation lease, and falls within section 18 of Act of 1881, and is a lease which the Act contemplated either a mortgagor or mortgagee should be empowered to grant. For the reasons above I think Bigham, J.'s, judgment as to the validity of the lease of the 26th of November, 1890, should be upheld and this appeal dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: The first question to be decided in this case is whether section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, authorizes a lease by a mortgagor in possession of a mansion-house and adjacent land, together with the right of shooting over other land not included in the lease, but included in the mortgage security. If this question is answered in the affirmative, it is conclusive of this action in favour of the defendant, and no other question need be answered. Now, section 18 (1) runs as follows: "A mortgagor of land while in possession shall, as against every incumbrancer, have, by virtue of this Act, power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged land, or any part thereof, as in this section described and authorized." The description and authority contained in the section, so far as material to the facts of the present case, seem to be: Section 18, sub-section 3: "The leases which this section authorizes are: (i.) An agricultural or occupation lease for any term not exceeding twenty-one years." Sub-section 6: "Every such lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to the circumstances of the case, but without any fine being taken." Sub-section 7: "Every lease shall contain a covenant by the lessee for payment of the rent, and a condition of re-entry on the rent not being paid within a time therein specified not exceeding thirty days." Sub-section 13: "This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed by the mortgagor and mortgagee in the mortgage deed, or otherwise in writing." Now, in order to construe section 18, it is necessary to refer to some definitions in the Act of words therein employed. By section 2 (ii.), "land, unless a contrary intention appears, includes land of any tenure, and tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, and houses and other buildings, and also an undivided share in land." By section 2 (ix.) "rent includes yearly or other rent, toll, duty, royalty, or other reservation, by the acre, the ton, or otherwise"; and (xi.) "a mining lease . . . includes a grant or licence for mining purposes." It is urged on behalf of the defendant, who contends that this lease falls within the description and authority of section 18 of the Act of 1881, that, as land by the definition includes hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal, the authority necessarily includes the right to lease shooting over land which is not itself demised to the lessee, but this seems to me to depend on whether the definition includes hereditaments which only come into existence by the exercise of the leasing power. The right of sporting has no existence as a hereditament until some grant or lease of it is made by the owner of the soil; it is, so long as enjoyed by the owner of the soil, a mere incident of ownership, and passes from one to another by a mere conveyance or lease of the land; and when a landowner reserves to himself the right of shooting he does not really reserve or except anything from the conveyance or lease, but in law takes under a regrant from the lessee—i.e., not a mere licence, but a grant coupled with an interest. But it is to be observed that, in the present case, at the date of the mortgage the lands over which the mortgagor purported to grant the right of sporting were already let on farm leases reserving the right of shooting. It seems, therefore, that, at the date of the mortgage, the shooting rights over the farm existed as incorporeal hereditaments. The incorporeal hereditaments existed separately—I think it does not matter for what term they had been granted—and fall within the definition of land. But it is further urged that, even if the sporting rights were severed, before the date of the mortgage and existed at that date as incorporeal hereditaments and were leased as such, yet the case of Dayrell v. Hoare shows that a lease of such sporting rights is not a lease of part of the land as to which section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, creates the statutory power, but I cannot accept this view. In Dayrell v. Hoare the lease purported to be executed in pursuance of a power to lease the estates, hereditaments, and premises given to the tenant for life, or any part or parts thereof. Now, the estates, hereditaments, and premises given to the tenant for life appear to have been specific messuages and lands, and Littledale, J., in delivering judgment, says (p. 368): "Nor is it a grant of a part; for, in the power, part is used with reference to the entirety which the tenant for life has. Thus, supposing the estate to consist of two houses and 1,000 acres of land, the power enables the party to grant one house and 100 acres. But the demise must be of the whole which covers the part demised. An easement cannot be granted by itself out of any separate part; that would be subjecting the land to a servitude." But in the present case the sporting rights existed as part of the mortgaged property at the date of the lease, and I do not think Dayrell v. Hoare, when considered in the light of that fact, has any application. It certainly is dependent on the nature of the entirety to be dealt with under that particular power, and on the entirety of the gift to that tenant for life. The sporting rights were not part of the gift to the tenant for life. The gift was exclusively corporeal, and an incident of the estate was not part of the entirety given. At all events Dayrell v. Hoare is not an authority on the construction of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Some question was raised in the case as to whether the rent in the lease granted ought to be treated as an entire rent for mansion-house, land, and right of shooting, or to be treated as apportioned. On the point I am discussing—viz., whether a lease of the right of shooting over land not demised to the lessee of the shooting can fall within section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881—I do not think it matters a bit which way the question is answered. If the lease of such a right of shooting falls at all within section 18, sub-section 1, it does so equally whether the lease also comprises lands or whether it does not do so. I think that, having regard to the fact that before the mortgage the right of shooting had been converted into a several hereditament, the lease of it may fall within section 18, sub-section 1, provided the other conditions of the section are complied with. Now, the following objections are made to show that those conditions have not been complied with: (1) That this lease is neither an agricultural nor an occupation lease; (2) that no rent has been reserved, and therefore not the best rent; (3) that there is no right of re-entry reserved, or possible, on the incorporeal hereditament; (4) that all these matters forbid the application of section 18 to incorporeal hereditaments, because the conditions imposed by that section show a contrary intention. To these objections perhaps another objection should be added—viz., that clause (xi.) of section 2, by its definition of a mining lease as including a grant or licence for mining purposes, by implication excludes such grants or licences from other leases or substantive leases. I do not think that any of these objections should prevail. I think that the words "occupation lease" may well apply to a lease of an incorporeal hereditament. Use and occupation lies, as is pointed out in Bird v. Higginson, 2 A. & E 696, at p. 702, for actual enjoyment of a fishery. "Occupy" is a word which in one form and another is not infrequently used of an incorporeal hereditament. Eviction, which presupposes occupation, is a term employed in respect of tithes. I think that the word "rent" is used in this Act to include rent so called—that is, rent which does not issue out of the thing demised, and in respect of which there can be no distress. In case after case the word is used by judges in respect of such rent so called. In legislation also the word is used not infrequently in this sense. The very definition of rent in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, "rent includes yearly or other rent, toll, duty, royalty, or other reservation, by the acre, ton, or otherwise," shows that rent is not used in this Act in its strict sense. In Lord Hastings v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 47 W. R. 59, [1898] 2 Ch. 674, [1899] 1 Ch. 656, it was held by the Court of Appeal, affirming Byrne, J., that, in a grant of wayleave, sums payable to the grantor in respect of traffic passing over the line were a rent within the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, and that the benfit of such rent ran with the reversion to the land. As to re-entry, I feel no difficulty. If there can be occupation and eviction, there can clearly be re-entry. I find, then, nothing in these conditions, imposed by section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to exclude a lease of an incorporeal hereditament from the statutory power given by the Act to the mortgagor, or from that given to the mortgagee by section 18, sub-section 2. It is only necessary in the present case to decide that, the sporting rights having been severed before the mortgage, the power of the mortgagor at least applies to such an incorporeal hereditament; but I by no means decide that the power to lease under the statute would not extend to an incorporeal hereditament although unsevered until the making of the lease—that is to say, that I do not decide that the power may not apply to a case falling within Dayrell v. Hoare. We have to construe an Act of Parliament not passed to give a limited gift to anyone, not passed in the interest of the mortgagor or the mortgagee, but passed in the interest of the State, on the ground that it is contrary to the interest of the State that land should be so held that nobody can safely become the tenant for a term of years of either mortgagor or of mortgagee in possession. Certain conditions are made essential to the exercise of this power, that the best rent shall be reserved which can reasonably be obtained. I am by no means prepared to say that, if the best rent can only be obtained by letting land in parts and giving the lessee of one part a right which constitutes in a sense a servitude over another part, such as a right of access or rights of drainage or rights of shooting, this is not within the power. In Wilson v. Queen's Club, 40 W. R. 172, [1891] 3 Ch. 522, it was held that a lessee under a lease made by a mortgagor in possession by virtue of section 18 can restrain the mortgagee and those claiming under him from obstructing the lessee's enjoyment of a right to light. I have only to add that I do not think that the express powers in section 2 exclude the power to make licences or grant privileges over mortgaged land not demised in cases other than mining leases. There is a reason for the express provision in the case of mining leases based on the fact that the division of the land in mining cases is horizontal.

HAYNES v. FOSTER. (a.)

Married woman—Election—Restraint on anticipation—Married woman becoming discovert—Will—Intention.

A testator by his will, after directing the proceeds of sale of his Turkish real estate to go into his personal residue, gave a life interest in a share of his personal residue to each of his two married daughters, upon whom he placed a restraint on anticipation. By Turkish law the testator's Turkish real estate devolved on his next-of-kin in certain shares. Since the testator's death one of the married daughters became discovert. Upon petition to decide whether, if the married daughters elected to take their shares in the Turkish real estate by inheritance, they were bound to compensate out of their life interests in the personal estate those who lost benefits under the will by such election,

Held, that the restraint on anticipation excluded the application of the doctrine of election, and, being a declaration by the testator of a particular intention that the married daughters should not be able to alienate, was not affected by the fact with respect to one of them that she was now discovert; and that both the married daughters were therefore entitled to take their shares of the Turkish real estate by inheritance without making compensation out of their life interests under the will.

Morgan Hugh Foster, who was the owner of certain real estate in Pera and on the Bosphorus in European Turkey, by his will dated the 1st of November, 1888, directed the persons in whom by the law of Turkey his real estate in that empire should become vested at his decease to sell such real estate and pay the moneys arising from the sale to the trustees of the will to be held by them as if the same were moneys arising from the conversion of the residue of his personal estate.

The testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion into money to be invested together with the moneys directed to be treated as if arising from such conversion, and to be held by the trustees upon trust for his wife for her life, and after her decease the testator directed the trustees to set apart two sums of £8,000 and to stand possessed of the residue upon trust for his son Arthur Foster for life with remainder to his issue as therein set out. And as to one sum of £8,000 the testator directed the trustees to hold it upon such trusts and subject to such powers and provisoes in favour of his daughter Lady E. M. Thomas and her issue as should correspond with the trusts, powers, and provisoes declared in favour of his son Arthur Foster and his issue, "but so nevertheless that my said daughter Lady E. M. Thomas shall not have power to deprive herself by way of anticipation of the annual produce to which she shall become entitled for her life and shall take the same for her sole and separate use." And as to the other sum of £8,000 the testator directed his trustees to hold it upon such trusts and subject to such powers and provisoes in favour of his daughter Lady Lacon and her issue as should correspond with the trusts, powers, and provisoes declared in favour of Lady Thomas and her issue.

The testator died on the 15th of June, 1891. His wife died on the 14th of November, 1892.

Lady Thomas was a married woman, having been married in 1874. Lady Lacon was now a widow, having been married in 1878, and her husband having died in August, 1899.

According to Turkish law the testator had no power to dispose of his Turkish property by his will, which by that law devolved in certain shares upon his wife and children. The Turkish property had been sold, and the proceeds of sale were in court.

This was a petition by the trustees of the will to determine the rights of all parties to the funds in court the proceeds of sale of the Turkish property, which raised (inter alia) the questions whether, if Ladies Thomas and Lacon elected to take the proceeds of sale by inheritance and not under the will, they were bound to compensate out of their shares in the residue of the testator's personal estate those who lost benefits under the will by such election, or whether they were precluded from so doing by the restraint on anticipation imposed on them; and if they were so precluded whether in the case of Lady Lacon the restraint no longer had that effect she being now discovert.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C, and G. Henderson, for the petitioners.

Warrington, Q.C., and E. Beaumont, for Arthur Foster.—The principle of the doctrine of election is that so far as the testator has not expressed a particular intention to the contrary no person can take under his will without giving effect to every part of it. Restraint on anticipation is such a particular intention to the contrary, but in Lady Lacon's case it is no longer effective as she is now discovert. The testator could only have intended the restraint to operate during coverture. If Lady Lacon elects to take against the will she must make compensation.

Austen Cartmell, for Lady Lacon.—The testator's intention as evidenced by the restraint was that Lady Lacon should not be able to alienate, she therefore can take against the will without making compensation; that she is now discovert does not affect the testator's intention.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 30.—KEKEWICH, J.—A somewhat curious question arises in this way. The testator, Morgan Hugh Foster, was the owner of some lands in Turkey, and by his will he purported to direct those lands to be sold, and he further directed the proceeds of sale to be held by the trustees of the will as if the same were moneys arising from the conversion of the residue of his personal estate. He disposed of the residue of his personal estate in such manner as to give interests therein to his three children, Arthur Foster, Lady Thomas, and Lady Lacon. It turns out that according to the law of Turkey the testator had not the power which he professed to have of disposing of the proceeds of sale of land in that country, and the result is that such proceeds are divisible in certain shares between his three children aforesaid, who take them, of course, not under the will but by inheritance.

If they insist on this title they are bound according to what is styled the doctrine of election to compensate out of the interests which they nevertheless take under the will those who thereby lose the benefits which the testator intended for them in the proceeds of sale of the land in Turkey. I do not find it necessary here to expound the doctrine of election, or to do more than state, as I have done, its application in a concrete form to this particular case. But in stating the effect of the will I have intentionally omitted one provision which gives rise to the question falling for decision. Arthur Foster takes such interest as is given him in the residue for his own benefit without more, and the application of the doctrine of election is simple in his case, but as regards Lady Thomas and Lady Lacon, their interests are coupled with restraint on anticipation, and it is that which has occasioned difficulty. I will say no more now about Lady Thomas, but will deal with the case of Lady Lacon only. It is urged on her behalf that the application of the doctrine of election is excluded by this restraint on anticipation, and to that it is replied that whether this might otherwise have been the correct conclusion or not, it is incorrect as matters stand, because Lady Lacon became a widow in August, 1899, and thereupon the restraint on anticipation ceased to have any effect. On this point several authorities were cited, and they must be noticed. Let me first say that Codrington v. Lindsay, reported in the House of Lords as Codrington v. Codrington, does not seem to me to have any real bearing on the case in hand. It is a well-known authority of great value, and most instructive, much learning on the doctrine of election being found in the judgments of the learned judges who took part in the decision. But the point with which I am dealing did not arise, and could not have arisen there, and for the present purpose that case cannot be regarded as a guide to any conclusion in this case. My particular attention was called to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Codrington v. Lindsay, that the plaintiff was bound to account only for income received from the date of the order nisi for the dissolution of her marriage, but, apart from the observation that the grounds for this conclusion are not stated, study of the case has convinced me that it does not give me any assistance. A more important and useful case is In re Vardon's Trusts, but before commenting on that I must mention In re Wheatley, Smith v. Spence. In the latter case the claim of a married woman against a will would clearly have brought her within the doctrine of election but that her interest under the same will out of which compensation was sought to be made was restrained from anticipation, and Chitty, J., held that this restraint excluded the application of the doctrine. His views are clearly and forcibly expressed, and briefly come to this, that by adding the restraint on anticipation the testator must be taken to have expressed his intention that the married woman should not be able to part with the interest given to her, and therefore must also be taken to have intended that she should not be at liberty to make that compensation which is the necessary consequence of the application of the doctrine of election. He held it to be a question of intention, and in substance said that one cannot properly insist on a beneficiary under a will giving effect as far as possible to all the testator's dispositions if you find him expressing the intention that the means of doing this shall be withheld. The same learned judge took the same view in In re Whitwell, Senior v. Wilson, which, I think, calls for no further comment. The case of In re Vardon's Trusts first came before Kay, J., and that learned judge held that a restraint on anticipation was no bar to the application of the doctrine of election, and that the court would insist on the married woman making compensation to those whose interests she defeated by her election, notwithstanding such restraint. He did not consider the question of intention at all. He only considered whether in a case to which the doctrine of election would otherwise have been applicable the restraint on anticipation—that is to say, the inability on the part of the lady to alienate—created any difficulty, and he held that it did not. But the case went to the Court of Appeal and the Lords Justices took a different view. The judgment of the court was delivered by Fry, L.J., and it rests on intention. It is to be observed that that was a case of a settlement and not of a will, and some different considerations may be applicable to the two different instruments, because, as stated by Lord Redesdale in Birmingham v. Kirwan, 2 Sch. & Lef., 444, in a passage which is cited with approval by Lord Hatherley in Codrington v. Codrington, "deeds being general matter of contract the contract is not to be interpreted otherwise than as the consideration expressly requires." The judgment, however, does not distinguish between the two classes of instruments and treats the intention as paramount in both alike. The key to the judgment is to be found in the paragraph which concludes thus: "This settlement, therefore, in our judgment, contains a declaration of a particular intention inconsistent with the doctrine of election, and therefore excludes it." Chitty, J.'s, judgment in In re Wheatley, Smith v. Spence, had been discussed before Kay, J., who disapproved of it, but it was cited again in the Court of Appeal, and although not expressly approved by the judgment must, I think, be treated as upheld by it. If, then, Lady Lacon were still a married woman, it would follow that the restraint on anticipation of her interest in the residue renders it impossible for her to make compensation thereout and excludes the doctrine of election. But then it is urged that she, being now discovert, the restraint has ceased to exist and compensation is therefore possible. If I am right in the view which I have taken of Chitty, J.'s, decision in In re Wheatley and of the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Vardon's Trusts, it matters not whether Lady Lacon is now discovert or not. You must look to the will to ascertain what the testator's intention was, and if the testator has said that he intends her not to be capable of alienating her interest—that is, to be incapable of making that compensation which the doctrine of election requires, then because he has expressed that intention the doctrine of election is excluded. Against this view reliance is placed on the decision of North, J., in Hamilton v. Hamilton. His lordship there held that a lady entitled to repudiate a settlement made by her when under age was bound to make compensation out of her interests under the same settlement which she was not restrained from anticipating to those whom she had thus defeated; and I cannot read his judgment, which I have done with some care, without surmising that if the lady had at that time been discovert he would also have obliged her to make compensation out of interests in the same settlement which she was restrained from anticipating. But this was not the point decided. His judgment deals elaborately with and decides two points, and really two points only. It was argued that the restraint on anticipation contained in the settlement contemplated only the marriage on which the settlement was made, and, therefore, had no application to the subsequent coverture in existence when the case was heard. This argument he rejected, and decided that the restraint was applicable to the then existing coverture. The other point was that she had exercised her election by bringing the action which was commenced before the second coverture—that is, when she was discovert, and that, therefore, the restraint arising on the second coverture might be disregarded. The learned judge rejected this argument also, and held that the obligation to elect arose when he delivered judgment. She was then a married woman and restrained from anticipation, and therefore her income during the then existing coverture could not be applied in compensation. In re Vardon's Trusts was cited, and was commented on in the judgment, but I do not understand from the report that there was any argument on the point of intention or that it was considered by the learned judge. If that case stood alone I might be bound to adopt it to the extent of saying that the effect of the restraint on anticipation of Lady Lacon's interest having ceased, and she electing to take against the will—that is, electing to claim by inheritance the property which the testator purported to give her as bounty, she is bound to make compensation to those whom she thus defeats, out of her interest in the residue. But, as already stated, I do not think that North, J.'s, decision covers the exact point, and if it must be treated as doing that by implication, for it certainly does not expressly, it is at variance with the principle upon which the decisions in In re Wheatley and In re Vardon's Trusts rests, and which principle seems to me to be perfectly sound. There is, however, a subordinate point of which I find no trace in any of the other cases, but of which, after the arguments dealing with it, I am bound to take notice. It is said that the restraint on anticipation indicates only what Mr. Warrington styled a limited intention. It was argued, in fact, that as the restraint can only operate during coverture the testator must be taken to have intended that only during coverture it should interfere with election. This argument of course proceeds on the proposition that testators are supposed to know the law. So they are; but it does not follow that you must attribute to them knowledge of the refined doctrines of equity. And in my judgment it would be going much too far to say that when a testator restrains a woman from anticipation he must be taken to intend, although that, no doubt, is the result, that if at any time during her enjoyment she is discovert the restraint will become wholly inoperative against her alienation. I put to counsel during the argument this test, which upon reflection seems to me a good one. If the testator purported to restrain a man from alienation, his direction would be futile because the law would not allow it; but will it be said that he did not intend such restraint to take effect? Intention which depends on the construction of the testator's language and the legal effect of that language are two different things. I therefore hold that Lady Lacon is not bound to make compensation even though she is now discovert, and is capable of alienating her interest in the residue, because the restraint on anticipation is no longer operative. Arriving at this conclusion I need say nothing about Lady Thomas, who is still a married woman, but who it was said might become liable to make compensation if and when she became discovert. I have dealt with the point on which I reserved judgment, and I think that, subject to that, the several questions arising on the petition, including the question of costs, were disposed of at the hearing.

In re MAYHEW.
SPENCER v. CUTBUSH. (a.)

Will—Power, exercise of—Special power of appointment —Word "appoint" only.

A testatrix had a special power of appointment by will, given to her by the will of her father, over a share of his personal estate in favour of her nephews and nieces. The words of her will were simply "I appoint, devise, and bequeath my real estate, and the residue of my personal estate, to my trustees upon trust to sell or convert the same into money, and to pay and divide the proceeds (after paying my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses) equally between" four named nephews and nieces.

Held, that the power was executed.

Observations on dictum of Chatterton, V.C., in In re Richardson's Trusts, 17 L. R. Ir. 436, at p. 442, 35 W. R. Dig. 151.

This was an adjourned summons.

By her will dated the 9th of June, 1898, Maria Mayhew, spinster, after appointing her nephew and niece to be her executors and trustees, and making certain specific legacies, continued as follows:

"I appoint, devise, and bequeath my real estate and the residue of my personal estate to my trustees upon trust to sell or convert the same into money, and to pay and divide the proceeds (after paying my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses) equally between the four children of my deceased sister Jane Cutbush" (including the said trustees) "or such of them as shall be living at my decease."

It appeared that under the will of her father, William Mayhew, dated the 27th of March, 1858, in the matter of the trusts of which this originating summons was taken out, the testatrix had a power of appointment over a certain part of his personal estate; the words of the power were as follows:

"Upon trust as to one equal undivided moiety or half part . . . upon trust for the children of my said daughter Maria, and in default of children for my grandchildren or others as my said daughter Maria shall by will appoint, in like manner as I have directed and declared with respect to my daughter Matilda as if the same were here again repeated as to my daughter Maria."

The reference was to a gift in favour of the husband and children of Matilda, with remainders over to the children.

The testatrix, Maria Mayhew, died on the 18th of September, 1900.

This summons was taken out by one of the trustees of the testator to have it determined (inter alia) whether the power of appointment given by his will to his daughter Maria over the share of his estate given in trust for her during her life with remainders over was a general power or a special power, and whether by her will she exercised such power of appointment.

FARWELL, J., after argument, first decided that the power of appointment given by her father's will to the testatrix was a special, not a general, power.

The second question was then argued.

C. L. Coote, for the plaintiff, a trustee.

J. G. Butcher, K.C., and J. Gatey, for the children of Jane Cutbush.—The power has been exercised. Evidence that she had power of appointment must be admissible, for otherwise the court cannot decide whether it has been exercised: In re Milner, Bray v. Milner, 47 W. R. 369, [1899] 1 Ch. 563. Assuming that, it is a question of intention, and when once you derive an intention to exercise (and here the testatrix had no other power), then the use of words like "my personal estate," or a direction to pay debts, &c., is not enough to show the contrary: see the principle laid down in In re Williams, Foulkes v. Williams, 42 Ch. D. 93, at p. 97, 37 W. R. Dig. 137. As to the bare use here of the word "appoint," it is a legal term necessarily referring to some power of appointment: see Pidgely v. Pidgely, 1 Coll. Ch. Cas. 255; In re Teape's Trusts, 21 W. R. 780, L. R. 16 Eq. 442; Cowx v. Foster, 1 J. & H. 30; and In re Swinburne, Swinburne v. Pitt, 33 W. R. 394, 27 Ch. D. 696. At any rate, if words are used in a deed which are not appropriate, then the court will put aside their literal meaning and construe the words as if they were used appropriately. If the word "power" is used, and an intention to exercise it is shown, it is well settled that that is enough to exercise it; so here, where there is the word "appoint" and the intention, it is enough.

J. S. Green and J. A. Hay, for different parties entitled in default of the exercise of the powers.—The onus is on the other side affirmatively to show that the power is exercised: In re Mills, Mills v. Mills, 35 W. R. 133, 34 Ch. D. 186. The intention can only be gathered from the will itself, and where the fund is only personalty, as here, there must be some reference either to the power or to the property subject to the power, and here there is neither. We rely on the dictum of Chatterton, V.C., in In re Richardson's Trusts, 17 L. R. Ir. 436, where he says, at p. 442, 35 W. R. Dig. 151, that "property which was not that of the testatrix, but over which she had a special power of appointment, cannot, without the aid of a strong context, be held to be described by these words. No such context exists here except merely, the word 'appoint'"; and the decision in that case was that there was no indication of an intention to exercise the power.

The cases of In re Cotton, 37 W. R. 232, 40 Ch. D. 41; In re Sharland, [1899] 2 Ch. 536, 48 W. R. Dig. 142; In re Huddleston, 43 W. R. 139, [1894] 3 Ch. 595; In re Hayes, 49 W. R. 21, [1900] 2 Ch. 332, were also referred to; also section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26).

FARWELL, J.—This case is very near the line. On the whole I come to the conclusion that the power is exercised. [Here his lordship read the will of the testatrix.] The testatrix had a limited power of appointment among the grandchildren of her father, obviously including her sister's children. Therefore there is a gift to the objects of the special power. It is plain on the authorities that the mere fact of a direction to pay debts, funeral and testamentary expenses out of the fund subject to a power is not enough to exclude the idea of an intention to execute a power of appointment. Further, there is evidence that here she had no other power. It was suggested that this evidence was not admissible, but I think that it is admissible both on the authorities and on principle, when the court finds the word "appoint" in a will. When there is a devise of real estate, I have to find whether in fact the testator had real estate, and similarly when the testator makes an appointment over personalty, I have to inquire whether there is a power to appoint personalty. I therefore here start with this, that I have it in evidence that she had a special power and no other. Now, the word "appoint" is a word of art, referring to powers only. I do not say that, if there were not the other words, the word "appoint" would not carry all the property. But here I have all three words "appoint, devise, and bequeath;" the word "appoint" in this collocation contains, in my opinion, a necessary reference to a power, and I therefore read it as if it were "in exercise of every power I devise, bequeath, and appoint." I think this is the true view of a will like this, using all three words. At first I felt some difficulty as to whether it would be enough to limit the reference to a general power. The words "my personal estate" might seem to point to this view, but the same thing might have been said as to both In re Teape's Trusts and In re Swinburne, especially the latter, where the words were "might have any testamentary power of disposition." But it was held to be a sufficient reference to a power. Here there is "devise and bequeath" which, under section 27 of the Wills Act, would be enough to execute the general power. Therefore no violence is done to the will in thinking that in its words there is enough to execute the special power. The only point which made me hesitate was the expression of opinion (not a decision) of Chatterton, V.C., in In re Richardson's Trusts, at p. 442 of 17 L. R. Ir. 436. That is a dictum of the Vice-Chancellor with which, with all respect to him, if he had applied it to the present case, I could not have agreed. I think there is here sufficient context to show that the word "appoint" applies and refers to and exercises the special power.

Bankruptcy — Deed of arrangement — Registration — Foreign debtor — Mobilia sequuntur personam — Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict c. 57), s. 5.

The provision of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, requiring that a deed of arrangement shall be void unless registered in accordance with the Act does not apply to a deed executed abroad by a foreign debtor.

Two foreigners trading as V. & Co., having personal property situated in England, executed in their own country a deed assigning all their property, wherever situated, to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The deed was not registered under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887. It was good and unimpeachable in the country in which it was made, and would have been sufficient to pass property according to English law had it been duly registered. A creditor of V. & Co., having obtained judgment against them, issued execution against their goods in England. The trustee claimed the goods.

Held, in an interpleader issue, that the trustee was entitled to the goods as against the execution creditor.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, J.—The facts are not in dispute and are as follows: Christian Defries and Minnie Defries, his wife, carried on business as partners under the style of "The Charles A. Vogeler Co.," as manufacturers and vendors of drugs and patent medicines. They were domiciled in the State of Maryland. They carried on business at Baltimore and also in London, Paris, and Sydney, and elsewhere. Their business in London was managed for them by a manager. They resided at Baltimore and, so far as appears, had never been in England. By deed, dated the 18th of December, 1899, and executed at Baltimore, Christian and Minnie Defries assigned all their estate, real and personal and mixed and wheresoever situated, to Henry S. Dulaney (who also was domiciled in Maryland) for the benefit of their creditors. Dulaney afterwards petitioned the Circuit Court of Baltimore City and obtained authority to "administer his trust under the authority of that court." Subsequently the other plaintiffs in the present issue were duly appointed co-trustees with Dulaney. They also are domiciled in Maryland. It was proved before me by the evidence of experts that the deed was good according to the law of Maryland and that the property became duly vested in Dulaney. That this was effected by the operation of the deed—that is, by the act of the parties and not of the court—and that the proceedings in court were analogous to the administration of an estate in our Courts of Chancery, and operated to give protection and indemnity to the trustee. That the deed could have been impeached within a limited time by bankruptcy proceedings in Maryland, but that the period had elapsed without any such proceedings having been taken, and that the deed was consequently now unimpeachable in Maryland. That under the deed, and also under the bankruptcy law now established in Maryland, local creditors would have no preference over foreign creditors, and that English creditors and other foreign creditors would rank pari passu with the American creditors in the administration of the estate under the deed. It further appeared that, after the execution of the deed, proceedings were taken under the bankruptcy law of this country to make the "Charles A. Vogeler Co." bankrupts on the ground, amongst others, that the execution of the deed was an act of bankruptcy, that it had been held by the Court of Appeal, and ultimately by the House of Lords, that there was no jurisdiction to adjudicate them bankrupts as they were domiciled foreigners who had not brought themselves within the jurisdiction of our courts, and that they had not committed an act of bankruptcy available here by the execution of the deed abroad. The decision of the Court of Appeal is reported under the name of In re A. B. & Co., 48 W. R. 424, [1900] 1 Q. B. 541, and the decision of the House of Lords has been reported, in the name of Cooke v. The Charles A. Vogeler Co., [1901] A. C. 102, since the argument before me. An interim receiver was appointed in those bankruptcy proceedings, but on the 28th of February, 1900, after the decision of the Court of Appeal, the receiver gave up possession of the goods of Vogeler & Co. in this country to one Baffham, the agent in this country of the plaintiffs, the trustees under the deed, acting under power of attorney for them. On the 5th of March, 1900, the defendants in this issue, who had obtained judgment against Vogeler & Co., caused execution to be levied on the goods so in the possession of Baffham, under a writ of execution which had been delivered to the sheriff on the same day. The usual interpleader proceedings were taken, and I now have to decide whether the plaintiffs had a good title as against the defendants, the execution creditors.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The deed of arrangement was never registered in this country under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, and it seems clear that this non-registration is the only difficulty which stands in the plaintiffs' way. But for this statute the deed is clearly sufficient to pass the property, according to the law of this country as well as according to the law of Maryland. Mr. Muir Mackenzie did, at the commencement of the case, suggest that the deed might be bad under the statute of Elizabeth, but he withdrew this point when it became clear, on the evidence of the experts, that the foreign law applicable to the deed gave no preference to native over foreign creditors. Mr. Danckwerts for the plaintiffs relied on the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam and quoted the judgment of Lord Loughborough in Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 665, at p. 690, where he says, "It is a clear proposition not only of the law of England but of every country in the world where law has the semblance of science, that personal property has no locality, but that it is subject to that law which governs the person of its owners. With respect to the disposition of it, with respect to the transmission of it, either by succession or the act of the party, it follows the law of the person. The owner in any country may dispose of personal property. If he does, it is not the law of the country in which the property is, but the law of the country of which he was a subject which will regulate the succession." But, although this is the general rule, it is perhaps somewhat too broadly stated in the decision; at all events the rule is subject to exceptions. I was referred by Mr. Muir Mackenzie to a passage in Story's Conflict of Laws (s. 423*a*) which, after stating the law as to movables and that their disposition and the adjustment of priorities and privileges in reference to them follows the law of the domicil of their owner, proceeds: "Exceptions may doubtless exist where the law of the country, in which either movable or immovable property is situate, prescribes a different rule, which must then be obeyed"; again, in section 550, it is said "a nation within whose territory any personal property is actually situate has an entire dominion over it while therein, in point of sovereignty and jurisdiction, as it has over immovable property situate therein. It may regulate its transfer and subject it to process and execution and provide for and control the uses and disposition of it to the same extent that it may exert its authority over immovable property." The exceptions to the general rule are somewhat similarly stated in several modern text-books, but the authorities in point are few. I find, however, that Kay, L.J., in Alcock v. Smith, [1892] 1 Ch. D. 238, at p. 267, 40 W. R. Dig. 25, says: "As to personal chattels it is settled that the validity of a transfer depends not upon the law of the domicil of the owner but upon the law of the country in which the transfer takes place. Our own law as to distress and market overt is illustrative of this. The goods of a foreigner distrained in a house tenanted by an Englishman in this country may be sold for the tenant's rent and the purchaser acquires a perfect title, whatever may be the law of the owner's domicil. So the goods of a foreigner, sold here in market overt by one who had no title to them, could not be recovered from the purchaser. In both cases the property would pass to him by our law." Further, he quotes Cammell v. Sewell, 8 W. R. 639, 3 H. & N. 617, 5 H. & N. 728, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 45, a case in which a sale in Norway, good according to the law there, of the goods of an Englishman, was held good also by our courts. It seems clear that a transfer of movables here good by our law would here be held good, notwithstanding that it might not comply with formalities required by the law of the domicil of the owner, but there has not been quoted to me nor have I found any clear case of a transfer, good according to the law of the domicil of the owner, but held bad for not conforming to the law of the country where the goods are situate. Of course registered stock, such as Consols, can only be transferred according to the regulations under which the register is kept, but this, though possibly an illustration of the rule laid down by Kay, L.J., seems to depend on the special nature of the property. Some cases also were quoted by Mr. Muir Mackenzie which appear to be illustrative merely of the rule that the lex fori must govern all questions of procedure and of the form of the remedy. The instance which most clearly shows how far the law of each country is applicable is that of a will. If the surviving partners of the Baltimore firm had died leaving a will, the validity of that will would depend on Maryland law. If one witness were sufficient by that law we should hold a will so witnessed good, although our law requires two witnesses. But, although we should recognize the title of the executor under the foreign will, we should require him to take out probate here and should not allow him to deal with goods in this country without taking probate. This is a distinct instance in which our law, while recognizing the foreign disposition of movables, requires something further to be done here before it is acted on, but the case is probably to be accounted for by the probate being the only evidence of the title of the executor which our courts recognize and is part of the lex fori necessarily applicable. On this part of the case, therefore, although no very distinct authority, other than the passage in Story, can be found, I cannot doubt that Mr. Muir Mackenzie is right in saying that it is within the competence of the Legislature of this country to enact rules as to the passing of property situated in this country, and to say that the property in goods situated here, which has been dealt with by foreign owners in accordance with the law of their domicil, shall not pass by such dealing unless certain formalities, imposed by our law, are also complied with; and, indeed, Mr. Danckwerts does not dispute that, if our law does prohibit the transaction which he relies on in this case, effect must be given by our courts to the prohibition, though he contends, as I understand him, that our law is to be disregarded when it goes the length of prohibiting the foreign transaction. The question I have to decide, therefore, seems to reduce itself to one of construction of the Act of 1887. But in order to arrive at that construction we must proceed in the way very clearly defined by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords in Cooke v. The Charles A. Vogeler Co. I may paraphrase the language and say "If the law has intended, and has expressed its intention, that a deed executed abroad by a foreigner shall be registered before it can pass property situate in this country, no court has any jurisdiction to disregard what the Legislature has enacted. And if, on the other hand, it is manifest that the language of the statute does not reach the case supposed, no court has jurisdiction to enlarge the ambit of English legislation beyond what the Legislature has permitted." It is necessary carefully to consider the Deeds of Arrangement Act."

The object of the Act appears to be to secure to creditors information concerning private arrangements outside bankruptcy by making it necessary to register the deeds and to file an estimate of assets and liabilities. Creditors thus become in a position to exercise their option of coming in under the deed, or of treating it as an act of bankruptcy and having the estate administered in bankruptcy. Deeds acquire no validity by the fact of their registration, and deeds to which the Act applies would, if executed by a debtor subject to our bankruptcy law, be acts of bankruptcy. The Act, therefore, seems to be supplementary of the law of bankruptcy, and we expect to find it made applicable to the same persons as the bankruptcy laws. The decision of the House of Lords shows that the word "debtor" in the Bankruptcy Acts is to be confined to debtors who are subject to the English bankruptcy laws, and I have come to the conclusion, though not without much doubt, that this Act must be limited in a similar way. If the Act applies to deeds executed by debtors not subject to our bankruptcy laws, its effect would be to enable the first creditors, who put in an execution, to get paid in full without the other creditors having any means of securing a rateable distribution of assets. for the deed would not be available as an act of bankruptcy as shown by Cooke v. The Charles A. Vogeler Co., and the suffering a levy by execution and sale would not be an act of bankruptcy as shown by Ex parte Blain, In re Sawers, 28 W. R. 334, 12 Ch. D. 522. This result would be anomalous, and, I think, unjust, but nevertheless it may be the true construction of the statute, and some further examination of the enacting words is necessary. The first matter commented on before me was the second section, "This Act shall not extend to Scotland." A similar clause in the Bankruptcy Act was also commented on in the case in the House of Lords, and I cannot say that it has no bearing on the point, but I myself attach very little weight to it. I think this section merely means that it is not intended by the Act to alter the law of Scotland. We have but one Legislature to enact the laws for England and for Scotland, but the laws of the two countries are very different, and even when it is desired to make a law to take effect in England and in Scotland it is often impracticable, by reason of this existing difference in the laws of the two countries, to make the alterations in the law of both by the same Act of Parliament. Moreover, the law of Scotland might, so far as I know, in 1887 have already included provision for the registration of deeds, or something which would obviate the mischief intended to be remedied in England by the Act of 1887. Passing on, the fourth section defines the deeds, to which the Act is to apply, as including deeds (afterwards again specified) made by or in respect of the affairs of a debtor for the benefit of his creditors generally, otherwise than in pursuance of the law for the time being in force relating to bankruptcy. The reference here to the laws of bankruptcy is, of course, accounted for by the fact that the Bankruptcy Act then in force, as well as a prior Act and also a subsequent one, has provided for deeds being executed in certain cases, and registration of such deeds was, of course, unnecessary, but the reference seems to assume the debtor to be one subject to the bankruptcy law. If debtor is read in this section in the same way as the House of Lords read it in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. the present deed would not be within the Act. The fifth section enacts that a deed to which the Act applies shall be void unless registered in a limited time. Now it could not have been intended that such a deed as the present should be void altogether. It must operate on the goods in Baltimore, and the Legislature could never have intended to enact to the contrary. It is necessary, therefore, to read the section with some limitations, and Mr. Muir Mackenzie asks me to read it "void as to goods in this country." The next words in the section go on to show that it is contemplated that a deed to which the Act applies may be executed out of England or Ireland, but these words are required to meet the case of an absconding debtor, subject to our bankruptcy laws, who goes abroad and then executes a deed for the benefit of his creditors. The period for registration is undoubtedly so short as to be very inconvenient if it is to apply to a deed such as the present, which goes a little to show that such a deed was not contemplated, but the difficulty might perhaps be met in practice by section 9. Then section 6, sub-section 2, provides that the original deed is to be produced, and that it is to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp on the value of the property passing by it. The production of the original of a foreign deed would almost always be inconvenient and sometimes impossible. Mr. Danckwerts pointed out that by the law of many foreign countries an original of a deed is in a notary's book and is kept by him, and that the grantees get nothing but notarial copies. One would think that, if foreign deeds were to be included, the production of the original would be dispensed with by the Act. Further, if the Act were intended to apply to foreign deeds, the Legislature would have made the ad valorem stamp on the value, not of the whole property passing, but of that within the jurisdiction. Then the 13th section seems to assume that every debtor executing a deed to which the Act applies must have his place of business or reside either in the London bankruptcy district, or in Ireland, or else in some "county court district"—i.e., either in Ireland, England, or Wales—for by the expression "county courts" English county courts, which have bankruptcy jurisdiction, are clearly meant, and not foreign courts.

Thus a critical examination of the words of the Act of Parliament seems to show that the Legislature certainly had not in their contemplation a deed by foreign debtors operating on property abroad as well as property here. The fact that the Legislature overlooked this particular case is, however, hardly enough to justify a court in saying that it is not included. If the operative words of the Act in their ordinary meaning clearly included the case, and there was no legislative principle by which those words could be qualified, the case must be held within the Act, notwithstanding that there was reason to think that it had been in fact overlooked by the Legislature. Here the operative words of the Act read shortly are "a deed made by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors shall be registered, and shall be void if not registered." Is there any legitimate way of reading these words so as not to include the deed of a foreigner? Besides the small matters in the Act on which I have commented, I think there is some limitation required. The Act cannot mean that such a deed will be void as regards the property situate abroad; as pointed out in the House of Lords all legislation is primarily territorial and not intended to control persons not subject to the jurisdiction. It is, at least, as legitimate to read "debtor" as meaning "debtor subject to our jurisdiction" as it is to say the word "void" means "void as regards property within our jurisdiction." And when we find that in an Act in pari materia the word debtor does bear that meaning, I think it is more legitimate to put here the same limitation than a different one. I bear in mind Mr. Muir Mackenzie's observation that the House of Lords proceeded very much on the fact that bankruptcy affects the personal status, and that English legislation could not affect the status of foreigners, and although these domiciled foreigners never submitted themselves personally to the jurisdiction of an English court, they did subject some of their goods to our English law by leaving them here, as the illustration of Kay, L.J., as to the law of distress clearly shows. It would, therefore, be within the competence of the English Legislature to say that these foreigners should only transfer those goods by registered deed. But this Act is not an Act regulating the transfer of property. It includes deeds of composition where no property passes, and if, therefore, there is to be a limitation in the generality of the operative words in it, that limitation should be rather on the deeds that come within it than on the property. As the Act includes only some deeds, a limitation, which takes a class of deeds—those executed abroad by foreigners—out of the Act altogether, does less violence to the language of the Act than a limitation which makes some deeds, to which the Act does apply, void in part, when the Act says they are to be void altogether.

On the whole, it seems to me that, acting on the same authority as the House of Lords did, I am justified in putting on this Act the same limitation as they put on the Bankruptcy Act, and saying that "debtor" means "debtor subject to the Bankruptcy Acts." This interpretation has the advantage of preventing the unseemly scramble for the English goods of foreign debtors which would take place if this deed were held to be within the supplementary branch of the law of bankruptcy as to deeds for the benefit of creditors, yet not within the general law of bankruptcy, so that the makers of the deed would be adjudged bankrupt. In the view I take there is no English law which requires this deed to be registered. Consequently there is no lex rei sitæ to interfere with the operation of the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam. I therefore hold that the plaintiffs have established a good title against the execution creditor, and find the issue for the plaintiffs and with costs of the issue.

BURTON v. VESTRY OF ST. GILES AND ST. GEORGE, BLOOMSBURY. (a.)

Metropolis — Rating—Appeal—Valuation list—Alteration in list striking out whole amount of rate—Rates paid during appeals—Right to recover—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 44.

The plaintiff, an advertising contractor, was entered in a provisional valuation list as the occupier of an advertising station and hoarding. He appealed against the valuation list to the assessment committee and the quarter sessions, on the ground that he was not the rateable occupier. The quarter sessions confirmed the assessment, subject to a case for the opinion of the High Court. The High Court held that the plaintiff was not the rateable occupier, and ordered the entry of the plaintiff as occupier to be struck out in the valuation list. While these proceedings on appeal were pending, the plaintiff had paid several rates, two of which were paid after summonses to enforce the payment of the same had been taken out

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled, under section 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, to recover the whole amount of the rates so paid, including those paid after summonses had been taken out, as the entire alteration of the whole amount of the rate was an "alteration in such valuation list" within the meaning of the section.

Action tried before Mathew, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff claimed the repayment of sums paid by him to the defendants amounting to £92 6s. 4d. in respect of rates.

The rates so claimed to be recovered back were paid by the plaintiff on the 6th of August, 1897, on the 21st of February, 1898, the 12th of March, 1898, the 24th of June, 1898, and the 26th of August, 1898, and two of these sums—namely, the rates paid on the 12th of March, 1898, and on the 21st of February, 1898, had been paid after a summons for their recovery had been taken out.

The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to the repayment on the ground of the alteration of the supplemental valuation list for the parish of St. George, Bloomsbury, in consequence of an appeal by him against that list.

The facts, which were admitted, were as follows: The plaintiff carried on business in London as an advertising contractor under the name of Partington & Co.; and the defendants were by virtue of their local Act (11 Geo. 4, c. x.), overseers of the united parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George, Bloomsbury.

The plaintiff, in the course of his business, which was that of displaying advertisements for persons desiring to advertise, obtained licences from builders and others to affix advertisements on the exterior of hoardings erected during building operations, and he then affixed to the hoardings the advertisements which he had agreed to exhibit.

In a provisional valuation list made for the parish of St. George, the defendants in June, 1897, inserted the plaintiff as being the rateable occupier of an "advertising station" and of a "hoarding" situate at Southampton-row in that parish.

In June, 1898, the plaintiff gave notice of objection to the valuation list on the ground that he was not the occupier legally rateable in respect of the advertising station or the hoarding. The assessment committee confirmed the assessment, and the plaintiff appealed to the quarter sessions, sitting as the general assessment sessions under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and the Local Government Act, 1888, and in February, 1899, the quarter sessions dismissed the appeal, subject to a case for the opinion of the High Court

In January, 1900, the Queen's Bench Division allowed the plaintiff's appeal, and ordered that the entry of the plaintiff as the occupier of the advertising station and of the hoarding in the list should be struck out: Burton v. Assessment Committee of St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George, Bloomsbury, 48 W. R. 222, [1900] 1 Q. B. 389.

On the 27th of February, 1900, the quarter sessions ordered the name of the plaintiff as occupier to be struck out in the supplemental valuation list, but the name had not in fact been struck out in pursuance of this order.

The plaintiff now sought to recover the rates so paid by him, which the defendants admitted they had received. The defendants refused to refund the rates on the ground that by section 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, as no alteration had been made in the list "which altered the amount of the assessments, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder" the plaintiff was not entitled to have the rates refunded.

Section 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), enacts: "Notwithstanding any appeal under this Act which may be pending at the commencement of the year, the valuation list shall come into force unaltered, and every assessment, contribution, rate, and tax in respect of which the valuation list is conclusive, shall be made, required, levied, and paid in accordance with such valuation list; and where in consequence of the decision on any appeal under this Act to assessment sessions or a superior court, an alteration in such valuation list is made which alters the amount of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder, the difference, if too much has been paid, shall be repaid or allowed, and if too little shall be deemed to be arrears of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax (except so far as any penalty is incurred on account of arrears), and shall be paid and recovered accordingly."

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

R. Cunningham Glen (Bethune with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was held not to be the rateable occupier and not liable to pay these rates. He can, under section 44, recover from the defendants the rates which he has been called upon to pay. Section 44 applies to the case. In this case in consequence of the decision of the Divisional Court on the plaintiff's appeal an alteration was made which altered the amount of the assessment. It was ordered by the quarter sessions that the plaintiff's name should be struck out of the valuation list; but in fact the rating was not altered in the valuation list. It makes no difference that the alteration was not in fact made. The order takes effect from the time it was made, and the alteration must be taken to have been made as ordered. There was thus an "alteration" in the amount of the rate, and it is none the less an alteration within section 44 because the whole amount has been altered and has in fact been struck out. There has therefore been such an "alteration" which altered the amount of the rate as entitles the plaintiff to recover under section 44.

Macmorran, Q.C. (W. C. Ryde with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiff adopted a wrong procedure. Instead of appealing against the valuation list, which is only conclusive as to amounts, but not as to the names of occupiers, he ought to have waited until rates were demanded; then, if he were not the occupier, he could refuse to pay, and if he were summoned for the rates before the magistrates he could then defend himself by showing, if he could show it, that he was not the occupier. He ought to have raised the defence of not being the occupier in that way, and not by appealing to the quarter sessions against the valuation list. His appeal on that ground was futile, as he was appealing against the valuation list on a ground for which that list is not conclusive. Section 44 does not apply here at all. The occupier is first placed on a provisional list; then that list passes into the supplemental list. Then the person rated has a right of appeal as to amount; and if on such appeal he is found to have paid too much, he can recover back the difference under the section. The appeal here was not against the amount, but against the valuation list. No alteration has been made as to the amount. The amount remains as it was before, and the only effect of the decision was that the plaintiff was struck out as not being the occupier. Non-occupation may always be shown before the magistrates on a summons for the rates: Ryde on Rating, pp. 570-571, where the authorities on the point are collected. If, on appeal against the rate itself, an alteration had been made in the amount of the rate, then section 44 would have applied; but where, as here, there was an appeal against the valuation list, on the ground that the person rated was not the occupier, and where the decision merely was that the person rated was not legally rateable as occupier, no change being made in the amount, the section does not apply. The vestries are merely conduit pipes to collect and pay over these sums to others, and they have no moneys in their hands from which they could refund these rates. With regard to two of the rates, they were paid after summonses for them were taken out. They were thus paid under compulsion of law, and as to these they at all events cannot be recovered.

R. C. Glen in reply.

MATHEW, J.—It seems to me that section 44 does apply to the claim made by the plaintiff in this case. It has been argued for the defendants that the appeal contemplated by section 44 is not an appeal on the ground that the appellant was not the occupier of the premises for which he is rated; and it was said that any such objection as that must be dealt with differently—namely, as a defence upon an application made to the magistrates to enforce payment of the rates. If the earlier words of the section were alone to be looked at, there would be something in favour of the defendants' contention. It says: "Notwithstanding any appeal under this Act," &c.; but the section goes on to say that "where in consequence of the decision on any appeal under this Act to assessment sessions or a superior court, an alteration in such valuation list is made which alters the amount of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder, the difference, if too much has been paid, shall be repaid or allowed." In this case what occurred was that the plaintiff appealed to the quarter sessions on the ground that he was not the occupier. The quarter sessions reserved its judgment subject to a case to be stated for the opinion of the High Court, and on the case coming before the Queen's Bench Division it was held by them that the plaintiff was not the occupier, and was not liable to be rated. The only question now is whether the fact that the plaintiff has been held to be liable for no part of the rate is an "alteration" in the valuation list within the meaning of the section. Objection was taken for the defendants that this money was received by the vestry, and has been paid away, and that it would be very hard, or contrary to law, that they should be compelled to repay the money as to which they were mere agents or conduit pipes to hand it over. That argument would strike away the whole of the section, because the same argument would apply equally in the cases to which counsel for the defendants said the section was confined, those cases—namely, where there is an alteration in the amount not going to the whole of the rate. But the Act has provided for repayment in that very case where there is an alteration in the valuation list which alters the amount of the rate. The question then is reduced to an extremely narrow one, whether an entire alteration of the rate is an alteration within the meaning of the section. I am of opinion that it is. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount he has paid. As to two of the assessments, it seems that they were paid after summonses had been taken out. They were thus paid by compulsion of law in the sense that they were paid after proceedings had been taken before the magistrates to enforce payment. There was no appeal against these two rates, but there was an appeal against the valuation list on which the rates were made. I think these two rates must follow the fate of the others. They are all cases in which an "alteration" has been made in the valuation list which entitles the plaintiff to recover what he has paid My judgment, therefore, will be for the plaintiff for the amount claimed—namely, £92 6s. 4d., with costs.

FRASER & WHITE v. BEE. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Pilot paid by charterers—Damage to vessel due to pilot—Payment of hire during repairs.

The plaintiffs chartered the defendant's ship for the period of twenty-five years, with the option of purchase, the ship to be employed "between safe ports of the Continent of Europe where she may always safely lie." By the charter-party the charterers were to pay for pilotages, and, in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel, the payment of hire should cease until the vessel should be again in an efficient state to resume her services. The negligence of the pilot, master, mariners, and other servants of the owner was mutually excepted.

While under charge of a pilot, the ship grounded in getting to her berth in a harbour, and, in consequence, she was prevented working for three weeks. The berth was a safe berth, and the grounding was due to the negligence of the pilot.

Held, that the pilot, though paid by the charterers, was not their servant, and therefore the charterers were not bound to pay hire during the period that the ship was in dock undergoing repairs.

Commercial cause.

The plaintiffs were the charterers and the defendant was the owner of The Sir Bevis, a steamship of 1,200 tons dead-weight capacity. The charter-party, dated the 24th of February, 1899, was for a period of twenty-five years, with an option to purchase, the rate of hire being £300 per month. The ship was to be employed in lawful trades "between safe ports of the Continent of Europe where she may always safely lie." The charter-party provided that the owner should provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain and crew, and that the charterers should pay for (inter alia) pilotages; that in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel the payment of hire should cease until the vessel should be again in an efficient state to resume her services; the negligence of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the owner was mutually excepted.

On the 2nd of April, 1900, The Sir Bevis was on a voyage from Hartlepool to Cowes, when the plaintiffs desired to change her destination, and they accordingly sent a pilot on board at Spithead with orders that the vessel was to go to a berth in the Camber, an arm of Portsmouth Harbour. The pilot took the ship into the harbour, but she grounded near the entrance to the Camber by reason of about 16 feet of a telegraph cable, which crosses the harbour at that point, getting wound round the screw. Repairs being necessary, the plaintiffs claimed exemption from the payment of hire during the three weeks these took to carry out.

The defendant pleaded that the berth to which the ship had been ordered was not a safe one; that the accident was due to the negligence of the pilot, who, he alleged, was the plaintiffs' servant.

Scott Fox, Q.C., and Adair Roche, for the plaintiffs.

Robson, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the defendant

MATHEW, J.—In my judgment the berth in question from the evidence given must be regarded as a safe one. There would have been no difficulty in taking in a ship of the size of The Sir Bevis or even a larger one if proper care had been exercised. The accident was solely due to the act of the pilot. He alone was responsible. If the plaintiffs are to bear the loss, that liability must be found in the charter-party. Was there, then, anything in the charter-party imposing upon them liability for the acts of the pilot? On behalf of the defendant the extraordinary contention was put forward that the pilot was the servant of the charterers. They relied on a clause in the charter-party to the effect that the charterers should provide and pay for, among other things, pilotage. In my judgment that clause was no foundation for the defendant's argument. The fact that the owners were to pay the captain and crew and the charterers the pilot did not make the pilot their servant, and he had no authority to involve them in liability. The plaintiffs took him on board because he happened to be the pilot who had always been employed on the ship at Portsmouth before the charter-party was entered into. For these reasons the plaintiffs must succeed, for they have made out their case that they were not bound to pay for the hire of the ship during the time that she was prevented from working.

Probate — Grant of administration — Heir-at-law not cited—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77). s. 73 —Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 2, sub-section 4.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 2, sub-section 4, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and the fact that the heir-at-law of an intestate had not been cited, the court granted administration under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857, to one of the next-of-kin, the heir-at-law being abroad and his address being unknown.

Motion.

George Blenkinsop died on the 11th of May, 1898, a bachelor and intestate, without father, but leaving a mother surviving him.

The applicant, Susan Elliott Haggie, was the sister of the deceased, and was entitled under the will of his grandfather to one-seventh of the residuary real and personal estate, which was valued at £803.

John Blenkinsop, the heir-at-law of the intestate, left this country some twenty years ago, and had last been heard of in September, 1898; his whereabouts were unknown, and in consequence he had not been cited. The registrar refused to issue a grant of administration to the applicant on the ground that the heir-at-law was equally entitled with the next-of-kin to the grant, having regard to section 2, sub-section 4. of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, which enacts that "where a person dies possessed of real estate, the court shall, in granting letters of administration, have regard to the rights and interests of persons interested in his real estate, and his heir-at-law, if not one of the next-of-kin, shall be equally entitled to the grant with the next-of-kin, and provision shall be made by rules of court for adapting the procedure and practice in the grant of letters of administration to the case of real estate."

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The applicant accordingly now moved the court for the grant of administration.

Barnard, for the applicant, contended that the court would generally order the grant to issue to the party to whom the bulk of the property would go.

BARNES, J., held that the grant might go as prayed for to the applicant on justifying security being given.

Company — Director — Fiduciary character—Contracts with company — Declaration of interest—Collateral profits.

The articles of association of a company provided that the rules as to vacating the office of director should be subject to the exception that "No director shall vacate his office by reason of his being a member of any company or partnership which has entered into contracts with, or done any work for, the company, or by reason of his being interested, either in his individual capacity or as a member of any company or partnership, in any adventure or undertaking in which the company may also have an interest."

Held, that, having regard to the above article, a director was not liable to account for profits arising out of contracts with another company or partnership in which he was a shareholder or partner.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Byrne, J. (48 W. R. 553, [1900] 1 Ch. 756).

The facts are given at length in the report in the court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—RIGBY, L.J., said this was an action brought by the Costa Rica Railway Co. against Sir Arthur Forwood, the ground of the action being that the defendant, being a director of, and in a fiduciary position to, the plaintiff company, had made profits which he had not disclosed to the company. The equitable doctrine that a person in a fiduciary relation who made a secret profit was bound to give it up to the principal for whom he was acting was a very salutary one, and he hoped that it would not be infringed upon in this or in any other case, because it was found to be the only means of making sure that a man would do his duty under circumstances of unusual difficulty. It did not depend upon fraud; and there was no suggestion in the present case of anything like fraud on the part of Sir Arthur Forwood. It did not, however, follow that the defendant, without his being aware of it, might not have done something which was contrary to that rule. The action had reference to three contracts called respectively the construction contract, the banana contract, and the syndicate contract, which for the present purpose might be treated as contemporaneous. His lordship then discussed in detail the provisions of the banana contract, and said that it was clear from that contract that the two steamship companies (the Atlas Co. and Phipps & Co.) and the railway company under the management of Keith & Co. were working in concert to carry on the exportation of bananas from Costa Rica to New York and New Orleans, and that it was proposed to continue the working in concert, and further that the railway company treated Keith and the two steamship companies as the persons entitled to dispose of the bananas which were shipped from Port Limon. The contract obviously contemplated that the steamship companies should have a direct interest in the bananas themselves and in the profits to arise from the proceeds. The syndicate contract was to supplement and give effect to arrangements made between the parties, which, though perfectly understood, yet required to be reduced into writing. Those arrangements related to the division of profits arising from the sale of the bananas. The railway company were of course not parties to that agreement, and it was a matter of absolute indifference to them how the profits were divided as between the steamship companies and Keith. How, then, was it possible to say that they ought to have been informed of this agreement? Only in this way, that Sir Arthur Forwood was a director of the railway company, and was known by the company to take an important interest as a shareholder in the Atlas Co., and as a partner in the firm of Leech, Harrison, & Forwood. The railway company knew perfectly well that Leech, Harrison, & Forwood were the managers of the Atlas Co., they knew that the Atlas Co. were intended to make profits out of the banana speculation, and they knew that Leech, Harrison, & Forwood were to be paid in some way. It was only by reason of Sir A. Forwood's fiduciary position that they could claim any interest in the syndicate contract, and it was only on that ground that they had an interest in knowing what was done under it. In the present case the general rule of equity as to secret profits by a person in a fiduciary position such as a director do not apply, because the matter was expressly dealt with by the articles of association. Primâ facie the provision would seem to have been inserted for the purpose of excepting from the general rule of equity any interest which Sir A. Forwood might take as a member of the Atlas Co. It was true that the article in terms applied only to the vacating the office of director, but it had been held by Lord Hatherley in the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association v. Coleman, 18 W. R. 570, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 558, that the effect was to relieve the director from the equitable rule. That was accepted by Lord Cairns for the purpose of his judgment on the appeal, 21 W. R. 696, L. R. 6 H. L. 189, at p. 205, though without affirming it. It had not since been questioned, and consequently the decision of Lord Hatherley was binding upon this court. His lordship therefore held that as regards Sir A. Forwood's interest in the Atlas Co. his estate was not liable to account. Then it was said that the profits in the firm of Leech, Harrison, & Forwood stood on a different footing; but that firm had no other position than as agents of the Atlas Co., and whatever they were paid out of the profits of the banana speculation would be merely a deduction from what otherwise would have gone to swell the profits of the company. His lordship therefore held that as regards the Atlas Co. Sir A. For-wood was protected by the articles of association, and as regards Leech, Harrison, & Forwood by the fact that the Atlas Co. could make what profits they liked, and that the payment to them was a deduction from those profits. The plaintiffs perfectly well knew that the contracts were to be made for profit. No attempt had been made to show that Sir A. Forwood did anything contrary to the articles. The appeal would therefore be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., agreed, and referred to Aberdeen Railway Co. v. Blaikie, 1 Macq. 461; Dunne v. English, L. R. 18 Eq. 524; Boston Fishing Co. v. Ansell, 39 Ch. D. 339, 37 W. R. Dig. 117, as showing the principles applicable to persons in a fiduciary position making secret profits. Starting with those propositions his lordship held that Sir Arthur Forwood had not been brought within the operation of those wholesome doctrines of equity; and, further, that the plaintiffs did in truth and in fact know of the defendant's interest.

STIRLING, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. SOWTER. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Churchwarden—Admission—Visitation of bishop—Inhibition to archdeacon—Jurisdiction of archdeacon.

Where the bishop, during his visitation, inhibits the archdeacon from admitting churchwardens, the bishop is the only person entitled to admit, and a mandamus to admit a churchwarden during the period covered by the inhibition will not lie to the archdeacon.

Rex v. Simpson, 1 Stra. 609, explained.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 170, [1901] 1 Q. B. 66) reversed.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) making absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus to the Archdeacon of Dorset, commanding him to admit one Samuel Vine as a churchwarden for the parish of Winterborne Came, in the archdeaconry of Dorset: reported ante, p. 170, [1901] 1 Q. B. 66.

At an election of churchwardens for the parish in May, 1900, Vine and Passmore were both candidates for the office of parishioners' churchwarden.

The rector of the parish, who presided, voted in favour of Vine, and the votes for both candidates being equal, he gave his casting vote for Vine and declared him elected.

On the 29th of May, before any admission of churchwarden to the office was made, the archdeacon was served with the Bishop of Salisbury's inhibition dated the 28th of May, and sent preparatory to the bishop's triennial visitation, inhibiting him for the space of three months from exercising within his archdeaconry "any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction concerning the visitation of the clergy, the admission of the churchwardens, the receiving of presentments, and the doing of any other act, matter, or thing appertaining to the visitation of a bishop."

In June the bishop admitted Passmore as churchwarden.

On the 13th of July Vine applied to the archdeacon to admit him. The archdeacon replied that he was not in a position to do so.

On the 24th of July a rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained as above, made returnable on the 4th of August.

The argument of the rule was heard on the 14th of November, when the Divisional Court made it absolute.

The archdeacon appealed.

Dibdin, for the appellant.

Edwardes Jones, for the respondent.

In addition to the authorities cited in the court below Lunne v. Dodson, 3 Salk. 201, was referred to.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In my opinion the Queen's Bench Division did not decide the real point in the case—namely, whether the rule nisi for a mandamus, which was obtained on the 24th of July against the archdeacon, ought ever to have been granted at all. The question is whether the rule was properly obtained against the archdeacon, and that depends upon the further question whether the duty of admitting churchwardens was one which lay within the domain of the bishop or of the archdeacon. It is said that the rule ought to have been obtained against the bishop, whose duty alone it was to admit churchwardens at that time. That is the point which we have to decide. Two persons named Vine and Passmore were candidates for the office of parishioners' churchwarden. Vine was elected by means of the vote of the rector of the parish. The point sought to be determined by the application for the mandamus is whether the rector was entitled to vote at the election of the parishioners' churchwarden. Vine having been declared elected, an application was made in July to the archdeacon to admit him as churchwarden, and unless at that time the matter was within the jurisdiction of the bishop by reason of the bishop's visitation and inhibition, the application would have been in order, and the proper person to apply to for admission would have been the archdeacon. The archdeacon, however, in answer to the application, said that, as the bishop's visitation was proceeding, and as he had been inhibited by the bishop from admitting churchwardens during the visitation, the inhibition not expiring until the 28th of August, the bishop was the only person entitled to admit. A rule nisi for a mandamus to the archdeacon to admit was obtained on the 24th of July—that is to say, before the inhibition had expired, and the rule was made returnable on the 4th of August, also before the expiration of the inhibition. Now it seems to me that the only point for our consideration is whether, during the period covered by the bishop's inhibition—that is, down to the 28th of August, the archdeacon or the bishop was the proper person to admit to the office of churchwarden. There does not seem to me to be the semblance of authority for saying that during that period the archdeacon was the proper person to admit. When I look at the inhibition I find that it bears out the contention of the archdeacon that during the period covered by the inhibition the jurisdiction of the archdeacon in that respect was suspended and the jurisdiction of the bishop came into operation. What is the meaning of that document? It cannot be treated as a mere piece of waste-paper. It seems to me that it is cogent evidence to show that the bishop had exclusive jurisdiction to admit churchwardens, and that the archdeacon's jurisdiction to admit, whether it is called an inferior jurisdiction or not, was suspended. In my opinion, during the period in question, the bishop had exclusive jurisdiction to admit churchwardens. The question whether the act of admission is a purely ministerial act is not material. The rule nisi for a mandamus was therefore directed to the archdeacon, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be commanded to do an act which he had no jurisdiction to do. In the court below the Lord Chief Justice said that the case of Rex v. Simpson, 1 Stra. 609, "has undoubtedly been treated as an authority for the point in many text-books; and as we are dealing with a temporal office it seems to me good sense that the mere prohibition by a spiritual authority in such a matter ought not to prevent the person whose duty it is to admit the elected person to the office from admitting him." With great respect that seems to beg the question, because the sole question is, Whose duty was it to admit? Therefore, when the archdeacon showed cause against the rule on the 14th of November, the rule ought to have been discharged, and we must now discharge it with costs here and below.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point when analyzed seems to me to be a simple one. The real mistake, if mistake there has been, in the court below arose because the minds of the judges were not directed to the real point—namely, whether the mandamus was addressed to the right person. It was addressed to the archdeacon during the bishop's visitation, when the bishop's inhibition was in force. It seems to me to be clear law that during the period when the inhibition was in force the ministerial duties of the archdeacon were suspended, or perhaps it would be more correct to say had lapsed and passed to the bishop. If so, the proper person to admit churchwardens, when the rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained, was the bishop and not the archdeacon, and the mandamus has gone to the wrong person. No question arises here as to whether the archdeacon had any duty, whether ministerial or not, to discharge in the performance of which he could be controlled by the bishop in the same way as an inferior court could be controlled by a superior court. No such question arises here, the whole point is whether the jurisdiction of the archdeacon had lapsed. Mr. Dibdin contended that it had, and referred us to the case of Lunne v. Dodson. From that case it appears clear that at the date of that case—and in my opinion the law has remained the same ever since—when the archbishop visited he inhibited the bishop, and when the bishop visited he inhibited the archdeacon, and this is put upon the ground of necessity of preventing scandal and distraction. The only answer suggested on behalf of the repondent is that the archdeacon had some independent right by common law quite apart from the bishop, and that therefore the presence of the bishop, though it might supersede the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the archdeacon, did not affect his common law jurisdiction. I cannot find a shadow of authority for such a proposition. The only authority cited in support of it, Rex v. Simpson, 1 Stra. 609, is, upon examination, no authority at all for the proposition. It is said that that case goes to the root of the matter because it shows that the bishop's inhibition, so far as concerns the admission of churchwardens, is mere waste-paper. That would be a strange conclusion bearing in view the law laid down long before in Lunne v. Dodson. But the case of Rex v. Simpson is not even a primâ facie authority for the proposition for which it is cited. In the first place it appears from the case that the bishop had no jurisdiction to deal with the archdeacon at all because the place in question was not within the diocese of the bishop. Another ground for the decision was added, and this is the ground relied upon in the present case. The report goes on to say that "the archdeacon is but a ministerial officer, and is obliged to do the act whether it be of any validity or not." It seems to me that that proposition was laid down on the assumption that the archdeacon had not come under any incapacity owing to the presence of the bishop, but was still an officer charged with the duty of doing ministerial acts, and as such could not be prevented by a special inhibition going ad hoc from admitting a particular person as churchwarden. In other words, he could not by a special inhibition be deprived of the right of doing an act which by his office he was charged with the duty of doing. That case pointed to a suggested prohibitory jurisdiction alleged to exist in the bishop similar to that exercised by a superior court over an inferior one; and whether the decision is right or wrong it has no reference to a general inhibition by the bishop during his visitation. Therefore, even if that case is good law, it does not affect the question before us. In my opinion the archdeacon was not the proper person, at the time when the rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained, to perform the duty of admitting churchwardens.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The sole point is whether the rule nisi for a mandamus has not been allowed to issue to the wrong person. Upon the authorities I feel no doubt that when a bishop during his visitation inhibits the archdeacon from performing certain duties, including the admission of churchwardens, the office and duties of the archdeacon in regard to those matters are, during the period covered by the inhibition, to be performed by the bishop, so that the archdeacon is not the proper person to admit churchwardens. During the period covered by the inhibition the bishop alone is entitled to admit. It follows that, in the circumstances existing at the time when the rule nisi for a mandamus in the present case was obtained, the archdeacon was not the proper person to admit churchwardens. The bishop at that time was the only person whose duty it was to admit. This point was not really dealt with in the judgment in the Divisional Court. The judgment proceeds upon the ground that the archdeacon was the proper person to admit, and that he could not refuse to admit a person as churchwarden merely because he had been inhibited by the bishop from admitting churchwardens. The judgment proceeded upon the authority of Rex v. Simpson. That case, it seems to me, is quite distinct from the present one and is no authority in support of the proposition for which it is cited. That was a case where the archdeacon was clearly the proper person to admit churchwardens, so that the mandamus was rightly issued against the archdeacon, though the bishop had purported to inhibit him. In the present case, assuming that the bishop was wrong as to the proper person to be admitted as churchwarden, the bishop was the only person whose duty it was to admit, and therefore the mandamus, if it issued at all, should have been directed to the bishop. The archdeacon was in law a stranger in the matter, and no application should have been made for a mandamus against him. The appeal therefore succeeds.

UPPERTON v. RIDLEY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Police—Pension—"Annual pay"—Special allowance—Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), s. 1; Sched. I., Parts 1, 3.

A constable in the metropolitan police was selected by the Commissioners of Police for permanent special duty at the House of Lords, and he received for that special duty a payment of 7s. a week in addition to his ordinary pay as a police constable. He performed this duty and received the payment for several years up to the date of his retirement.

Held, that the sum of 7s was not part of the constable's "annual pay" within the meaning of the Police Act, 1890, so as to entitle him to have it taken into account in calculating the amount of his pension.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (48 W. R. 494, [1900] 1 Q. B. 680) affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.), on a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions: reported 48 W. R. 494, [1900] 1 Q. B. 680.

The appellant, Upperton (a constable of the metropolitan police), appealed to quarter sessions against the decision of the police authority for the metropolitan police district (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) refusing to reconsider his claim for an increased amount of pension.

The quarter sessions dismissed the appeal subject to a case.

The appellant joined the police force on the 30th of December, 1872, and on the 1st of January, 1899, he had completed more than twenty-five years' approved service as a police constable.

Upon joining the force he signed a document containing a scale of pay, approved by the Secretary of State, for police constables, the scale being 24s. a week for constables in the 3rd class, 27s. for constables in the 2nd class, and 30s. for constables in the 1st class. These rates of pay were subsequently increased, constables in the 1st class receiving 32s. a week.

The appellant, who was then in the 1st class, gave notice to retire, and was entitled as of right by the Police Act, 1890 (an acceptance of whose provisions he had previously signed), to retire and receive a pension for life of two-thirds of his annual pay at the date of his retirement.

In May, 1894, the appellant, having already served for nine years as a police constable at the Houses of Parliament, was selected by the Commissioners of Police for permanent duty as a police constable at the House of Lords, and continued to serve in that capacity until his retirement in January, 1899.

He was paid for this special duty 7s. a week, and at the date of his retirement he was paid each week the sum of 39s. made up as follows: 32s. being the ordinary pay of a constable of his rank and service, and the above sum of 7s.

It was stated in evidence by the chief clerk to the Commissioners of Police that the commissioners were under no obligation to pay the appellant the additional sum of 7s., even while he remained on special service, though that was done partly as a recognition of the good conduct for which a constable was placed on special duty, and partly because by being withdrawn from ordinary duty he lost to some extent his chance of promotion.

The entire cost of the police employed on special duty was paid out of moneys provided by Parliament in each year. From the above sum of 32s. the sum of 7d. was deducted as a contribution towards the pension fund in accordance with section 15 of the Police Act, 1890, but no deduction was made from the 7s.

The appellant signed the weekly pay list, the sum of 32s. appearing therein in the column headed "Amount of pay," and the sum of 7s. in the column headed "Allowances for special duties."

By section 15 of the Police Act, 1890, the police authority of every police force was authorized and directed to deduct from the pay of every constable such stoppages during sickness as might be provided by the regulations respecting the force.

In the metropolitan police during absence owing to sickness 1s. a day was usually stopped from the ordinary pay of a constable, and in the case of a constable employed, as the appellant was, on special duty, and receiving special allowance, such allowance was usually stopped in addition to the 1s. a day, and the amount of this allowance would be paid to the constable who actually performed the special duty.

The appellant was awarded a pension calculated on two-thirds of 32s.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the 7s. a week was part of his "pay" within the meaning of Schedule I, Part I, to the Police Act, 1890, and that he was therefore entitled to a pension calculated on two-thirds of 39s. a week.

In the Divisional Court Channell, J. (Bucknill, J., dissenting), held that the special allowance of 7s. a week was not "pay," and could not be taken into account in computing the pension.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

E. H. Pickersgill, for the appellant—The Police Act, 1890, by section 1, gives a police constable a right to a pension. By section 3 the pension is to be according to a scale adopted by the police authority within the maximum and minimum limits set forth in Part I. of the first schedule to the Act. By that schedule the scale is fixed according to the annual pay of the constable, but so that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his "annual pay." By Part III. of the schedule the pension is to be calculated according to the amount of his "annual pay" at the date of his retirement. The Metropolitan Police Act, 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. 44), s. 12, provides that the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District shall pay to the police "such salaries, wages, and allowances . . . as one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state shall direct." The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 22 (which is repealed by the Police Act, 1890), authorized deductions to be made from the "pay" of every police constable for the purposes of the police superannuation fund. The word "pay," therefore, was intended to include "salaries, wages, and allowances." This 7s. a week for special duty was an "allowance," and was so designated in the weekly pay list. Pay is that which is given for services rendered, or for work and labour done. The 7s. was pay in the proper sense of the word. The judgment of Bucknill, J., that the 7s. ought to have been included in the "pay" of the appellant is correct, and the judgment of Channell, J., is wrong.

Macmorran, Q.C., and J. P. Grain, for the respondents—The 7s. is not part of the constable's "pay." It is a mere gratuity allowed to him for performing special duty. The constable may at any moment be taken off that special duty and sent elsewhere. There was no obligation upon the Commissioners of Police to give the police constable any part of the special allowance. When the police constable joined the force he signed a document setting out the scale of pay, sanctioned by the Home Secretary, and the scale so set out did not mention any special allowance.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The question which we have to decide is what is the meaning of the words "annual pay" in the schedule to the Police Act, 1890, because the amount of the pension of a police constable is based on his annual pay. In order to ascertain what terms the appellant came under as regards pay it is necessary to look at the document which he signed when he joined the police force. That document clearly shows that the pay was to be according to a scale authorized and directed by the Home Secretary, the scale of pay being 24s. a week for a police constable when he was in the third class, 27s. when he was promoted to the second class, and 30s. when he reached the first class. Those sums were afterwards raised, the pay of a constable in the first class, in which the appellant was at the date of his retirement, being 32s. a week. In my opinion this document regulated the scale of pay, and if the appellant had not received the pay there set out he would have been entitled to sue for it by means of a petition of right. Was he entitled as of right to anything over and above the sums there mentioned? To my mind he was not. There was no contract by which a police constable could recover anything beyond those sums. There was nothing to entitle a constable to any "pay" over and above those sums. In support of this view there is a paragraph in the special case which states that the chief clerk to the Commissioners of Police gave evidence that the commissioners were under no obligation to pay the appellant the additional sum of 7s. even while he remained on special service, though that was done partly as a recognition of the good conduct for which a constable was placed on special duty, and partly because by being withdrawn from ordinary duty he lost to some extent his chance of promotion. Further than that, there is the pay list which the appellant signed each week, which distinctly states that the 7s. was received as an allowance for special duties, while the 32s. was received as pay. I do not wish to press this document too far against the appellant, but I cannot altogether shut it out in considering this question. If the 7s. were pay, then by section 15 of the Police Act, 1890, a deduction should have been made from it for the pension fund, whereas no deduction at all was made. In truth this 7s. was not pay within the meaning of the Act. I agree, therefore, in the judgment of Channell, J., and I cannot agree with that of Bucknill, J. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The pension of a police constable is to be a certain proportion of the constable's "annual pay." The person who, by statute, has to determine what is to be the "pay" of a police constable is the Home Secretary. Section 12 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, provides that the receiver shall pay to the police such salaries, wages, and allowances as one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state shall direct. The only evidence before us upon this point is that of a document which the appellant signed on entering the police force and which sets out the scale of pay which the Home Secretary has directed to be paid. That is the scale applicable to the appellant, and it states that his "pay" is to be a certain sum per week according to the class he may happen to be in. Therefore we have it on the highest authority that his pay is that set out in that document. That document under the hand of the secretary of state defines the pay, and by the Act of 1890 the pension is to be a certain proportion of the pay. By section 11 of the Police Act, 1890, where a police constable claims a pension and the police authority do not admit the claim, the constable may apply to the police authority (that is, in the case of the Metropolitan Police, the Home Secretary) for a reconsideration of the claim, and the police constable, if aggrieved by the decision upon such reconsideration, may appeal to quarter sessions. The appeal, therefore, necessarily presupposes and involves an expression of opinion by the Home Secretary himself as to what the scale of pay was—namely, that the scale of pay was that set out in the document. Therefore, the document under the hand of the Home Secretary which the appellant signed when he joined the force, the decision of the Home Secretary when the question of pension came up before him for reconsideration, and the whole course of practice and dealing while the appellant was a member of the police force clearly points to this, that the only pay of the appellant at the date of his retirement was the 32s. a week.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Upon the facts it seems to me to be clear that the 7s. a week was expressly paid to the appellant by the Commissioners of Police and was received by him upon the footing that it was not "pay," but was a voluntary and gratuitous allowance. That is shown by the paper which he signed when he joined the police force, by no deduction being made from the 7s. as a contribution towards the pension fund, by the fact that in the case of absence from sickness his ordinary pay would be paid to him less a deduction of 1s. a day, whereas the whole of the 7s. a week would be stopped, and also by the fact that, if the police constable had been removed to other duty, the 7s. a week would have been stopped. The only conclusion I can come to is that the 7s. a week was not part of the appellant's pay within the meaning of the Police Act, 1890.

Appeal dismissed.

"All" the property of a bankrupt was by an agreement—confirmed by an order of the court—vested in a company, and the bankruptcy annulled. The agreement contained a list of the bankrupt's properties, which did not, however, include a fund in court to which the bankrupt, unknown to any of the parties to the agreement or their solicitors, was then absolutely entitled. The late bankrupt subsequently obtained an order of the court for payment out to him of the fund upon affidavits that he had not incumbered. No stop order was ever obtained against the fund. The same solicitor acted for the bankrupt in both matters. Upon petition by the company claiming the fund and asking that the Treasury might be ordered to replace it,

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, (1) that the agreement and vesting order vested the fund in the company, and that the late bankrupt and his solicitor were severally liable to pay the amount of the fund to the company; (2) on the authority of an unreported case of Jones v. Jones (for which see below), that the Paymaster-General had not been "guilty of default" within section 5 of the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, with respect to the payment out, and that the Treasury were not, therefore, bound to replace it.

By an agreement dated the 20th of April, 1893, made between J. S. Bath, then a bankrupt, and the Creditors Assets Co. (Limited), it was agreed that in the event of an order of the court being obtained confirming a scheme of arrangement of J. S. Bath's affairs set out in Schedule I. thereto, and as soon as the property of J. S. Bath set out in Schedule II. thereto should have been vested in the company by an order of court, the company should manage and dispose of the property as described in Schedule II. in the manner therein set out.

Schedule I. provided that upon payment into court by the company of a sum sufficient to pay all J. S. Bath's debts in full, together with all costs, an order of the court should be made vesting "all" his property in the company.

By an order of the court, dated the 11th of July, 1893, the scheme was approved, and it was ordered that the adjudication of bankruptcy against J. S. Bath should be annulled, and that "all the property" of J. S. Bath should thenceforth become vested in the company.

At this time, unknown to any of the parties to the arrangement, there was a fund in court belonging to J. S. Bath, to which he had become absolutely entitled before his bankruptcy. This fund did not therefore appear in Schedule II. of the agreement, and no stop order was ever obtained upon it. Subsequently J. S. Bath was informed of the existence of this fund in court.

Upon application by him, supported by affidavits to the effect that he was absolutely entitled to and had not incumbered the fund, he obtained on the 29th of February, 1896, an order from Kekewich, J., directing payment out of the fund to him, and it was accordingly so paid out.

The same solicitor acted for J. S. Bath in both these matters.

This was a petition by the Creditors Assets Co., to which J. S. Bath, his solicitor, the Paymaster-General, and the Treasury Commissioners were made respondents, praying that the order for payment out might be discharged, that the Treasury might be ordered to replace the fund in court, and that the petitioners were entitled to payment out thereof, and for such order as to J. S. Bath and his solicitor as the court might think just.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Pollard, for the petitioners.—The fund in question was included in the scheme of arrangement and under the agreement and vesting order became vested in the company. It ought not, therefore, to have been paid out. The Paymaster-General has been guilty of default with respect to the payment out under section 5 of the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 44), and the Treasury ought, therefore, to replace it.

Warrington, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for J. S. Bath.—This fund was not vested in the company by the agreement or vesting order. Only the properties set out in Schedule II. were vested in them.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., Micklem, Q.C., and Harman, for the solicitor.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the Paymaster-General and Treasury Commissioners.—If the fund ought not to have been paid out, the Treasury is nevertheless not liable to replace it, for as there was no stop order on it the Paymaster-General has not been guilty of default under section 5 of the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872.

They then referred to an unreported case of Jones v. Jones, before Cairns, L.C., in 1879, in his private room, where a petition was presented praying for a declaration that the Paymaster-General had been guilty of default under section 5 of the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, with respect to the payment out of a fund to wrong parties, and that the same might be made good by the Treasury.

The judgment in this case was as follows: "Cairns, L.C.—The facts under which this application is made to me do not appear very perfectly on the petition, but I will state them as I understand them to be after hearing the admissions agreed to between the petitioner and the counsel for the Treasury. The estate of a testator named Lacy was being administered in the Court of Chancery. In a part of the estate there was an intestacy subject to the life interest of a Mrs. Hutchison. £1,278 9*s.* 4*d.* was carried over to a separate account representing this part of the estate, and it was entitled "The Account of the Share of the Testator's Residuary Estate Given to Mrs. Hutchison for Life." This fund, subject to Mrs. Hutchison's life interest, belonged to Elizabeth Harriet Lacy, the sole next-of-kin of the testator. She died in 1853, and her administrators were James Samuel Jones and John Des Champs Jones. Her next-of-kin were eight in number, and John Des Champs Jones was one of the eight. John Des Champs Jones by indenture of the 28th of February, 1862, mortgaged his one-eighth share to the petitioner Fielding with a power of sale, and on the 24th of March, 1862, the petitioner Fielding obtained the usual stop order on the fund. About eight years afterwards the petitioner Fielding, under the power of sale in the mortgage, sold this share of John Des Champs Jones to the petitioner Gibbons and assigned it by an indenture dated the 16th of July, 1870, and from that time the petitioner Fielding ceased to have any interest in the fund. Gibbons did not obtain any stop order on the fund. Then came the Chancery Funds Act, 1872, the office of the Accountant-General was abolished, and it was enacted that her Majesty's Paymaster-General should perform all the duties and exercise all the powers and authorities which were performed by or vested in or capable of being exercised by the Accountant-General. The funds of the Court of Chancery were taken over by the State, and the 5th section of the Act provided that the Consolidated Fund should be liable to make good to the suitors of the court all money and securities in court, and that if the Lord Chancellor should certify to the Treasury in writing that the Paymaster-General had failed to pay any money into court, or transfer or deliver any securities into court required by any order of the court to be paid, transferred, or delivered from his account, or should have been guilty of any default with respect to such money or securities, the Treasury should pay out of the Consolidated Fund the sum certified to be required to pay the money or release the securities or make good such default. It is under this section that the present application is made to me. It is said that the Paymaster-General has been guilty of a default with respect to the share of John Des Champs Jones in the share in question. This default is attempted to be made out in the following way: Mrs. Hutchison, the tenant for life, died on the 20th of June, 1872. John Des Champs Jones had died previously. It appears that in 1862, when the petitioner Fielding obtained his stop order, a note of the stop order was made in the usual way against the account in question in the book at that time in use in the office of the Accountant-General in which the account of that fund was contained. In process of time, but before the office of Accountant-General was abolished, this book was filled up and ceased to be used, and the account of the fund in question was carried into a new book in which it was from that time kept. In carrying it into the new book the notice of the stop order was inadvertently omitted, and in the new book it stood without any notice of the stop order. In February, 1873, after the duties of the Paymaster-General had commenced, those who were then the personal representatives of Elizabeth Harriet Lacy applied to the Court of Chancery to distribute the fund, and a certificate of the fund was given in the usual way by the Paymaster-General, and no mention was made in the certificate of any stop order. The court thereupon ordered the fund to be paid to the personal representative of Elizabeth Harriet Lacy. It is said upon this state of facts that I should certify that the Paymaster-General has been guilty of default with respect to the money. It is said that he ought to have known of the stop order and ought to have taken care that the fund was not paid out without notice having been given according to the stop order. I should have very great difficulty in holding that the Paymaster-General had under these circumstances been "guilty of default." These words appear to me to point to some act of misfeasance or carelessness attributable to the Paymaster-General himself or to those under his direction and superintendence at the time when the act occurs. I incline to think that the negligence in this case occurred in the time of the Accountant-General when the account of the fund was carried into the new book, but it is not necessary that I should decide this, and I do not desire to do more than to intimate a doubt with regard to it. But it seems to me impossible upon another ground that I can give the certificate which the petitioners ask for. The stop order was obtained by the petitioner Fielding and it required notice to be given to Fielding. But Fielding ceased, as I have said, in 1870 to have any interest in the fund and he is not in any way damnified by the fund having been paid to the representative of Elizabeth Harriet Lacy. On the other hand, Gibbons, who is interested in the fund, never obtained any stop order and never required any notice to be given to him, and he therefore cannot complain of any default as against him on the part of the Paymaster-General. It was indeed stated before me by the petitioners, and apparently not denied, that the solicitor for Fielding was also solicitor for Gibbons, and it was said that if notice had been given to Fielding his solicitor would have known it and would have communicated the notice to Gibbons. But this was an accident which might or might not have led to the result supposed, and which cannot give to either of the petitioners any right which they would not otherwise have had. The security provided by the court was a security for Fielding only, and it is necessary, in my opinion, that Fielding should be able to show me that he, Fielding, has been in some way injured by the manner in which the court has dealt with the funds. I must therefore decline to make an order upon the petition."

KEKEWICH, J., said that there could be no reasonable doubt that the scheme of arrangement provided that everything which J. S. Bath possessed at the date of his adjudication of bankruptcy should be vested in the company, and that the vesting order vested in the company everything whether known or unknown which by the force of the bankruptcy was vested in J. S. Bath's trustee for the benefit of his creditors. The fund in question was therefore under the agreement of the 20th of April, 1893 and the vesting order, vested in the company, and although properly ordered to be paid out on the 29th of February, 1896, on the facts then before the court, ought not in the light of the facts subsequently ascertained to have been paid out to J. S. Bath.

On the question of the liability of the Treasury to replace the fund in court his lordship, on the authority of Jones v. Jones, dismissed the petition as against the Paymaster-General and Treasury Commissioners with costs to be paid by the petitioners. And declared that on the true construction of the agreement of the 20th of April, 1893, and the vesting order the fund belonged at the date of the order for payment out to the company, but that they must account for it under the agreement. And declared that J. S. Bath and his solicitor were each liable to pay to the company the amount of the fund paid out to J. S. Bath together with interest thereon at 4 per cent. from the date of payment out. And ordered J. S. Bath and his solicitor to pay the costs of the petitioners, including the costs of the Paymaster-General and Treasury Commissioners.

WATSON v. WATSON. (a.)

Executor—Administration—Trust for sale and conversion — Appropriation — Leaseholds — Reversionary interest in stock—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 4.

The power of executors and trustees holding residuary estate upon trust for sale and conversion to appropriate unconverted parts of the personal estate in respect of legacies and shares of residue extends to all personal estate, including chattels real and reversionary interests in stock in a company; and this power has not been taken away or modified by the Land Transfer Act, 1897.

Semble, that this power of appropriation extended —previously to the said Act, and still extends—to real estate, where there is a trust for sale and conversion.

Semble, that, where there is no trust for sale and conversion, the executors had, and have, the same power over the whole personal estate.

Section 4 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, applies to all the residuary estate, whether personal or real.

Adjourned originating summons.

The question in this summons was whether executors and trustees with a trust for sale and conversion could lawfully appropriate parts of the estate of their deceased testator, particularly chattels real and a reversionary interest in stock, in part satisfaction of the shares of residue given by the will.

Mrs. Beverley, a widow, by her will made in 1898, appointed her sister, Miss Euphemia Watson, and Mr. Holme the executors and trustees of her will, and after bequeathing certain specific and pecuniary legacies and annuities, she recited that under the will of her late husband she had a general power of appointment over certain property and that under her marriage settlement she had a general power of appointment over certain funds subject thereto, and in exercise of these powers she appointed the said property and funds to her trustees, whom she directed to hold the same and all her other property (which she thereby devised and bequeathed to them) upon trust for sale and conversion, with power to postpone the sale and conversion of the whole or any part thereof for such period as they should think proper, and out of the money to arise therefrom to pay her funeral and testamentary expenses, and debts and legacies, and to make provision for the annuities bequeathed by her, and subject thereto to hold the net residue upon trust to divide the same into nine equal parts, and to pay two of such parts to her sister Euphemia Watson, one of the plaintiffs and trustees, other two of such parts to her sister the defendant Grace Watson, other two parts to her sister the defendant Emily Jane Watson, and as to the other three parts to hold one for her brother the defendant John Watson for life and then for his children as mentioned, another part for her sister-in-law, Mabel Watson, for her life or widowhood, and then for her children as mentioned, and the remaining part for her sister the defendant Elizabeth Sophia Annesley for her life, then for her husband for life, and then for her children as mentioned. The will gave the trustees power to appropriate a sufficient part of the estate for answering the annuities thereby bequeathed, but contained no power to appropriate part of the estate in respect of the nine shares of residue.

The testatrix died in July, 1899, and the will was proved by both executors. All the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and liabilities (so far as known), except the said annuities and another annuity (secured by her late husband's covenant), and the legacies bequeathed by the will, were stated to have been paid or provided for. The residue of the estate, including the property subject to the powers of appointment, was stated to exceed £110,000, and comprised in April, 1900, among other things, (1) a leasehold house in St. John's Wood, London, held for a term of ninety-five years, from 1844, at a rent of £25, and sub-let for £200 a year; (2) a licensed public-house in Paddington, held for a term of ninety-nine years, from 1847, at a rent of £10 15s., and sub-let for £50 a year; (3) three leasehold houses in Porchester-terrace, held for long terms, and sub-let at rents higher than the ground-rents; and (4) a sum of £1,180 Great Indian Peninsula Railway Guaranteed 5 per cent. Stock, subject to a life interest therein of a lady sixty-eight years old. The leasehold properties had been valued by a surveyor at the following sums: No. 1 at £2,300, No. 2 at £650, and No. 3 at £2,400, and the reversionary interest (No. 4) had been valued by an actuary at £1,222.

It was proposed to appropriate to Miss Euphemia Watson the public-house (No. 2) and the three houses (No. 3); to Miss Grace Watson the house No. 1; and to Miss E. J. Watson the reversionary interest in the stock, at their respective valuations, in part satisfaction of their shares, with the consent of these beneficiaries.

This summons was therefore taken out by the executors and trustees against the defendants already mentioned, and against the husband of Mrs. Annesley and her infant children, asking (1) whether the trustees might lawfully appropriate the leasehold houses and the reversionary interest in the manner proposed, and (2) whether they might appropriate the assets of the testatrix being of a nature authorized by the will or by law as trust investments towards satisfaction, so far as they would extend, at a proper valuation, of the shares of other beneficiaries in the residuary estate.

Mr. John Watson's wife and children, and Mrs. Mabel Watson and her husband and children, who resided in the Colonies, were not made defendants.

Yardley, for the plaintiffs and the defendants who were absolutely entitled.—Executors and trustees may always appropriate the personal estate to a legatee or beneficiary if they do so fairly: Elliott v. Kemp, 7 M. & W. 306; Barclay v. Owen, 60 L. T. Rep. 220, 37 W. R. Dig. 111; In re Lepine, [1892] 1 Ch. 210, 40 W. R. Dig. 89; In re Brookes, 76 L. T. Rep. 771; In re Richardson, 44 W. R. 279, [1896] 1 Ch. 512; In re Nickels, 46 W. R. 422, [1898] 1 Ch. 630. There appears to be no reported case of an appropriation of a leasehold, but it falls under the general principle. A valuation can be made, and it is like the case of an appropriation of furniture, as in Elliott v. Kemp. The Land Transfer Act, 1897, has made no difference. It is true the definition of land does not include chattels real (see Land Transfer Act, 1875, s. 4), but section 4 of the Act of 1897 includes all the residuary estate whether personal or real. There is no necessity for following the "prescribed conditions," for in fact none have been prescribed. If section 4 is confined to real estate, the previous power as regards personal estate is not affected. In any case the provisions are cumulative and not substitutionary.

Stanley Gibbons, for the other defendants

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—BUCKLEY, J.—The cases are numerous where it has been held that executors and trustees have power to appropriate pure personal estate under the circumstances of this case. Thus in Elliott v. Kemp appropriation of furniture, in Barclay v. Owen and in In re Lepine of mortgage debts, in In re Richardson of shares in a brewery, and in In re Nickels of stock, were held to be valid. In some of these cases there was a trust for sale and conversion, in others none. There was no such trust in the case of In re Waters, (1889) W. N. 39, and in In re Richardson. In the others there was (except in the cases of intestacy). No case has been found of appropriation of chattels real. I have to determine whether such appropriation is valid.

Now, where there is no trust to sell and convert, but simply to divide the property amongst certain parties, appropriation seems easy; you are directed to divide the property unconverted, and you must get equality as best you can. Where there is a trust for sale and conversion, the principle is, I apprehend, that it must be competent for the trustee to agree to give the property to a beneficiary against the money he has to receive, and that it cannot be necessary for the trustee to go through the form of first converting the property into money, and then giving the beneficiary the money which he may desire to immediately reinvest in the property sold. This principle is found plainly, I think, in the judgments of the court in In re Lepine. [His lordship read passages from each judgment, and continued:] That is, it is competent for the executor and trustee to say to the person entitled to the proceeds of the conversion, "I will agree to give you this estate without converting it in satisfaction pro tanto of the money which would be coming to you if I converted it."

This principle would not be necessarily confined to the case where there was a trust for sale and conversion, for the circumstances might be such that the executor would be bound to turn the assets of the testator into money, and apply it to the payment of a legacy in ordinary course of administration. Now if that is the principle it is obviously not confined to pure personal estate, but extends to chattels real; and also, I conceive, to real estate which was subject to a trust for sale and conversion. There is no difference in principle between personal estate and real estate. The only question would be whether under the old law, in a case where the executor was not a trustee, he would have such control over the real estate as to be able to hand it over. In the case before me there is a trust for sale and conversion, and it appears to me competent for the executors and trustees to agree with the cestui que trust to appropriate the unconverted leaseholds to their shares of the residuary estate. But the question has been raised whether the law has been altered by the fourth section of the Land Transfer Act, 1897. It has been argued that, having regard to the connection in which that section is found, it is to be read as confined to real estate, and that it does not extend to chattels real. I do not think so. The language is "That the personal representatives may in the absence of express provision to the contrary in the will, with the consent of any person entitled to any legacy given by the deceased person, or to a share in his residuary estate"—that must mean residuary estate whether it be personal or real—"appropriate any part of the residuary estate of the deceased in or towards satisfaction of that legacy." It seems to me that "the residuary estate" there must mean what it meant before—namely, any residuary estate, whether personal or real, and that the section applies, so far as it is applicable at all, to the case before me. Then it is said that the power of appropriation which existed before is done away with by this section, and that now its provisions as to giving notice and the like must be followed, otherwise you cannot appropriate at all. I do not agree. If the principle of appropriation be as I have stated it I do not see that the Act affects the power in cases where there is a trust for conversion. The Act may have some application to cases where there is no such trust. As to those I say nothing.

The second question of the summons relates to the three ninth shares which are settled. The cestui que trusts of these shares can only take in satisfaction of what is given them such investments as are authorized by the will which creates the settlement. Subject to that condition I think those appropriations may be made. That disposes of the whole matter, except as regards the appropriation of the particular houses at the particular valuations referred to in the first question. No evidence has been read except an affidavit of the plaintiffs saying that there have been valuations of the property, and exhibiting them. Upon that I cannot proceed. If I am to approve of these particular appropriations I must know what the whole estate amounts to, so as to know that the shares of residue are in excess of the property proposed to be appropriated in respect of them; and I must have in support of this the evidence of the valuers. All I can do is this. I can declare that the plaintiffs can lawfully appropriate the properties of the kind in question, and let them act upon their own responsibility in making these particular appropriations at the amounts named; or I can direct an inquiry as to whether these particular appropriations are right and proper. [At the request of the plaintiff his lordship took the former course.]

GLOUCESTER MUNICIPAL ELECTION PETITION, In the Matter of.

FORD AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. NEWTH (Respondent). (a.)

Election law—Municipal corporation—Town councillor—Disqualification—Contract with council—Release by committee—Ratification by council—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 12, sub-section 1 (c).

The respondent, in answer to an advertisement, sent in a tender offering to supply to a city council certain goods at specified prices for the period of twelve months certain. This tender was accepted, and the respondent supplied goods from time to time. Shortly before the completion of the twelve months the respondent, wishing to stand as a candidate at the forthcoming election of councillors, applied to a committee of the council to be released from his contract. The committee resolved, subject to approval by the council, to release the respondent as from that date. He was then nominated, and after his nomination the council ratified the resolution of the committee. A petition was presented against him, alleging that his election was void on the ground that, at the date of his nomination, he had an interest in a contract with the council.

Held, that the advertisement, tender, and acceptance constituted a contract in which the respondent had an interest, and that the ratification of the committee's resolution by the council after the nomination of the respondent did not relate back to the date of the resolution because the interests of persons other than the parties to the contract might be affected; and therefore the respondent having an interest in a contract with the council at the date of his nomination, was disqualified and his election void.

Argument of questions of law reserved for the opinion of the court.

This was a petition under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), against the return of the respondent to the office of town councillor for the Tuffley Ward of the City of Gloucester, which was tried before H. R. Mansel Jones, Esq., a commissioner for the trial of municipal election petitions.

The election was held on the 1st day of November, 1900, when the respondent was declared to be elected.

The petition alleged that William James Newth, the respondent, was disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor, on the ground that at the time of his nomination and election he had an interest in a contract with, by, or on behalf of the council of the said city, and prayed that it might be determined that the respondent was not duly elected and that his election was void.

It was proved that the council of the city of Gloucester upon the 5th of December, 1899, advertised for certain articles for the use of the corporation during the ensuing year and invited tenders.

On the 13th of December, 1899, the respondent tendered for certain goods in the following form, which he had obtained from the council's office:

"City of Gloucester."

"To the Street Committee."

"Gentlemen,—I hereby offer to supply for the twelve months ending the 31st of December, 1900, the undermentioned goods as required, the best of their respective kinds and to the entire satisfaction of the city surveyor, delivered at the Corporation Depôt, Stroud-road, Gloucester, in guaranteed makers' drums or barrels sealed down."

Then followed a long list of articles and prices.

It was signed by the respondent.

On the 22nd of December, 1899, the Street Committee resolved that it be recommended that certain tenders be accepted at the several prices therein respectively mentioned, among them being that of the respondent for oil and colours.

On the same date a letter was sent to him informing him that his tender was accepted.

On the 30th of January, 1900, at a quarterly meeting of the council, it was resolved that the minute of the Street Committee of the 22nd of December, 1899, be approved, adopted, and confirmed.

From the 22nd of December, 1899, up to and including the 20th of October, 1900, the respondent supplied from time to time goods according to the said tender when and as required by the council, and received payments for the same from time to time to a considerable amount.

On the 19th of October, 1900, there were various accounts amounting to over £54 due to him which were not all paid until the 19th of December.

On the 19th of October, 1900, the respondent, being anxious to stand as a candidate at the forthcoming election of councillors in November, applied to the Finance, Estates, and Waterworks Committee (and not to the Street Committee, who had risen for the day) to be relieved from his tender or contract, when the following minute and resolution of that committee was passed:

"It was reported that Mr. W. J. Newth intended to offer himself as a candidate at the following elections if not prejudiced by the fact that he had given an estimate for supplying certain articles that may be required by the corporation up to the end of the year.

"Resolved: That subject to this minute being approved by the council, Mr. Newth be released from the estimate or contract referred to as from this date."

On the 24th of October the respondent was nominated, and on the 1st of November declared to be elected to the office of councillor.

On the 30th of October the council resolved that the minute of the Finance, Estates, and Waterworks Committee of the 19th of October, 1900, be approved, adopted, and confirmed.

On the above facts being proved it was contended by the respondent's counsel that he was not disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor under section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), on the ground that:

(1) There was no contract.

(2) That if there was a contract it was rescinded before the 24th of October.

(3) That the existence of a debt for goods supplied before the 24th of October, and not paid for until December, was not an interest in any contract within the meaning of the said section.

The learned commissioner determined that the respondent was not duly elected and that his election was void, but postponed granting his certificate until the following question which he submitted for the consideration of the High Court of Justice had been determined by them.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the said William James Newth was disqualified for being nominated and elected and for being a councillor.

Section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), provides that "A person shall be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor it and while he . . . (c) has, directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council."

H. Terrell, K.C., (Lewis Coward, K.C., with him), for the respondent.—This petition should be dismissed. In the first place there was no contract. There was merely an offer by the respondent to supply certain goods during the year. There was nothing binding the corporation. The corporation need not buy any goods from the respondent. The case of Sykes v. Dixon, 9 A. & E. 693, supported this contention. In that case a servant agreed to serve one person as directed, but that person never bound himself to employ the servant and therefore it was held there was no contract. In Burton v. Great Northern Railway, 2 W. R. 257, 9 Exch. 507, the plaintiff agreed to provide all horses, waggons, &c., and to convey all grain and merchandize which might be presented to him for that purpose, from Hatfield to Ware, it being mutually agreed that the agreement should continue for twelve months. In the middle of the year the agent of the Great Northern Railway Co. wrote a letter to the plaintiff informing him that the arrangement would cease. Thereupon Burton brought his action for breach of contract, and it was held that there was no contract. There was no undertaking by the company to supply anything whatever; it was merely an undertaking on the part of Burton that he would carry goods that the company supplied him with. The position was this: That so long as that tender existed as a tender, the moment the corporation ordered anything from the person who made the tender, that immediately became a contract for the goods so ordered. If in this case the corporation, having received the tender, ordered a quart of oil, immediately they had given that order, before the tender was withdrawn, there was a contract for the quart of oil, and no more. The next day they might order some paint, and there was a contract for the paint, and so it continued until the tender was withdrawn. The case of Burton v. The Great Northern Railway was very much like the present one, because there, before the expiration of the year, the railway company withdrew from agreement; and it was held that they were not bound. The case of the Great Northern Railway v. Witham, 22 W. R. 48, L. R. 9 C. P. 16, is on all fours with the present case. In the present case there was only a continuing offer which when accepted is a contract, but as a continuing offer it can be withdrawn. It is the same principle in the three cases referred to. In the first case, employment of a servant—no binding contract on the part of the master; in the second case—no binding contract on the part of the railway company to send any goods whatever by the carrier; and, in the third case—no binding contract on the part of the railway company to order any goods. In the last two cases, however, the moment that an order was given there was, to the extent of those particular goods, an acceptance of the continuing offer, and that made a contract, but no further. In the second place, if there was a contract it was put an end to on the 19th of October when the respondent withdrew his tender. The committee accepted the withdrawal and agreed to release him from it before the election, subject to the confirmation of the council. The council confirmed that after the day of nomination but before the date of the election. The ratification by the council related back to the 19th of October: Bolton Partners v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 236 and 434, 41 Ch. D. 295. In the third place, the existence and mere continuance of a debt—the relationship of debtor and creditor—after the date of nomination is not an interest in a contract within the meaning of the section. In the present case goods were ordered by the corporation and supplied by the respondent in October and the accounts were payable at some subsequent date. Payment was not made until December—that fact ought not to disqualify the respondent. Wills, J., in Royse v. Birley, 17 W. R. 827, L. R. 4 C. P. 296, said, at p. 311: "It appears to me very clear, when the terms of the Act come to be examined, that it was not the intention of the Legislature that the mere relation of debtor and creditor subsisting should of itself create a disqualification." Holding and enjoying a contract, it was held in that case, means "holding or enjoying a contract which a man might be called on to execute." In the present case the respondent did not enjoy a contract or any benefit arising therefrom within the meaning of the statute.

Counsel also referred to In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, 39 W. R. 25, 45 Ch. D. 16.

Asquith, K.C., Ruegg, K.C., and S. H. Day, for the petitioners.—The transactions between the Streets Committee and the council on the one hand and the respondent on the other, in the months of December and January, constituted a contract within the meaning of the section. There was an obligation on the part of the corporation after accepting the respondent's tender not to go elsewhere for the articles specified in it. The respondent was therefore disqualified at the time of his nomination. As regards the withdrawal of his tender and the acceptance of the withdrawal by the committee, the ratification of that withdrawal by the council did not take place until after the date of the nomination. That ratification would not in this case date back to the acceptance by the committee of the council, and therefore the contract was in existence on the date of the nomination. Although ratification went back to the date when the act ratified was done, ratification could not affect prejudicially or otherwise the situation or status of third parties. Ratification acted inter partes. An arrangement come to between two persons could not retrospectively invalidate or alter the status of other people. The position of Mr. Newth was a matter in which the public and the electors in that particular ward were interested; and could it be said it was in the power of a chance majority in the town council, perhaps six months afterwards, to pass a resolution—when a petition might have been presented—to retrospectively give a status to a person who did not possess it at the time, and thereby cause votes which were invalid because given by a disqualified person to be valid? Such a proposition could not be accepted, for it would enable a chance majority in the town council to alter the position of the whole body. The committee had no power to bind the council. Unless at the time of the ratification the ratifying party could himself have validly done the act the ratification is no good: Harford v. Linskey, 47 W. R. 653 [1899] 1 Q. B. 852. In Bird v. Brown, 4 Ex. Ch. 786, Rolfe, B., said at pp. 798-9: "The doctrine omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato æquiparatur is one intelligible in principle and easy in its application when applied to cases of contract; . . . but this doctrine must be taken with the qualification that the act of ratification must take place at a time and under circumstances when the ratifying party might himself have lawfully done the act which he ratifies."

Counsel was not required to argue as to the third point.

H. Terrell, K.C., replied.

DARLING, J.—This case arises out of a municipal election for the city of Gloucester. A Mr. Newth was nominated and elected, and it was objected that he is disqualified from being elected and from being a councillor by reason of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 12, sub-section 1 (c), which says: "A person shall be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor if and while he has, directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council." Mr. Newth seems to be a person who deals in oils and colours. On the 5th of December, 1899, an advertisement was put into the papers as follows: "City of Gloucester. The Streets Committee of the Gloucester Corporation are prepared to receive tenders for the supply of the following materials for the twelve months ending the 31st of December, 1900, namely:" Then follows a long list of things required. In reply to that advertisement Mr. Newth wrote this answer: "Gentlemen, I hereby offer to supply for the twelve months ending the 31st of December, 1900, the undermentioned goods as required, the best of their respective kinds, to the entire satisfaction of the city surveyor, delivered at the Corporation Depôt, Stroud-road, Gloucester." Upon that, tenders were considered by the committee, and it was resolved: "That it be recommended that the following tenders be accepted at the several prices therein respectively mentioned. . . . Oil and colours, Mr. W. J. Newth." Then that minute was approved, adopted, and confirmed at the quarterly meeting of the council on the 30th of January, 1900. Before the confirmation a letter was written on the 22nd of December, 1899, by the city surveyor to Mr. Newth: "Dear Sir,—I have to inform you that your tender has been accepted." Upon that it is said on the one side that Mr. Newth was disqualified from being elected, because he had a share or interest in a contract with the corporation; and if that is a contract undoubtedly he had such share and is disqualified. But then it is said on behalf of Mr. Newth that it is not a contract at all: that it is a mere statement that if called upon to supply certain quantities of oils or colours he would supply them at a certain price; that he was not open to supply them unless he was called upon; and that the corporation were under no kind of obligation to buy colours from him. I agree that if there is no obligation on the part of the corporation it is not a contract at all—if the corporation are not bound to anything on their side, it seems to me there is no consideration, and it would not amount to a contract. The question, however, is, is that so? Now I do not think there is any direct authority upon this point. Of the cases which have been cited, the one which throws most light upon it is that of the Great Northern Railway Co. v. Witham. In that case there was a tender like this one, which was accepted just as this one has been; but there was something more: there was an order signed, and the question was whether the order which had been signed should be executed—whether the court should enforce the execution of that order. I think the judges in deciding the case distinctly left that question open. Keating, J., said: "If, before the order was given, the defendant had given notice to the company that he would not perform the agreement, it might be that he would have been justified in so doing." Of course, if there had been a binding contract, the defendant in the case referred to would not have been justified in doing anything of the kind, because it would mean a breach of contract. Therefore, I think that learned judge purposely refrained from deciding that point. The same thing occurred in the judgment of Brett, J., who said: "I agree with this judgment. It is not deciding the question whether the defendant might have absolved himself from the further performance of the contract by giving notice." That is another way of expressing the same thing. Therefore, it seems to me that so far as cases have been cited to us, we are left without any definite authority on the question. I think we must look at the documents themselves. What do they say? The advertisement says: "The Streets Committee of the Gloucester Corporation are prepared to receive tenders for the supply of the following materials, for the twelve months ending the 31st of December, 1900." I think that amounts to this: "We are prepared to receive tenders for what goods of the specified kinds we want during the period of a year, ending the 31st of December, 1900." The supply of the materials for the twelve months is the definite thing which the Streets Committee said they wanted to have the tender for. Thereupon, Mr. Newth said: "I offer to supply the undermentioned goods as required." That is to say, he would supply such articles as he dealt in—oil and colour—as were included in the supply for the twelve months, whenever he was required to do so by the corporation, and he would supply them "at the following prices." As required means "as intimated to me by order that they are wanted." Upon that, passing by the minute, comes this letter, written on behalf of the corporation: "I have to inform you that your tender has been accepted." What does that mean? I think it means: "We accept your offer to supply such articles as we intimate to you are a part of the supply wanted during the twelve months at the price you have stated." I think there was an obligation on the part of the corporation to buy those articles from Mr. Newth. I do not think that the corporation would have been justified in simply treating that tender of Mr. Newth's as a mere price list and going where they pleased to buy what they wanted. If that be so, that is a contract. I do not say I feel certain about that, because I cannot see that we have any real authority upon such a point, and because the question was expressly reserved and left open by the two judges who decided the case of the Great Northern Railway Co. v. Witham. But still, reading the present case for myself, I come to the conclusion that it is a contract. There is an obligation on both sides, and it is clearly a contract in which Mr. Newth has an interest.

But, it is said, the contract was put an end to. Mr. Newth was nominated as a candidate for the council on the 24th of October; but on the 19th, he being anxious to stand as a candidate, applied to the Finance, Estates, and Waterworks Committee to be relieved from his tender or contract; and the following minute and resolution of that committee was passed: "It was reported that Mr. Newth intended to offer himself as a candidate at the forthcoming election, if not prejudiced by the fact that he had given an estimate for supplying certain articles that may be required by the corporation up to the end of the year. Resolved: 'That subject to this minute being approved by the council, Mr. Newth be released from the estimate or contract referred to as from this date'" That would be as from the 19th of October, 1900. On the 30th of October the council resolved that the foregoing minute be approved, adopted, and confirmed. Upon that it was argued that that is a contract; and it must be taken, after what I have said, that it is a contract. On the other hand it was argued that the contract was put an end to; that it was put an end to on the 30th of October as from the 19th of October, because the ratification by the council on the 30th of what was done on the 19th relates back to the 19th; that the contract absolutely ceased and determined on the 19th of October; and that, therefore, when Mr. Newth was nominated on the 24th he was not interested in any contract because there was not one. Now, a good deal has been cited to us with regard to how far the ratification by one party of what has been done by another will relate back. I am not going to say if that were simply a matter—if Mr. Newth were not a candidate at all—between the man who had undertaken to supply oil, and the corporation, that that might not be a perfectly good putting an end to the contract on the 19th of October, by reason of what was done on the 19th and ratified by what was done on the 30th. But I think that in this case there are considerations which make that different from a mere ratification of something which was done between the parties to the contract themselves. The question in this case is as to whether there was a contract subsisting so as to produce a disqualification in Mr. Newth on the 24th of October. As between the parties it might possibly have been put an end to so that neither could sue the other after the 19th of October. Supposing one or the other had been sued between the 19th and the 30th—before the ratification took place—I do not think it is necessary to attempt to decide what would have been the consequences, but it is quite clear that difficulties would have arisen. But in this case, it seems to me, we are not dealing with a mere contract between two traders; we are dealing with a question which has received judicial interpretation in the case of Harford v. Linskey. In that case Wright, J., said the nomination was, for that purpose, an essential part of the election, and if there were no competitors it did constitute the election, by virtue of the express words of section 56. A different construction might produce much confusion, that learned judge added, and he indicated what. On the 24th of October, when Mr. Newth was nominated, it was entirely uncertain whether that contract was put an end to or not as between the parties. Supposing that on the 30th the council had said, "We do not ratify what has been done by the Finance Committee?" It could not be contended then that the contract was put an end to, for it would have been an enduring contract and nobody could say on the 24th of October whether Mr. Newth was or was not a person interested in a contract; that was not decided, even as between him and the corporation, until six days later. It appears to me, therefore, that that matter as between Mr. Newth and the corporation cannot put an end to the contract to this extent: that it cannot affect the rights of third parties, such as are the electors of the city of Gloucester, and such as are any other candidates who might be nominated for the seat for which Mr. Newth was a candidate. It might very well indeed be that there is only one other candidate as in the case of Harford v. Linskey; and if Mr. Newth were disqualified he (the other candidate) would be entitled to election at once without a poll being taken. Therefore, it seems to me, we cannot hold that the resolution of the 19th of October by the Finance Committee, and the ratification on the 30th of October by the corporation, put an end to the contract so as to qualify Mr. Newth on the 24th of October, when, if they had not ratified as they did on the 30th, Mr. Newth would have been disqualified. I do not think it necessary to go into the general law about ratification and consider whether the case of Bolton Partners v. Lambert is really as good an authority as it has been represented to us or whether it is not. It seems to me that that point is provided for in the case of Bird v. Brown, and also is practically provided for in the definition of what ratification can do and how it affects the rights of third parties in certain instances in the case of Bolton Partners v. Lambert and in the judgment delivered by Cotton, L.J.

There is one other point, and it is this: It seems that Mr. Newth supplied some oil which was not paid for—it was supplied before the 19th of October, before the time when he desired to become a candidate, and up to December it had not been paid for. No doubt there was an existing debt due from the corporation to Mr. Newth, and it is contended that that in itself amounts to such a contract as to be a disqualification within the words of the section. But in the view I take of the case, holding as I have done on the first and second points, it is not necessary to decide the third point which I have just mentioned. I think any judgment one gives on that point ought to be very carefully considered, because contingent difficulties on holding either way are many. Anyway, taking the view I have done on the first and second points, my expressions on the third would be something like an obiter dictum, and under the circumstances I prefer not to indicate any opinion as to how the third point should be decided.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the first point, whether at any time prior to the supposed determination of it, there was a contract, I confess I entertain no doubt at all. I quite agree that it depends upon the words of the documents used in a particular case, and that there might be documents somewhat similar to the one in question which do not amount to a contract—that there might be what has been called a unilateral contract only; or, on the other hand, it might simply show that which becomes a contract only as an order is given for particular goods needed. All that might exist in such documents. On the other hand, it seems to me that applying one's knowledge of business to what one knows is the function of the parties in such a case as this, a very little indeed in such documents is quite sufficient to turn the transaction into a contract; and in the present case I think there is quite enough. There was a proposal first of all by the Corporation of Gloucester for certain things to be sent to them, and there was an offer made in response to that. Then there was an acceptance which made a contract, subject only to the question of what was the subject-matter of it. It seems to me equally clear that the subject-matter of this contract was to continue for the year—to supply for that period at the orders of the corporation their requirements in respect of a particular article. Consequently there was an order or a contract between the parties for the supply for a year of that oil and colour which Mr. Newth tendered for.

Then the second point is the one which, to my mind, is a very real difficulty in the case, and it depends almost entirely, as it seems to me, upon the case of Bolton Partners v. Lambert. That case was considered recently in the Privy Council in the case of Fleming v. The Bank of New Zealand, [1900] A. C. 577, and in the view that the Privy Council ultimately took of the facts of the case it was not necessary to give any decision on the point whether the decision in Bolton Partners v. Lambert is a binding authority. There is, however, quite enough in the judgment to show that a good deal of doubt was entertained about the case. Judgment was delivered by Lindley, L.J., who himself was one of the judges in the Bolton Partners case. What Lindley, L.J., said in the case of Fleming v. The Bank of New Zealand was this: "The above view renders it unnecessary to consider any question of ratification, or to deal with the decision of Bolton Partners v. Lambert, and its application to the facts in this case. The decision referred to presents difficulties, and their lordships reserve their liberty to reconsider it if on some future occasion it should become necessary to do so." It is quite clear, therefore, that the Privy Council were not thoroughly satisfied with the case, and that they saw that it presented great difficulties if it were to be treated as of general application. What, it seems to me, the case of Bolton Partners established is this, and this only: That after there has been a ratification, then the rights of the parties to the contract, or the supposed contract, are to be adjusted between those parties as if there had been the prior authority. Consequently, as between these parties, when the question arises after the confirmation, everything must be decided then as if there had been the prior authority. That is to say: If in this particular case, any question arose between the parties after the 30th of October, whether any reference was between them to acts as between the 19th and the 30th or not, any such question arising between them on the 30th of October must be decided upon the footing that the contract was put an end to on the 19th of October—because it had been in a sort of preliminary way put an end to as from that date, subject to the confirmation. That is as between the parties. But it is quite clear there are exceptions to the rule. If anybody has acquired rights in the meanwhile, it is apparent from the case of Bolton Partners that is part of the exceptions which are there referred to. Consequently, it seems to me that when as between any other parties than the immediate parties to the contract, or in any question in which anybody else is interested, the question has to be considered—and has to be considered prior to the confirmation — it is then quite clear that we must look at the real facts. Now, in the present case the question is whether or not on the 24th of October the respondent was qualified or disqualified. At that date there had been a resolution passed—an act done by the committee —which might or might not be confirmed; and, as the case which my learned brother has referred to (Harford v. Linskey) shows, a man must be either qualified or disqualified. At that time it seems impossible to say that Mr. Newth was not disqualified. Still, after that particular time Mr. Newth had in fact—indirectly at all events—a share or interest in it, because his rights might or might not be governed by something which was done. That being so, it seems to me, in any view of the case the respondent was disqualified by being a party to a contract, which contract was in existence, so far as was necessary to preserve a kind of interest, namely on the 24th of October, at the time of his election.

I agree that it is not necessary to decide the third point, and on the whole it is better not to. It does seem to me there is a substantial difference between the words of this Act of Parliament and those of the Act of Parliament which were considered in the case of Royse v. Bailey. There is a substantial difference; conclusions possibly might be drawn both ways, and on the whole, therefore, it is better not to decide it. Therefore I say no more about it.

Appeal dismissed.

KEETON v. SHEFFIELD COAL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Poor Law—Rating—General district rate—Appeal—Reduction of valuation—Demand note—Summons—Matter of complaint arising within six months of issue of summons—Public Health Act, 1875—Jervis' Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 1.

Where, on appeal against an assessment for the poor rate, the rateable value of premises is reduced and the amount of the general district rate is in consequence altered so as to agree with such reduced valuation, a summons may be issued to enforce a demand made for the payment of arrears of the amended district rate if the demand for such amended rate has been made within six months of the issue of the summons.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The right to demand the reduced amount of the amended rate comes into operation for the first time when the amended rate is made in accordance with the reduced valuation, and the fact that a demand for the payment of arrears of the district rate on the higher valuation had been made more than six months previous to the issue of the summons does not cause the claim, in respect of which the summons was issued, to be barred by virtue of section 11 of Jervis' Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43).

This was a case stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York for the opinion of the High Court upon their determination of a claim made by the appellant on behalf of the Handsworth Urban District Council for the payment by the respondents to the said council of the sum of £869 3s

The facts proved or admitted at the hearing of the claim are as follows:

1. The appellant is the duly-appointed collector of rates of the Handsworth Urban District Council, and was duly authorized by the said council to make the above-mentioned claim and to institute summary proceedings in support of such claim.

2. The respondents are the rateable occupiers of certain premises situate within the said council's district, and comprising the coal mine shafts and the land, buildings, machinery, fixed plant, and sidings connected with the Birley Collieries (hereinafter referred to as "the said premises").

3. In a supplemental valuation list made for the said parish on the 6th of November, 1897, and included in the valuation list in force for the said parish on the 28th of December, 1897, the said premises were valued and assessed at a rateable value of £10,137.

4. On the 28th of December, 1897, a poor rate was made by the overseers of the poor of the said parish in and by which the respondents were assessed and rated in respect of the said premises upon the said rateable value of £10,137.

5. On the 23rd of March, 1898, a general district rate of three shillings in the pound, payable in two instalments, was made by the said council, to which the respondents were rated in respect of the said premises upon the said rateable value of £10,137 at the sum of £1,520 11s.

6. On the 21st of June, 1898, a second poor rate was duly made, by which the respondents in respect of the said premises were assessed on the same rateable value.

7. On the 28th of July, 1898, payment of the first instalment of the said sum of £1,520 11s. was demanded by the council from the respondents by serving upon them a written demand note of that date; and on the 23rd of September, 1898, the respondents paid the sum of £356 8s. 6d., which last-mentioned sum was accepted by the council on account of the first half of the said district rate; and on the 25th of October, 1898, payment of the second instalment was likewise demanded as aforesaid; and on the 27th of March, 1899, the respondents paid a like sum of £356 8s. 6d., which was accepted by the said council on account of the said rate.

8. On the 22nd of November, 1898, a third poor rate was made for the said parish by the overseers of the poor, by which the respondents were rated in respect of the said premises upon the said rateable value of £10,137.

9. On the 22nd of March, 1899, a general district rate of 3s. 4d. in the pound, payable in two instalments, was made by the council, to which the respondents were rated in respect of the said premises upon the said rateable value of £10,137 at the sum of £1,689 10s.

10. On the 21st of April, 1899, the respondents gave notice of appeal against the hereinbefore-mentioned poor rates, but not against either of the said district rates.

11. Payment of the first and second instalments of the said last-mentioned district rate was demanded by the council from the respondents on the 10th of May, 1899, and on the 17th of October, 1899, respectively, by service upon them of written demand notes on these dates, and the respondents paid the sums of £475 9s. 10d. and £450 on the 29th of September, 1899, and the 5th of April, 1900, respectively, which said sums the council accepted on account of the said district rate.

12. On the 4th of January, 1900, the arbitrator (to whom the said appeals against the said poor rates had been referred by agreement) awarded that the rateable value of the said premises was for the several periods relating to the two first-mentioned poor rates of the 28th of December, 1897, and the 21st of June, 1898, respectively, the sum of £7,517 9s. 9d., and for the period relating to the last-mentioned poor rate of the 22nd of November, 1898, the sum of £8,279 4s. 1d.

13. In accordance with the said award, alterations and amendments were duly made in the valuation lists upon which the said poor rates were based, and on the 19th of March, 1900, the council altered the figures of the said general district rates of the 23rd of March, 1898, and the 22nd of March, 1899, so as accord with the alterations so made in the valuation lists, that is to say: The rateable value of the said premises in the said general district rate of the 23rd of March, 1898, from the said sum of £10,137 to the sum of £7,517 9s. 9d., and the amount due in respect of the said premises from £1,520 11s. to the sum of £1,127 12s. 6d., and the rateable value of the said premises in the general district rate of the 22nd of March, 1899, from the said sum of £10,137 to the sum of £8,279 4s. 1d., and the amount due in respect of the said premises from the sum of £1,689 10s. to the sum of £1.379 17s. 4d.

14. The council on the 30th of May, 1900, and again on the 14th of June, 1900, demanded payment by the respondents of the sum of £869 3s., such last-mentioned sum being made up as follows: 1898, March 23rd. — General district rate £1,520 11s., altered to £1,127 12s. 6d.; September 23rd.—Amount paid by the respondents on account of the said rate, £356 8s. 6d. 1899, March 27th.—Amount paid by the respondents on like account £356 8s. 6d., making together £712 17s., leaving balance claimed £414 15s. 6d. 1900, March 22nd —General district rate £1,689 10s, altered to £1,379 17s. 4d. 1899, September 29th.—Amount paid on account of the said rate, £475 9s. 10d. 1900, April 5th.—Amount paid on like account £450, making together £925 9s. 10d., and leaving balance claimed £454 7s. 6d. Total amount claimed, £869 3s.

15. The respondents having refused to pay the said sum of £869 3s., complaint was duly made on behalf of the said council, and a summons dated the 24th of July, 1900, was issued calling upon the respondents to answer the appellant's said claim.

16. On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the matter of the complaint, in support of which the summons was issued, arose more than six months previously to the issue of such summons, and that the recovery of the amount claimed was barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

17. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that until the said general district rates had respectively been altered so as to agree with the valuation lists, as amended in accordance with the award, no valid demand could be made upon the respondents by the council in respect of either of the said rates, and that payment of the amount claimed had not been demanded until within six months of the issue of the summons, and that therefore the matter of the complaint in respect of which the summons was issued arose within such six months and the claim was not barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

The justices were of opinion that the recovery of the amount claimed by the council was, under the circumstances, barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, and they accordingly dismissed the summons. The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the justices were right in so doing.

Hugo Young, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong. The claim was not barred by section 11 of 11 & 12 Vict. c 43. The right to demand the reduced amount did not come into operation until the reduced rate was made in accordance with the reduced valuation. If the summons had been taken out before the amendment, the respondents would have been ordered to pay an excessive amount, and it may be that the excess could not have been recovered by them.

Counsel referred to the case of Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Mayor of Sheffield, 34 W. R. 153, 55 L. J. M. C. 40.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and T. E. Ellison, for the respondents.—The claim is now barred. If a man owes a sum of money and the Statute of Limitation has begun to run with regard to it, the creditor cannot recover half or any portion of that sum after the period of limitation has expired. There is no authority for saying that in this case the time runs from the date when the amended demand is made.

Hugo Young, K.C., replied.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was wrong, and that the amount of the amended rate is, under the circumstances of this case, recoverable. What was demanded, and what was the subject of the summons, was the amount of the amended and reduced rate. Until the amount of the assessment had been reduced, and until the rate had been amended in accordance therewith, there never was any right to demand that smaller sum. There was only a right to demand the larger sum. It is not necessary to decide it, but I am very much of the opinion that if the demand for the larger sum had been proceeded with and a summons taken out, there would have been no answer to it as things now stand. In my opinion, also, the rate having been reduced, the excess might have been afterwards recovered by a ratepayer who had paid too much. I cannot believe that any such injustice as has been suggested—namely, that the rating authority would have been allowed to keep that rate which had turned out to be excessive—would result. It seems to me that there are ample reasons, consonant with both statute and general law, why that excess amount would have been recoverable. However, it is not necessary now to decide that point.

I base my judgment in this case upon the fact that the moment the rate was reduced by the process pointed out by Act of Parliament there came into operation, for the first time, a right to demand the reduced sum. Mr. Tindal Atkinson has said that if a man owes a large debt or owes a definite sum, and the Statute of Limitations runs with regard to that sum, the creditor certainly cannot recover half of such sum beyond the period of limitation. That is so as regards that simple proposition. But if you add to that proposition the fact that a new right altogether is created by the effect of legislation after that period of limitation, which right makes the smaller sum, for the first time, a debt, then the matter might stand very differently. But here it seems to me we have to look at the words of Jervis' Act, and also to the time when the cause of complaint first arises. The complaint here is that the respondents have not paid the amended rate. Now the amended rate is to follow the valuation list in force at the time being; but the valuation list as amended never was the valuation list in force until the amendment was made, and, therefore, the rate which is amended according to the amended valuation list becomes for the first time the instrument which makes it the duty of the ratepayer to pay a smaller amount. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, and that this case must go back to the justices to make the proper order—namely, for the payment of the arrears of the reduced rate.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

HOARE v. W. RITCHIE & SON. (a.)

Factory Acts—Ventilation—"Dust generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent"—Direction by factory inspector requiring a fan to be provided—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 36.

By section 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, it is provided that where in a factory any process is carried on by which dust is generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent, an inspector of factories may direct a fan or other mechanical means of a proper construction for the prevention of such inhalation to be provided.

Held, that, in ascertaining whether dust was generated or inhaled to an injurious extent, it is not necessary to prove that the health of any of the workers was actually injured; it is sufficient if the inhalation of the dust has a tendency to injure health.

Case stated by the police magistrate for West Ham.

An information was preferred by the appellant, one of her Majesty's inspectors of factories, charging that the respondents, being the occupiers of a jute mill, the same being a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895, wherein an impurity—to wit, dust—was generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent, did fail to comply with a notice served on him by the appellant requiring him to provide a fan or other mechanical means for preventing such inhalation.

The facts proved before the magistrate were as follows:

The respondents were the owners of a jute mill, which was a factory within the meaning of the above Acts.

In the "preparing" and "batching" rooms in the factory, dust in large quantities was generated by the processes there carried on. This dust consisted of jute fibre mixed with a small quantity of common dust. There was nothing of a poisonous character in the dust. The use of fans as recommended by the appellant would reduce the amount of dust in the atmosphere inhaled by the workers.

Notice to provide such fans within one month was duly served on the respondents by the appellant, but the respondents failed to comply therewith.

Some 120 persons were employed in the rooms in question. Of these, several, selected by the appellant, were medically examined on his behalf. Several more, also selected by the appellant, were called as witnesses. The evidence, however, failed to prove that any of the workers had suffered an injury to their health from inhaling the dust generated by the processes there carried on. The learned magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that it had not been proved that the dust generated by the process had been inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent.

Section 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, provides as follows: "If in a factory where grinding, glazing, or polishing on a wheel, or any process is carried on by which dust is generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent, it appears to an inspector that such inhalation could be to a great extent prevented by the use of a fan or other mechanical means, the inspector may direct a fan or other mechanical means of a proper construction for the prevention of such inhalation to be provided within a reasonable time; and if the same is not provided, maintained, and used, the factory or workshop shall be deemed not to be kept in conformity with this Act."

Section 33 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, provides that section 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, shall extend to "any factory or workshop where any process is carried on by which any gas, vapour, or other impurity is generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent."

Daldy (H. Sutton with him), for the appellant.—The case ought to go back to the learned magistrate, because he in effect held that to sustain the charge in the information it was necessary to prove that actual injury to the health of the workers occurred. That is not necessary; all that it is necessary to prove is that the dust or other impurity existed in such intensity as to be injurious. The object of the Act was to prevent injury to the health of the workers. It is common knowledge that the inhalation of dust is not usually a direct cause of illness but that it often lays the seeds for phthisis and other lung troubles. Moreover, it frequently happens, as in the present case, that workers who are known to have suffered from the impurity of the atmosphere are reticent when summoned to give evidence before a magistrate. There was positive evidence before the magistrate that dust was generated and inhaled to an injurious extent which he ought to have taken into consideration.

The respondent did not appear.

BRUCE, J.—The question for the decision of the magistrate is whether dust was generated and inhaled by the workers in the factory to an injurious extent. It is sufficient if the dust has a tendency to injure health. It may be that injury to health would result only after long exposure to the impure atmosphere. If the air is so impure as necessarily to cause injury to health it is not necessary to prove injury to the health of any particular workman. It is enough if in the long run injury to health would result. If the magistrate finds, as here, that the dusty atmosphere has not in fact injured any of the workers, that is not enough. He must find whether or not it is injurious.

PHILLIMORE, J.—The case must go back for the magistrate to find whether the inhalation of the dust was in fact injurious, with an intimation from us that for that purpose it is not necessary to find that any one was actually injured.

Case remitted.

"THE HEATHER BELL."
HORTON v. WARD (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Right of mortgagee of ship to repudiate considered.

Although there are certain kinds of charter-parties which may be repudiated by the mortgagee of a ship, on the ground that his security is thereby impaired, nevertheless a mortgagee cannot challenge or repudiate a charter-party merely on the ground that its terms are unfavourable to the interests of the mortgagor, and therefore of himself.

This was an action brought by Mr. William Horton to recover damages for the alleged wrongful taking possession of a vessel by the defendant Mr. William Ward at a time when the vessel was, as was alleged, under a charter to the plaintiff.

The facts were as follows: The plaintiff was the proprietor of the Rhos Abbey Hotel and pier at Colwyn Bay, North Wales.

Being anxious to secure a service of passenger boats between Rhos and Liverpool during the summer season, the steamship Heather Bell was put upon the service, and the plaintiff partly financed her.

The vessel was the property of the defendant, but in July, 1900, he sold her to the South Coast and Continental Service Co. (Limited) for £2,500, £625 being paid in cash and the balance by three bills at two, four, and six months respectively.

On the 29th of August the South Coast and Continental Service Co. entered into a contract with the plaintiff, the material terms of which are set out in the judgment.

The South Coast and Continental Service Co. mortgaged the ship to the defendant to secure the payment of the amounts due under these bills, the first of which fell due on the 4th of September. On that day she was taken in execution by the sheriff under a judgment which had been obtained against her owners.

On the 8th of September the sheriff, having learnt of the existence of the agreement of the 29th of August, withdrew.

The defendant thereupon straightway seized her under the power contained in his mortgage, one of his aforesaid bills, which fell due on the 4th of September, having been dishonoured by the Continental Service Co.

Carver, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the plaintiff, contended that the agreement amounted to a charter-party, and inasmuch as the defendant had had notice of it he was not entitled to seize the ship.

They cited Cory Brothers v. Stewart, 2 Times L. R. 508.

Robson, K.C., and E. M. Pollock, for the defendant, argued that the agreement did not amount to a charter-party, but alternatively, if it did, it was intended to, and actually did, impair the security of the mortgage inasmuch as it rendered the vessel less available for immediate sale and interfered with her ability to earn freight.

They cited Collins v. Lamport, 34 L. J. Ch. 196; Brown v. Tanner, 16 W. R. 882, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 597; Keith v. Burrows, 25 W. R. 831, 2 App. Cas. 636; The Celtic King, [1894] P. 175.

JEUNE, P., in delivering a considered judgment, said: The question in this case is whether the defendant, Mr. Thomas William Ward, was justified in taking possession of The Heather Bell by virtue of a mortgage to him of that vessel notwithstanding a contract (I purposely use a general term) which had been entered into between the owners and the plaintiff in regard to her. The mortgage to the defendant was registered on the 13th of July, 1900, and, after reciting that the South Coast and Continental Service (Limited) had purchased The Heather Bell from Mr. Thomas William Ward, mortgaged the vessel to Mr. Ward to secure the instalments of the purchase-money with interest. On the 4th of September, 1900, default was made in the payment of one of these instalments, and thereafter the defendant was unquestionably entitled to exercise his rights as mortgagee and take possession of the vessel unless he was prevented from doing so by the operation of the contract to which I have referred. That contract was made on the 29th of August, 1900, between the South Coast and Continental Service (Limited) and was in the following terms: "Memorandum, whereby the South Coast and Continental Service (Limited), the owners of the s.s. Heather Bell . . . agree to charter her to William Horton, of Bryn Dinarth, Colwyn Bay, from the 29th of August until the 15th of October, 1900, on the following terms: (1) The boat shall be delivered to W. Horton at Liverpool forthwith as she now is. . . . The vessel shall be used for passenger and merchandize traffic between Liverpool, Rhos-on-Sea, Llandudno, Menai Straits, Colwyn Bay, and Rhyl, and not otherwise without the consent in writing of the owners. (2) It is admitted that at the present time part of the machinery of the boat is held as a lien for repairs thereto, and it has been agreed that the said W. Horton will advance such amount as may be necessary to liberate such machinery and shall add same to what is already due to him thereon. (3) The owners also admit that W. Horton has advanced certain other sums in connection with the boat, for which sums it is agreed that the said W. Horton shall have a charge and lien on the boat ranking in the highest position the owners are able to fix the same, having regard to the existing circumstances. (4) The said W. Horton is hereby authorized to sell such of the effects on board the boat as may not be requisite or necessary for the use of the boat and the service aforesaid, but shall bring the proceeds into the accounts hereinafter mentioned. (5) The said W. Horton shall be in no way responsible . . . for any repairs which may from time to time be necessary or desirable, but any repairs he thinks fit to execute shall be added to his charge and lien. (7) The charterer shall keep true and exact accounts of all receipts . . . and of all payments and expenses of the service. The before-mentioned expenses shall be paid out of the before-mentioned receipts . . . and accounts shall be made up weekly. (8) The profits of the venture (if any) shall belong to and be divided in equal shares and proportions between the owners and the charterer at the expiration of the charter. (10) In case the mortgagees of the said vessel shall exercise their rights (if any) and thereby the charter hereby granted shall be affected, the owners shall not be responsible to the charterer in damages or otherwise in respect thereof."

It was alleged by the plaintiff that this contract was a charter-party, and by the defendant that it was an agreement. In fact it was both. It provided for the terms on which the plaintiff should use the vessel on the service between Liverpool and Rhos and other places, and it also gave the plaintiff a charge on the vessel in respect of the advances and payments made, or to be made, by him, and referred to in clauses 2 and 3. The law with regard to the rights of the mortgagor of a ship to deal with it so long as the mortgagee abstains from taking possession is, in general, well recognized. The 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which enacted that "a mortgagee shall not by reason of his mortgage be deemed to be the owner of a ship or any share therein, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner of such mortgaged ship or share, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt," received an authoritative exposition by Lord Westbury in the case of Collins v. Lamport, decided in 1865. It was there laid down that "as long as the dealings of the mortgagor with the ship are consistent with the sufficiency of the mortgagee's security, so long as those dealings do not materially prejudice or detract from or impair the sufficiency of the security of the vessel, as comprised in the mortgage, so long is there Parliamentary authority given to the mortgagor to act in all respects as owner of the vessel, and if he has authority to act as owner he has of necessity authority to enter into all those contracts touching the disposition of the ship which may be necessary for enabling him to get the full value and full benefit of his property." This case, therefore, asserts in the clearest terms the right of a mortgagor to deal with his property, provided that his dealings do not materially impair the security of the mortgagee, and his right so to deal is not limited to doing so by any particular form of contract, whether that of a charter-party or any other. The case of Keith v. Burrows shows that the mortgagor is by no means bound to employ the ship in a way profitable to himself or of advantage to the mortgagee as providing earnings of which the mortgagee might take possession. Lord Cairns in that case laid it down in the broadest terms: "The mortgagee of a ship does not, ordinarily speaking, or by a mortgage such as existed in the present case, obtain any transfer by way of contract or assignment of the freight, nor does the mortgagor of a ship undertake to employ the ship in any particular way, or indeed to employ the ship so as to earn freight at all. The mortgagor of a ship may allow the ship to lie tranquil in dock, or he may employ it in any part of the world, not in earning freight, but for the purpose of bringing home goods of his own, or for his own benefit."

The principles of these cases was followed in the case of Cory Brothers v. Stewart In that case it would appear that by the terms of the charter-party the whole, or nearly the whole, of the freight was payable at or before the time of the sailing of the vessel, so that the mortgagee could not by taking possession obtain any or any substantial advantage out of the operation of the charter-party. "The security," said the Master of the Rolls, "was of course a freight-earning ship, but a particular charter-party was not part of the security. That was not what was mortgaged. The ship must be capable of earning freight, but not necessarily within a week or a month, or any particular period. If anything had been done in the present case which had prevented the ship from being a freight-earning ship, that would no doubt have impaired the security, but what had in fact happened had not impaired the security. The mortgagee so long as he kept possession could not throw over the charter-party, but must fulfil it in all its terms." It is not, to my mind, easy to reconcile the principles laid down in these cases with the principle which governed the case of Brown v. Tanner in the Court of Appeal. There the mortgagor, after making a charter-party under which freight was payable, during the voyage assigned the freight to a third person. It was held that the mortgagee, having taken possession before the freight became due, was entitled to it notwithstanding its assignment by the mortgagor. Page Wood, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The mortgagor can bind the mortgagee by a charter-party, being to that extent in a different position from the mortgagor of real property, who cannot bind his mortgagee by a lease. This was decided by Lord Westbury in Collins v. Lamport. But we cannot accept the inference drawn from that case by Mr. Druce, that the mortgagor, having so effected a charter-party, can also mortgage the freight before it becomes due so as to prevent the mortgagee of the ship on taking possession before the freight is due from receiving it. So to hold would enable the mortgagor to deprive the mortgagee of the whole benefit of the security. The ship might be chartered for several years, and the freight immediately assigned behind the back of the mortgagee." I am not aware whether Lord Cairns (who was Lord Chancellor at the time, and who appears to have sat in the case decided before Brown v. Tanner) was party to the decision in Brown v. Tanner. The report is silent on the point. If he was, the decision in Brown v. Tanner clearly cannot be at variance with his lordship's previous decision in Keith v. Burrows. But I confess it is not to me easy to understand why, if the freight under a charter-party is no part of the mortgagee's security, and if the mortgagor may make a charter-party which yields no freight, or may make a charter-party under which the freight is made payable to a third party before the voyage commences, he may not assign the freight during the continuance of the voyage. It certainly can make no practical difference to the mortgagee whether the freight is alienated by the charter-party itself or by a subsequent document, his power of obtaining it being equally in both cases destroyed. However, for the purposes of the present case, it is sufficient for me to say that whether the freight created by a charter-party can or cannot be assigned subsequently so as to defeat the prospect of the mortgagee obtaining it by taking possession, the mortgagee cannot challenge or repudiate a charter-party merely on the ground that its terms are unfavourable to the interests of the mortgagor and therefore of himself. I may add that the case of The Celtic King, decided by Barnes, J., illustrates the kind of charter-party which does impair the security of the mortgagee, and may therefore be repudiated by him. In that case there was an agreement by which a shipowner whilst a steamer was being built for him bound himself to fit her for a particular trade—that is to say, the trade in frozen meat, and run her for five years as one of a particular line, and it was held that this agreement would have a depreciatory effect upon the security of the mortgagee. "It seems to me," said the learned judge, "that where there is a contract of this particular character it would be prejudicial to the security if the mortgagee were to be obliged to admit that he could not sell the ship to realize his security in an open market without that restrictive contract. It is not like an ordinary contract for the ordinary employment of a ship which is made from time to time as things are good and as things are bad, but it is a contract which binds the vessel for a very long period and has various clauses in it which might make it extremely difficult for anybody to purchase a ship of this kind if they were bound by its terms." While, therefore, it would seem clear on the earlier authorities that the mortgagee, as I have said, cannot repudiate a contract made by the mortgagor on the ground that it is unfavourable, that must be understood with the limitation that the contract must not be such as by reason of the length of time during which it binds the ship, or by reason of unusual provisions in it, to injuriously affect the power of sale by the mortgagee.

To apply these principles to the present case. Can it be said that the contract in question impairs the security which The Heather Bell constituted for the defendant by reason of his mortgage? During the argument I had some doubt whether the security was not impaired by the provisions in section 7, which appeared by the term "before-mentioned expenses" to make the sum advanced or to be advanced by the plaintiff under clauses 2 and 3 payable out of the gross receipts of the vessel. This would have been in effect an assignment of the earnings of the ship during the period of the contract, and, notwithstanding the case of Cory Brothers v. Stewart, I should have thought it difficult, having regard to the decision in Brown v. Tanner, to hold that such a contract did not impair the security and render the sale of the vessel difficult, if not impossible, according to the view taken in The Celtic King, unless, indeed, it could be said that the comparatively short time during which the contract in the present case was to be in force—viz., till the 15th of October, 1900—made a material distinction with the facts in the case of The Celtic King. But, on considering the present contract, I come clearly to the conclusion that the "before-mentioned expenses" in clause 7 do not include the sums referred to in clauses 2 and 3. This difficulty being cleared away, there remains, I think, no other. It is true that clauses 2 and 3 give the plaintiff a charge and lien on The Heather Bell for his advances, but this charge is clearly subordinated to that of the defendant, and, therefore, in no way impairs his security. The right conferred by section 4 to sell certain articles of equipment appears to relate to some matters of very trifling importance. The rest of the contract provides for the terms on which the boat was to be run. I do not think I have to inquire whether these terms were unduly favourable to the plaintiff. They were not likely to be so, as the plaintiff had interests in the steamer running apart from her earnings. I do not think that they were unusual terms for the employment of such a vessel as The Heather Bell, constructed as she was, for exactly such employment as is contemplated by the contract. I doubt if they would render the vessel less saleable during the currency of the contract; certainly they would not at its termination, which was only some five weeks after the defendant took possession. It results, therefore, that in my opinion the defendant had no right to interfere with the execution of the contract; and there must be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, and an inquiry as to the amount of damages.

PARSONS v. THE NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING CO. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Goods marked as in margin—Delivery of goods otherwise marked—Mistake in bill of lading—Identification marks—Liability of shipowner—Exemption in case of incorrectness in marking—Bills of Lading Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), s. 3.

A bill of lading, signed by the defendants' manager, described the goods comprised in it as "being marked and numbered as in margin," and contained the following clause: "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery or loss unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark or number and address." Delivery was offered to the plaintiff, who was the indorsee of the bill of lading, of goods which were marked and numbered otherwise than as in the margin of the bill of lading. It appeared that these goods had been intended by the shippers to form part of the consignment represented by the plaintiff's bill of lading, but that they had by some mistake been incorrectly described in the bill of lading. The plaintiff refused to take delivery of the goods in question, and brought an action for damages for short delivery.

Held, that the plaintiff could not maintain the action.

Per Collins and Romer, L.JJ.—The defendants were not precluded by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, from showing that the goods had in fact been shipped under the bill of lading, and that there was a mistake in the margin of the bill of lading.

Per A. L. Smith, M.R.—The defendants were relieved from liability by the exemption clause in the bill of lading as to correctness of marking.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., on the trial of the action without a jury: reported [1900] 1 Q. B. 714, 48 W. R. Dig. 170.

The plaintiff was the indorsee of two bills of lading for a quantity of lambs' carcases shipped from New Zealand on board the steamship Fifeshire by the Christchurch Meat Co. The defendants were the agents in New Zealand of the owners of The Fifeshire. The bills of lading were signed by the defendants' manager, and described the goods comprised in them as "being marked and numbered as in margin."

The bills of lading contained the following clause: "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery or loss unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark or number and address."

On the arrival of the ship in London delivery was offered to the plaintiff of certain carcases which were not marked and numbered as in the bills of lading. The plaintiff refused to take delivery of these carcases, and brought this action for damages for short delivery.

It appeared that the carcases in question had been intended by the shippers to form part of the consignment represented by the plaintiff's bills of lading, but that they had by some mistake been incorrectly described in the bills of lading.

Kennedy, J., gave judgment for the defendants, being of opinion that they were not prevented by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, from showing that there had been a mistake in the description in the bills of lading, and that the carcases had in fact been shipped as part of the plaintiff's consignment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 19.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an action by an indorsee for valuable consideration of two bills of lading signed by the defendants to recover the sum of £124 19s. 1d. for short delivery thereunder in the Port of London of 154 carcasses of frozen lambs ex steamship Fifeshire, and the question is whether the plaintiff was bound to accept in fulfilment of the contract contained in these bills of lading carcases of frozen lambs which not only did not bear the marks and numbers upon the bills of lading of which he was the indorsee for value, but bore marks and numbers which were different from, and not those upon, the bills of lading. It is sufficient to trace what took place in respect of one of these bills of lading, for by so doing the case will be freed of many details, and the point will thus become more conspicuous.

On the 30th of March, 1899, the defendants signed a bill of lading, which, so far as material, is as follows: "Shipped in good order by the Christchurch Meat Co. (Limited), on board the steamship Fifeshire, now lying in Timaru, 1,076 carcases frozen lambs, being marked and numbered as in margin, to be delivered in like good order and condition" (subject to exceptions not material to this case) "at the Port of London unto order or assigns." The marks and numbers in the margin of the bill of lading were as follows: The Sun Brand, Canterbury, N.Z., Lamb 622 X, 608 carcases, 722 X, 468 carcases, weighing 35,806lb. The meaning of these marks and numbers, apart from special meanings unknown to the plaintiff, was that 608 carcases of Sun Brand, Canterbury, New Zealand, lambs marked 622 X, and also 468 carcases of similar lambs marked 722 X—i.e., 1,076 carcases in all, and so marked and numbered, had been shipped under the bill of lading upon the steamship Fifeshire, which carcases so marked and numbered, and not, in my judgment, carcases marked and numbered with other and different marks and numbers, were contracted to be delivered in like good order and condition, subject to exceptions, at the port of discharge. Before dealing with what these marks and numbers further indicated I will state what took place.

On the 16th of June, 1899, the plaintiff purchased the lambs covered by this bill of lading from the agents of the shippers, the Christchurch Meat Co., and upon such purchase received an invoice from them. By this invoice the plaintiff was debited with 1,076 carcases marked 622 X and 722 X, and for these carcases he paid the sum of £820 11d. 1d. Upon the purchase the bill of lading was indorsed and handed to the plaintiff, and he also then received from the vendors a certificate of insurance which covered 608 carcases marked 622 X and 468 carcases marked 722 X, for two months from the date of the arrival of the steamship Fifeshire in dock, when lying at the premises of the Leadenhall Market Storage Co. and other places. It will thus be seen that these carcases were shipped under specific marks and numbers. They were taken on board by the ship as being carcases so marked and numbered, and were to be, in my judgment, as I have said before, delivered, subject to exceptions not material to the point in hand, under these marks and numbers, and certainly not under different marks and numbers, at the port of discharge. There is no question in this case of marks and numbers being obliterated by sea perils or otherwise. These carcases were purchased by the plaintiff from the shippers under the specific marks and numbers, and, as before stated, the plaintiff held a certificate of insurance covering carcases so specifically marked and numbered and none other. Upon the plaintiff having thus become indorsee of the bill of lading and purchaser of the carcases above mentioned, application was made on his behalf for delivery, together with others, of the 608 carcases marked 622 X and of the 468 carcases marked 722 X, when delivery of the 468 carcases marked 722 X was duly made, but delivery of the whole of the 608 carcases marked 622 X was refused upon the ground that the defendants could not deliver the whole of these 608 carcases, for, it was said, they had not all been shipped on board; but the defendants were willing to deliver to the plaintiff 507 of the 608 carcases marked 622 X, as in my judgment they were bound to do, but this was 101 carcases short of the bill of lading quantity, and in respect of this shortage of 101 carcases they subsequently tendered 101 carcases not marked 622X but carcases marked 522 X. These the plaintiff refused to accept in fulfilment of his contract with the defendants, and Kennedy, J., has held that he could not refuse and was bound to take these 101 carcases not marked according to his bill of lading, but marked in an altogether different way: for 622 X is certainly not the same mark and number as 522 X; and the plaintiff appeals.

Before I come to section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, I wish to consider whether the marks and numbers 622 X, which are the marks and numbers whereby to identify the plaintiff's carcases and without which they could not be identified, were marks and numbers which were material to the plaintiff either as regards the identity of the carcases which the plaintiff was entitled to receive under his bill of lading or as regards his dealing with the carcases after he had received them; for if material to the plaintiff I cannot agree with Kennedy, J., that the plaintiff was bound to accept the carcases tendered in fulfilment of the contract contained in the bill of lading. If the marks and numbers were not material to the plaintiff other considerations would arise, and in my opinion that case would not be the present case.

Now, first of all, why are marks and numbers of identification placed in the ordinary course of business upon goods and also upon a bill of lading? In my opinion, in the first place to identify to the holder of the bill of lading, whoever he may be, the goods which that holder is entitled to demand and take delivery of ex ship upon its arrival. In the present case there were in the hold of The Fifeshire many thousands of carcases under different bills of lading with different marks and numbers. If a holder of a bill of lading has, for instance, a bill of lading for carcases or for other goods, say, for corn in sacks, in a ship containing different shipments of carcases or corn, with no marks at all thereon, a very improbable contingency, what is he to demand ex ship upon its arrival? It seems to me that he can demand nothing and he must wait until all the holders of other bills of lading with marks and numbers thereon have been satisfied and then take what happens to be left in the hold of the ship, and it may be thus lose the market in the meantime; and, again, if he has a bill of lading with marks and numbers on it and no goods with like marks and numbers come up out of the hold of the ship, the same thing must happen. Again, suppose a bill of lading holder were to take ex ship goods not marked in accordance with his bill of lading, say, goods marked as in this case 522 X, instead of goods marked 622 X according to his bill of lading, what would be his position if and when the holder of the bill of lading for goods marked 522 X came and demanded his goods from the bill of lading holder, who had taken the goods marked 522 X under a bill of lading only covering goods marked 622 X? The answer is obvious. The person who had thus taken these goods would have to give them up. Surely these matters have only to be stated to show the materiality of marks and numbers of identification in commerce and the importance necessarily attaching to them in the carrying on of daily business. In my judgment the marks of identification in this case are very material; although there may be some cases in which certain identification marks may be superfluous or for some other reason immaterial, but this remark has no place in the present case. Again, if in the present case the plaintiff could be forced to take the carcases marked 522 X, as Kennedy, J., has held that he can be, what becomes of his insurance which only covered carcases marked 622 X and not carcases marked 522 X? In my opinion, if the plaintiff had had to make a claim against the insurance company if the goods were burnt, the company, under a defence that their insurance covered carcases marked 622 X and not carcases marked 522 X, would stand well for judgment, or at the very least there would obviously be protracted litigation. With these remarks as to the materiality of marks and numbers of identification I come to the Bills of Lading Act, 1855.

In my opinion section 3 of this Act prevents a person who has signed the bill of lading from attempting to show in a case such as this that of the carcases marked 622 X 101 were not shipped, but that carcases marked 522 X were shipped in their place. In my opinion the Bills of Lading Act was passed to shut out a person who signs the bill of lading from a controversy such as this with a holder for value of a bill of lading. This section enacts that "every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board; provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper or of the holder or some person under whom the holder claims." No question arises upon the latter part of this section. What then are the goods in this case represented by the bill of lading to have been shipped on board the steamship Fifeshire? In my opinion the representation is not that 608 carcases not marked or numbered at all, nor that 608 carcases marked 522 X have been shipped, but that 608 carcases marked 622 X have been shipped. That being in my opinion the representation of the bill of lading, the Bills of Lading Act applies to this case and shuts out the present suggested defence from the defendants, and I do not think that the Bills of Lading Act is confined to marks of quality and quantity which are comparatively rare when compared with marks of identification, and which quality marks when used are usually coupled with a statement in the bill of lading "weight, contents, and value unknown." In my opinion section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act applies to what is usual if not universal in commerce—viz, to goods as in the present case shipped under specific marks and numbers of identification, and so represented in the bill of lading. The above is my opinion independently of the special value proved in this case to be attached to the marks and numbers themselves. It was proved that "Sun Brand X" denotes the quality of the carcases; the number 6 denotes the date when the animal was killed and put into ice; the duplication of the numbers (2.2) show where the animal was killed and frozen; the final number 2 shows the grade. These numbers appear to me to be material, apart from identification, should disputes arise as to the freshness or otherwise of or about the quality of the carcases. Moreover, if the plaintiff is bound to take carcases marked 522 X, as Kennedy, J., holds he is, instead of carcases marked 622 X, he will be bound to take carcases killed and frozen at a date different from that at which carcases marked 622 X in his bill of lading, which he has purchased, were killed and frozen. Can this be? I think not. Kennedy, J., embarked upon the inquiry as to whether a carcase marked 522 X had any different value in the market for meat from a carcase marked 622 X, and as a commercial article he found that it was absolutely unaffected in its character or value; but, with submission, it is not merely a question as to whether the carcases under the different marks were of the same value in the market, but whether the marks and numbers were material or immaterial to the plaintiff. If I purchase cases of champagne identified by marks A B C, what answer is it, when I claim my goods so marked and identified, to say that the goods tendered, which are marked X Y Z, are of the same value in the market, or even of greater value than those marked A B C? For the reasons above I think that the marks of identification in this case were of materiality to the plaintiff, and that the tender was not a good tender. Kennedy, J., also investigated the question whether 101 carcases marked 622 X were put on board at Timaru, and he came to the conclusion that they were not, and that the 101 carcases marked 522 X were put on board in their place; but this, in my opinion, for the reasons above, he could not go into as a defence by a person who signed the bill of lading, and I think that the plaintiff could not be forced by the defendants in this case to take the 101 carcases not marked according to his bill of lading; and if this case had rested here I could not have found for the defendants. For the reasons hereafter appearing I need say nothing about the damages.

A very formidable point was next taken by Mr. Carver for the defendants, which was that even if the tender of the 101 carcases was a bad tender, the defendants were protected by a clause in the bill of lading from being sued in the circumstances of this case for incorrect delivery of 608 carcases marked 622 X. This clause is as follows: "The ship shall not be responsible for correct delivery or loss unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark and number or address." What is the meaning of each package being correctly marked with the mark and number before shipment? In my judgment it can only mean correctly marked with the mark and number according to the bill of lading; for with what else can the mark and number upon the packages mentioned in this clause be correct? These marks and numbers must also be distinct and permanent. In my opinion, this is the true meaning of this clause, and it was inserted to meet a case like the present, where the goods were not correctly marked according to the bill of lading. It must not be forgotten that the bill of lading is drawn by the shippers, who ought to make the marks and numbers in the bill of lading and on the goods correct with each other. Kennedy, J., has found, and I do not differ from his finding upon this issue, though he has not applied the clause, for it was not necessary for him to do so in the view he took of this case, that the 101 carcases marked 522 X were not correctly marked, and should have been marked 622 X, in which case, and in which alone, in my opinion, they would have been correctly marked within the meaning of the clause. As, therefore, these 101 carcases were not correctly marked, this clause comes into play and exempts the defendants from the present claim of the plaintiff. For this last reason I think this appeal should be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: This case raises a point of some difficulty upon the meaning and effect of section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855. The case comes before us on appeal from Kennedy, J., in whose judgment the facts are fully set out. The plaintiff is the indorsee for value of two bills of lading signed by the defendants; and he sues for damages for non-delivery of certain carcases, part of a consignment of frozen lambs' carcases embraced in the said bills of lading. The same point arises on both the bills of lading, and it is not necessary to refer to more than one of them. This acknowledged the shipment of "1,076 carcases frozen lamb," "being marked and numbered as in margin." The marks in the margin are "Sun Brand. Canterbury, N.Z., Lamb, 622 X 608 carcases, 722 X 468 carcases, weighing 35,806lbs." The learned judge has found as a fact, and I think the evidence warrants his conclusion, that there were included among the 608 carcases described in the margin as having the marks 622 X 101 carcases marked 522 X, which by a mistake of the shippers were misdescribed in the margin of the bill of lading as marked 622 X instead of 522 X, but were in fact shipped under, and intended to be comprised in, the bill of lading. Those marked 522 X were, as he finds, of precisely the same character and value as a commercial article as those marked 622 X, so that a contract for sale of Sun Brand lambs, second quality, of the Christchurch Co.'s freezing might have been satisfied equally well out of either mark or out of both indiscriminately. In fact, the first two marginal figures have no significance whatever to the buyer, and convey to him no representation as to the character of the meat, The final figure does indicate the grade. In the words of Kennedy, J., "The meat as a commercial article is absolutely unaffected in its character or value, whether it is marked 522 or 622." The defendants tendered those carcases marked 522 X as being part of those shipped under the plaintiff's bill of lading, but, the price of frozen lamb having fallen since his purchase, the plaintiff refused to accept them, and brought this action for damages for non-delivery. His contention is that under section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, the defendants are estopped from denying that the goods marked as described in the margin of the bill of lading were shipped, and that, as those they tendered did not bear identically the same marks, there has been a failure to deliver, which entitles the plaintiff to the damages fixed by the bill of lading in case of loss—viz., the invoice price of the goods. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the goods tendered were in fact the goods shipped under and comprised in the bill of lading, although some of them were by mistake described as bearing a mark which they did not bear; that the existence and identity of the goods are unaltered in fact, though the identification may be more difficult by reason of the misdescription. And this was the view taken by Kennedy, J. He was of opinion that the identity of the goods tendered with those shipped under the bill of lading was proved, and my judgment is based on that finding. If such identity could not be established, very different considerations would arise.

As the plaintiff's case is rested wholly on the estoppel of the Bills of Lading Act, it is desirable to see what was the mischief to which that Act was addressed in order to determine whether section 3 will bear the construction placed on it by the plaintiff. The preamble, so far as it relates to this matter, is as follows: "Whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board, and it is proper that such bills of lading in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value should not be questioned by the master or other person signing the same on the ground of the goods not having been laden as aforesaid, Be it therefore enacted," &c. The mischief, therefore, which it was thought desirable to remedy only arose where the goods in respect of which the bill of lading purported to be signed had not been put on board, and the master or person signing relied on that fact as an excuse for non-delivery. Here it is a fact that all the goods in respect of which the bill of lading was intended to be signed were put on board, though certain of the marks on some of them were miscopied in the bill of lading, and the person signing is not setting up that they have not been laden, but, on the contrary, is insisting that they have been laden, and is claiming to deliver them. Section 3 is as follows: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] The section therefore addresses itself to the mischief named in the preamble. It deals with persons who have acted on a misrepresentation in a bill of lading that goods have been shipped when they have not, and estops the person signing from denying the shipment. It is the identity of the goods shipped with those represented as shipped which is the pith of the matter; that is the subject of the misrepresentation referred to, and nothing which would not be material to such identity need be embraced in the estoppel. It is obvious that where marks have no market meaning and indicate nothing whatever to a buyer as to the nature, quality, or quantity of the goods which he is buying it is absolutely immaterial to him whether the goods bear one mark or another. These considerations throw a light on the interpretation of the section. It is only as to "such shipment" that the bill of lading is said to be conclusive, and such shipment refers back to the goods which the bill of lading represents to have been put on board. Now, the goods which the bill of lading represents as shipped continue to be the same goods, whichever out of any number of merely arbitrary marks are put on them, and will remain the same whether the marks were on them before shipment or are rubbed off or changed after shipment. In other words, they go to the identification only, and not the identity. The goods represented by the bill of lading to have been shipped have been shipped, and a mistaken statement as to marks of this class merely makes identification more difficult; it does not affect the existence or identity of the goods. It seems to me, therefore, that both on the strict wording of the section and having regard to the mischief to which it was addressed the plaintiff has failed to bring his case within the estoppel which it creates. It is not the fact and it would not be true to say that the 1,076 carcases which the bill of lading represented to have been shipped were not shipped because the bill of lading did not correctly describe the mark on some of their number. In my opinion, as I have already said, their identity was unaffected, and the property in them, marked as they were, passed to the plaintiff on the transfer of the bill of lading. The defendants are estopped from denying "such shipment," but nothing more, and the shipment is none the less the shipment represented by the bill of lading because some of the marks were misdescribed. The defendants are not here questioning the bill of lading on the ground of the goods not having been laden, and are not driven to asserting anything which they are estopped from asserting. I agree with Kennedy, J., that to adopt the construction contended for by the appellant would be to strain the fair meaning of the section and extend it beyond the mischief it was intended to meet. Moreover, if mere identification marks are within the estoppel, any discrepancy between the marks on the goods and the mark in the margin would equally destroy the identity. Every difference would be equally material, whether the result of accident or clerical error. To hold this would impose an enormous and, indeed, having regard to the practice of tallying, an impossible task on the shipowners. Marks which convey a meaning as to the character of the goods stand on a totally different footing. These, it seems to me, would be embraced in the estoppel, because the characteristics which they indicate are essential to the identity of the goods, and an article so marked is a different article in the market from one not so marked. They are material factors in the identity as distinguished from the identification of the goods sold, and therefore a discrepancy between the goods described and the goods shipped would mean a difference of identity, and the shipowner would therefore fail to prove that the goods which the bill of lading represented to have been shipped had been shipped, and being estopped from denying that the goods shipped were "such" as the bill of lading represented them to be he could not make a good delivery. On the other hand, suppose a mere arbitrary mark correctly described in the bill of lading had got rubbed off in transit, and that the package was, nevertheless, otherwise sufficiently identified, would not the indorsee of the bill of lading be bound to accept it? Would not the property in it have passed to him so that he could have maintained trover for it if the shipowner had on demand refused to deliver it, and though he might have his action for any delay in delivery through difficulty of identification, could he sue the carrier for non-delivery on the footing that it had been lost, though the carrier was pressing it on his acceptance? If not, it must be because the loss of the mark has not destroyed the identity. But the appellant's argument involves a right to sue for non-delivery in such a case, since the ground of rejection and of action would be precisely the same in both cases—viz., the want of correspondence in marks between the thing shipped and the thing tendered. Suppose the master had signed the bill of lading, and the price of the goods had gone up, and the action had been brought against the shipowner claiming delivery of the carcases in question, could he have defended himself on the ground that the master could not make him responsible for goods that had not been put on board, and that the undelivered balance of the bill of lading quantity had not been put on board? (See Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665.) Or, on proof of the actual facts, would he not have been held liable on the ground that the goods were put on board and that the master's mistake in allowing a wrong mark of this class to get into the margin (not a quality mark, as in Cox v. Bruce, 35 W. R. 207, 18 Q. B. D. 147) was a mistake within the scope of his authority, and that all the 1,076 carcases were in fact shipped?

Or, to take a still simpler case, if this action had been brought before the Bills of Lading Act, and the same facts had been proved, would they have supported a defence that the goods had never been put on board, and that the defendant therefore never became liable to deliver them? I think the defendant would have been forced to admit that he had in fact received on board the goods intended to be described in the bill of lading. But, if this be so, this case is clearly not within the mischief at which the Bills of Lading Act was pointed. Indeed, it was not suggested in argument that the shippers could have maintained this action, and the plaintiff takes only the shippers' rights under the bill of lading by the transfer, except so far as the statutory estoppel alters them. That estoppel is, in my opinion, limited to the identity of the goods shipped.

An element of confusion, as it seems to me, has been introduced into this case based on the meaning which the first figure of the marks in question, the only one which did not correspond with the bill of lading, had for the manufacturers, indicating, as it did, to them the day of the week on which the carcase was put into the freezing process. But as it is found as a fact that these figures conveyed nothing whatever to dealers in these goods, and, further, that the first figure indicated in fact nothing which had any bearing on the quality of the goods, but was merely a private mark helping the manufacturers to trace them through their books, it seems to me that any considerations based on them can have no place in the discussion. The same remark applies to the insurance. The goods were equally covered under the floating policy, whether they were 522 or 622: see Stephens v. Australasian Insurance Co., 21 W. R. 228, L. R. 8 C. P. 18. The result is that the right of action, if any, for loss or inconvenience caused by the mistake is untouched, but the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for non-delivery based on the estoppel.

The decided cases throw little light on the matter. They certainly do not favour the appellant's contention. Bradley v. Dunipace, 7 H. & N. 200, 1 H. & C. 521, 10 W. R. Dig. 82, merely decided that where two sets of bags of rye meal of two different sizes but with the same mark had been shipped promiscuously, but the master had signed two bills of lading for them, one of which was for 467 bags, with a statement of weight added which, if calculated, would have worked out to approximately twelve stone a bag, the master was not excused from delivering the right bags to the holder of the 467 bill of lading by the clause "not responsible for weight." It was his duty to deliver the right bags, and the statement of weight might have helped him to identify them. This does not seem to touch the point in discussion. Cox v. Bruce emphasizes the distinction between quality marks and other marks. Blanchet v. Powell's Llantivit Collieries Co., 22 W. R 490, L. R. 9 Ex. 74, decided that a master who had signed a bill of lading for goods described as of a certain weight was not estopped in an action brought by him against the consignee for lump freight from asserting that the amount stated was a mistake, and that a less weight had been shipped, though he might have been, had the action been against him for non-delivery. The defendant by paying money into court had admitted liability for some freight, whereas the defence, if good, would have gone to the whole. The issue of amount shipped was therefore immaterial. The decision and the dicta do not touch the question of marks, going not to quantity or quality, but to identification only. The other cases cited come no nearer to the point.

It remains to consider the effect of the clause in the bill of lading: "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked with a mark and number or address." The bill of lading is on the shippers' (the Christchurch Co. (Limited)) own form. One side of it has a printed statement of their address and different factories and an enumeration of various brands used by them. The practice with respect to them, as proved in evidence, is that a bill of lading is filled in at their factory with the marks and numbers supplied to them by their own servants, whose business it is to tally the goods into cold vans for carriage to the ship's side. They are thence shot rapidly—at the rate of about 1,000 an hour—into the cold chamber in the ship, and no attempt is made by the ship to do more than tally the number of carcases received. The marks and numbers filled in by the shippers in the margin are accepted by the person who signs the bill of lading without verification. Timaru, the port of loading, is an open roadstead and dangerous, and it is important that the loading should be done with the utmost despatch. What, then, is meant by "correctly marked" in the clause? The marks referred to seem in their context to be clearly identification marks, which which would get copied as such into the margin of the bill of lading. If so, it is difficult to see what standard of correctness could be applied to such a mark which did not include conformity to the mark in the margin of the bill of lading as tendered by the shippers. If the two coincide, it is difficult to see in what other respect the "correctness" of the mark could be material. At all events, the clause is clearly framed on the footing that but for the clause the reciprocal rights to give and take delivery would be unimpaired by the incorrectness of mere identification marks, the shipowner being left at his peril to deliver to the person entitled, the latter retaining his right to complain of "incorrect delivery" brought about by the difficulty of identification, but not excused from accepting if the identity of the goods were established. I regard it not so much as a separate ground of defence in itself as confirmatory of the main position above indicated that in the contract of the bill of lading mere identification marks are not regarded as affecting the central obligation to give and take delivery of the goods shipped, though incorrectness may furnish ground for a cross-claim if the consignee is thereby damnified.

As to the point that, if the estoppel is not extended to the identification marks, it will lead to great difficulty in practice, I think the difficulty is less formidable than it appears at first sight. It must be remembered that the difficulty, such as it is, exists in all cases where there is no estoppel. At the time when the Bills of Lading Act was passed bills of lading were much more rarely signed by persons other than the master than is the case now, and whenever the action was brought against the shipowner who had not signed, which would be the usual case, difficulty of identification would not have excused delivery or acceptance if identity were in fact established. The Legislature does not seem to have addressed itself to this matter at all, but to have left it to the ordinary law. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J., read the following judgment: On the evidence it has been found by Kennedy, J., that the carcases tendered by the defendants were part of those shipped under, and intended to be described in, the plaintiff's bill of lading I am not prepared to differ from that finding. The plaintiff, however, contends that the defendants are by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, precluded from going into evidence in order to establish the identity of the carcases tendered with those described in the bill of lading, by reason of the discrepancy between the marks on those carcases and the marks mentioned in the bill of lading. This contention raises a question of general importance as to the meaning and effect of the section, which speaks of a bill of lading "representing goods to have been shipped." Is every reference in a bill of lading to the marks on the goods of necessity part of the description of the goods within the meaning of the section? I think not. When it is remembered what the state of the law was at the time when the Act was passed, and what was the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act, it appears to me pushing the estoppel created by the section too far against the person signing the bill of lading to hold that he can in no case be permitted to go into evidence to prove a mistake in the bill of lading in reference to some of the marks on the goods. Suppose, by way of example, a bill of lading was dealing with five parcels of goods of the same size, quality, and value, and, after describing these goods accurately, it proceeded to state that the parcels were numbered consecutively 1 to 5. Could a purchaser refuse to accept delivery of one or two of the parcels, and hold the signer of the bill of lading estopped under the section, because it turned out that the two out of the five parcels which should have been respectively marked 3 and 4 were both marked 4? It appears to me that he could not, and that to hold the contrary would be to put a construction on the Act, and give an effect to its wording, which was never contemplated by the Legislature, and which the contents of the Act do not justify. In short, for the purposes of the Act a description in a bill of lading of marks on the goods is not of necessity part of the description of the goods themselves Of course difficult questions may arise on particular bills of lading, whether certain references to marks do or do not form part of the description of the goods within the meaning of section 3. Those questions will fall to be determined according to the circumstances of the particular cases in which they arise. But, speaking generally, when the section refers to the bill of lading as "representing goods to have been shipped" it is, in my opinion, only contemplating those statements which may be said to describe the goods in the ordinary mercantile sense—that is to say, statements which would substantially affect a purchaser relying on the bill of lading as to the quantity, quality, or value of the goods he was buying. Marks on the goods which, so far as the purchaser is concerned, have no meaning, and could only be referred to in the bill of lading in order to assist in the more sure or speedy identification or delivery of the goods, do not, in my opinion, form part of the description of the goods within the meaning of section 3, so as to bind the signer of the bill of lading by way of estoppel. If a bill of lading makes a mistake in describing some marks like those last mentioned, and thereby delivery of the goods is delayed or not effected, the purchaser will have all the remedies for any damage caused by the delay or non-delivery which he would have had if the Act had not been passed. In this point of view, no doubt, marks assisting identification are material to a purchaser. But I do not think he is entitled, merely because a mistake in the bill of lading as to the identification marks may cause trouble in delivery, to say that section 3 applies, and that the signer of the bill of lading is bound to admit that the goods exactly as mentioned in the bill of lading were shipped, and yet cannot be delivered.

Applying the above considerations to the case now before us, I come to the conclusion that the appellant fails. The differences in marking between the goods he refuses to take and the goods mentioned in the bill of lading are differences in respect of matters not relating to the quantity, quality, or value of the goods he bought on the faith of the bill of lading, and which in no wise influenced or affected him in his character of a person considering whether he should buy the goods referred to in the bill of lading. It is clear on the evidence that, so far as he is concerned, the differences in marking are wholly unsubstantial so far as they relate to the goods in themselves. All that can be said on his behalf is that, owing to the marks not being correctly described in the bill of lading as compared with the marks on the goods themselves, some delay in delivery would probably ensue, and in fact did ensue. But, as already pointed out, this will not justify him in contending that the defendants are estopped under section 3, whatever other rights it may give him. As to the insurance, I need not add anything to what has been said by Collins, L.J. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed, and I have not to decide the further point that was raised upon the clause in the bill of lading which has been referred to by the Master of the Rolls and Collins, L.J. But, had I been obliged to take the view that the signer of the bill of lading was estopped as contended for by the appellant, I should have felt some difficulty in holding that a clause which was directed to "correct delivery" in case of packages not being "distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment" freed the signer of the bill of lading from liability in a case where, ex hypothesi, he would be obliged to admit that goods of the appellant were shipped and are not delivered, and were not lost, injured, or altered in any way during the voyage.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Shares—Contract—Issue of fully-paid shares for consideration other than cash—Omission to file contract—Memorandum in lieu of contract—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25—Companies Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 26), s 1 (4)—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 33, 36.

Shares of one company taken in exchange for shares of another company are not shares paid for in cash, and therefore an agreement to take such shares ought to have been filed under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Quære, whether section 25 has been wholly repealed by the Companies Act, 1900.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., refusing an application for an order under the Companies Act, 1898, that a memorandum might be filed in lieu of a contract.

The facts were as follows: Brutton & Burney (Limited) were incorporated to purchase a business formerly carried on by Brutton & Burney.

It was intended that the business should be amalgamated with the business of the New Cross Brewery Co. and that the latter company should acquire the shares of Brutton & Burney (Limited).

In August, 1899, Brutton & Burney (Limited) issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for 1,200 5½ per cent. preference shares of £10 each.

The subscribers for the shares were to receive in exchange for each £10 share a share carrying the same rate of interest in the brewery company fully paid up.

Upon their receiving such shares the shares for which they applied in Brutton & Burney (Limited) were to be allotted by that company to the brewery company.

In November, 1899, applications for 646 shares in all were made to Brutton & Burney (Limited) on the prospectus and the sum of £10 per share was duly paid thereon to the company.

The applicants had allotted to them as fully paid an equivalent number of second preference shares of the brewery company and simultaneously the shares applied for in Brutton & Burney (Limited) were allotted to the brewery company.

No cash passed between the companies at the dates of the issue of the shares, but on the 2nd of February, 1900, each company paid to the other, by an exchange of cheques, the sum of £6,460.

The question raised was whether or not the preference shares of the brewery company had been paid for in cash, and consequently whether or not a contract in writing ought to have been filed under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The brewery company therefore moved for an order under the Companies Act, 1898, that a memorandum might be filed in lieu of a contract. Byrne, J., refused to make the order, being of opinion that the shares had not been issued for a consideration other than cash.

From this decision J. W. & Co., allottees of shares, appealed.

Waggett, for the appellants, contended that the transaction was a contract to exchange shares, and that the arrangement did not create a cash payment.

He referred to In re Johannesburg Hotel Co., 39 W. R. 260, [1891] 1 Ch. 119.

Elgood, for the brewery company.

T. Douglas, for Brutton & Burney (Limited).

RIGBY, L.J., said the application was made in order to render that clear which was otherwise doubtful—namely, whether these shares had been issued under a contract for a consideration other than cash. The shares were issued at a time when section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, was in force, and were open to the objection that no contract was registered under that section. By the Companies Act, 1898, the court, though no contract had been registered, could make an order for registration of a contract, or, if there was any difficulty, of a memorandum of the contract. His lordship did not see that the power conferred on the court by the Act of 1898 had ever been taken away, and, indeed, there was some foundation for the suggestion that the power had been kept alive by the very terms of the recent Act. No doubt by the Companies Act, 1900, section 25 of the Act of 1867 had been repealed. Nevertheless, a plausible argument might be raised under the Interpretation Act, 1889, that section 25 was not absolutely repealed, but that it remained in force as to companies formed before the Act of 1900. The appellants, therefore, were not unduly pertinacious in urging that they do not know what their position is having regard to section 25. The Act of 1900 says that no proceedings under section 25 shall be commenced after the commencement of the Act. But that may not cover the entire case. Suppose there should hereafter be a winding up of the company and the appellants desired to have a due appropriation of the assets of the company, it was not clear that they would obtain their share of the assets even though no proceedings could be taken against them under section 25. This was not an unreasonable contention, whether well founded or not was another question. For years the position of shareholders who had obtained their shares without paying for them in cash might be seriously imperilled. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was neither unjust nor inequitable that that the court should make an order for the filing of the memorandum, the form of which their lordships had sanctioned. With regard to costs, his lordship thought the company failed to grasp the situation, and they must therefore pay them both here and below, which was not a serious fine for the security they obtained by the order.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said if one might assume the facts to be as set forth in the memorandum, there could be no difficulty in making the order asked for. But apart from the memorandum he should have felt some difficulty, not as to whether such an order should be made, but whether there was any contract in existence which could be ordered to be filed. Looking, however, at the memorandum, there appeared to be such a contract.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed.

Appealed allowed.

SION COLLEGE (Appellants) v. MAYOR, &c., OF LONDON (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Rating—Exemption—Land reclaimed from the Thames—7 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 51—City of London Sewers Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.), s. 169.

Section 51 of 7 Geo 3, c. 37, which vested certain land in the City of London reclaimed from the River Thames in the owners of the land abutting thereon "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever," only exempts the reclaimed land from rates and assessments that were in existence at the time of the passing of the Act, and therefore does not exempt the land from the consolidated rate imposed on the occupiers of land in the City of London under section 169 of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848, the consolidated rate being substantially a new rate imposed by that Act.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) upon a special case stated on an appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the City of London from a rate made by the respondents: reported [1900] 2 Q. B. 581, 48 W. R. Dig. 121.

On the 23rd of April, 1899, the respondents, acting in pursuance of the City of London Sewers Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), the City of London Sewers Acts, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.) and 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. xci.), and the Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), and the Acts amending the same, duly made a consolidated rate for the year 1899 at 2s. 5d. in the pound (including 1s. 2d. for the school board).

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The premises which the appellants occupied, and in respect of which they were assessed, were partly on land which was reclaimed under 7 Geo. 3, c. 37 (an Act for completing Blackfriars Bridge), the same having been previously, until so reclaimed, part of the foreshore of of the River Thames.

The residue of the appellants' premises was on land reclaimed under other Acts.

The questions arising on the appeal were solely concerned with the former portion.

The land and buildings in question, known as Sion College, were acquired by the appellants in 1886 by a conveyance to them dated the 8th of April of that year.

Since the conveyance to the appellants, and before the present rate, they had not been assessed in respect of the portion in question to the consolidated rate, owing, as the respondents alleged, to an error.

The appellants duly appealed against the rate to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the City of London on the ground that the portion of land reclaimed under the Act of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was exempt by that statute from all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the land was so exempt or not

By 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 51, the ground and soil of the River Thames so to to be enclosed and embanked in the front of every such ground shall vest in the owners of such ground "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever."

By the City of London Sewers Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.), s. 169, every such rate (that is, the consolidated rate) shall be made upon every person who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house or building within the city (whether such person shall be now liable in respect of such house or building to be assessed to the relief of the poor or not by reason of any house or building being situate in any precinct or extra-parochial place or otherwise) according to the full net annual value thereof.

H. Avory, for the appellants.—The general words in section 169 of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848, do not impliedly repeal the special exemption contained in section 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37. [He referred upon this point to Garnett v. Bradley, 26 W. R 698, 3 App. Cas. 944; Liverpool Library v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, 8 W. R. 498, 5 H. & N. 526; Thorpe v. Adams, 19 W. R. 352, L. R. 6 C. P. 125.] Assuming that the exemption is not repealed, this consolidated rate is not a new rate, but is merely a new name for an old rate that existed when the Act of George III. was passed. The decisions in Williams v. Pritchard, 4 T. R. 2; Eddington v. Borman, 4 T. R. 4; Perchard v. Heywood, 8 T. R. 468; Rex v. London Gas Light and Coke Co., 8 B. & C. 54, are not therefore against the appellants.

Danckwerts, K.C., for the respondents, argued contra.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The question we have to determine is whether the appellants are liable to be assessed to this consolidated rate. To answer that question we must consider two statutes. It is clear that when the Act 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was passed, the land upon which Sion College is now built formed part of the northern bed of the River Thames. It was deemed advisable to inclose and embank the north bed of the river, and by section 51 of that Act when that was done the ground so embanked was to vest in the owners of the wharves and grounds abutting on that side of the river "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever." I come now to the City of London Sewers Act, 1848. By that Act the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London were created, in whom was vested the sole power, so far as material to this case, of paving, cleansing, watering, lighting, and improving the streets in the city. Section 168 gave them power to make rates for the purposes of the Act, the rate covering the matters above specified being called the consolidated rate; and sections 207 and 208 gave them power to borrow money on the security of the rates. By section 169 the rates are to be made upon every person who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house or building within the city (whether such person shall be now liable in respect of such house or building to be assessed to the relief of the poor or not by reason of such house or building being situated in any precinct or extra-parochial place or otherwise) according to the full net annual value thereof. It cannot be doubted that, if section 169 stood alone, Sion College would be liable to be assessed to the consolidated rate. It is said, however, that by reason of section 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, Sion College is exempt. The question in this case depends upon the true meaning of the words in that section, "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever." Do those words mean free from all taxes and assessments whether already created or to be created after the passing of that Act, or do they merely refer to taxes and assessments already created? We are not left without authority upon that point In the cases of Williams v. Pritchard, Perchard v. Heywood, and Rex v. London Gas Light and Coke Co. section 51 has been interpreted as exempting the land from taxes and assessments then in existence, but not from taxes and assessments that came into existence afterwards. This is made abundantly plain by the judgment of Bayley, J., in Rex v. London Gas Light and Coke Co. The effect of those decisions is that if the tax or assessment is substantially a new one created after the passing of the Act of George III., then that new tax or assessment does not fall within the exemption. In my judgment, when we consider what this consolidated rate is, it is substantially a new tax created by the City of London Sewers Act, 1848. I agree that it has some of the incidents of the old taxes. But looking at the circumstances in which and the purposes for which it is brought into existence, and the persons by whom it is to be administered, in my opinion it is a substantially new tax or rate. Therefore Sion College does not come within the exemption clause in section 51 of the Act of George III.

Another point was argued upon which I am not going to express any decided opinion—namely, whether, assuming that Sion College comes within the exemption in section 51, that exemption has not been impliedly repealed by section 169 of the Act of 1848. The inclination of my opinion is that it has not been repealed, but I desire to give no judgment upon that point. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the cases which have been referred to show that this particular exemption in section 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, only applies to the then existing taxes and assessments. In Rex v. London Gas Light and Coke Co. Bayley, J., in speaking of the exemption in section 51, says: "Besides, the house and window tax was a new one imposed after the exemption was given; and the exemption may be considered analogous to a covenant to pay taxes, which applies to old taxes or others substituted for them, but not to taxes entirely new, unless there are express words to give it such extensive operation." That being so, we have to deal with the question whether the exemption covers this consolidated rate. It seems to me, looking at the numerous purposes for which the consolidated rate is raised, many of which were not known or thought of at the time when the exemption was given, that the rate is substantially a new rate, and that it is none the less a new rate because it embraces some of the elements of the old tax. Though there is a certain hardship upon the appellants in this view, still I think that the only true inference is that this consolidated rate is so substantially a new tax as to bring it outside the area of the exemption as defined in the cases referred to. Taking this view of the matter it is not necessary to go into the question whether that exemption has been impliedly repealed by section 169 of the Act of 1848, and I desire to express no opinion upon that point.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Having regard to the decisions to which our attention has been drawn, decisions which are of such long standing that it would not be becoming in us to review them, in my opinion the operation of the exemption in section 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, does not extend to any tax or assessment not in existence at the time of the passing of that Act; in other words, the exemption does not extend to any tax or assessment that is substantially new. In my judgment this consolidated rate is substantially a new rate. The purposes for which the rate is raised are various, and many of them are new. Though no doubt some are not new, still the rate is one and indivisible, and cannot be split up. It is substantially a new rate which was not in existence at the date of the passing of the Act of George III. I do not desire to say anything upon the other point referred to by the Master of the Rolls and my brother Collins.

LLANBADARNFAWR SCHOOL BOARD v. OFFICIAL TRUSTEES OF CHARITABLE FUNDS. (a.)

Charity—Administration—Action by school board to enforce trust—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 17.

The managers of a national school demised the school buildings and the income of the endowment of the school for the term of sixty years to a school board. During the term the school board brought an action in the county court against the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds, alleging that the income of the endowment had been paid to and received by the defendants, and claiming inquiries and payment of the income so received.

Held, that the action was one to which section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, applied, and that it did not come within the proviso to that section; and that, therefore, it could not proceed without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) on the hearing of an appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Cardiganshire County Court.

By an indenture dated the 16th of November, 1875, the managers of the Penyfron National School demised to the plaintiff school board for the term of sixty years all their interest in the school buildings and the income of all endowments belonging to the school.

The plaintiffs alleged that the vicar of Llanbadarnfawr, who was under the indenture of the 16th of November, 1875, trustee for them of the endowments, had refused to pay them the income of the endowments, and had transferred the endowments to the defendants, the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds.

The plaintiffs claimed inquiries as to what the endowments consisted of, and as to how much of the income thereof had been received by the defendants, and payment of what had been so received.

At the hearing before the county court judge the defendants took the objection that no order or certificate of the Charity Commissioners had been obtained as required by section 17 of the Administration of Charitable Trusts Act, 1853. That section enacts that before any proceedings shall be taken for obtaining any relief relating to any charity, notice of the proposed proceedings shall be given to the Charity Commissioners, who may, by order or certificate, authorize the proceedings to be taken, and give such directions as they may deem proper; and no proceedings for obtaining any such relief shall be entertained by any court except upon such order or certificate; "provided, always, that this enactment shall not extend to or affect any such petition or proceeding in which any person shall claim any property or seek any relief adversely to any charity."

The county court judge upheld the objection, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the county court judge.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bryn Roberts, for the plaintiffs.—This is a proceeding in which the plaintiffs are seeking relief adversely to the charity. The proviso to section 17 therefore applies, and the certificate of the Charity Commissioners is not necessary.

He cited Holme v. Guy. 25 W. R. 390, 547, 5 Ch. D. 901; Rendall v. Blair, 38 W. R. 689, 45 Ch. D. 139; Benthall v. Earl of Kilmorey, 32 W. R 26, 69, 25 Ch. D. 39; and Rooke v. Dawson, 43 W. R. 313, [1895] 1 Ch. 480.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants, was not called upon to argue.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The point in this case is a small one—viz., whether this county court action was a proceeding in which relief was sought by the plaintiffs adversely to any charity. If it was not, then clearly the judgment of the county court judge and of the Queen's Bench Division was right. The action was brought by a school board against the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds, and in my opinion it was an action by cestuis que trustent claiming to ascertain what the trust funds consisted of, and to obtain payment of the income of those trust funds which was in the hands of the defendants. I think that the plaintiffs are, under the Elementary Education Acts, in the position of cestuis que trustent, and that this is not a claim made adversely to a charitable trust by an outsider, but is a claim by cestuis que trustent seeking to enforce a trust which exists in their favour. I therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS and ROMER, L.JJ., concurred.

The plaintiff in an action of trover claimed a sum exceeding £50. He recovered a sum less than £10.

Held, that the action was one "which could have been commenced in a county court" within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to costs.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

The action was brought against the defendant Mulliner, and the defendants the Motor Carriage Supply Co. (Limited), to recover damages for conversion of a motor car.

The statement of claim alleged that in February, 1900, the motor car was stored for safe custody with the defendant Mulliner; that in May, 1900, Mulliner refused to deliver up the car, and wrongfully parted with it to the Motor Carriage Co.; and that the Motor Carriage Co. illegally retained possession and refused to deliver it up to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff claimed as against the defendants jointly and severally the return of the car or £500, its value, and damages for its conversion.

The plaintiff applied for an interim injunction against the Motor Carriage Co. to restrain them from parting with the possession of the car, when a judge at chambers, as the car had been sold, ordered the price (£440) to be paid into court.

The company in their defence admitted liability to the plaintiff for £340, and were willing to consent to an order for the payment out of court of this sum to him, and as to the balance of £100 set up a claim as against the plaintiff.

The plaintiff took the £340 out of court, and the action as against the company proceeded.

Mulliner in his defence with a denial of liability paid 40s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim against him.

The plaintiff took out the 40s. in satisfaction of his claim against Mulliner.

Upon the plaintiff bringing in his bill of costs as against Mulliner for taxation, the master held that he could not allow any costs, as the plaintiff had recovered less than £10.

The plaintiff applied to the judge for an order directing the master to tax the costs upon the High Court scale upon the ground that the action could not have been commenced in the county court, or for a certificate that the action was fit to have been brought in the High Court.

Day, J., refused the application.

The plaintiff appealed.

Wheeler, Q.C., and J. Todd, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to his costs as against Mulliner. The action could not have been commenced in a county court within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Goldhill v. Clarke, 68 L. T. Rep. 414, 41 W. R. Dig. 173, is an authority that, as the plaintiff sued for more than £50, the action was one which could not have been commenced in a county court. Lovejoy v. Cole, 43 W. R. 48, [1894] 2 Q. B. 861, is in no way contrary to that decision. [They also referred to Chatfield v. Sedgwick, 27 W. R. 790, 4 C. P. D. 459; Millington v. Harwood, 40 W. R. 481, [1892] 2 Q. B. 166.] If the plaintiff is wrong upon this point, the learned judge ought to have given a certificate for costs under section 116, as there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the High Court. [They also argued that the tort was a joint tort, and that in the action the plaintiff had already recovered more than £340 against the joint tortfeasors; but the arguments on this point are omitted, as the court came to the conclusion that the action was for a separate tort against each of the defendants.]

E. Grimwood Mears, for the defendant Mulliner.—The amount recovered is the test whether an action can be commenced in a county court, and not the amount which the plaintiff may choose to indorse upon his writ. The plaintiff here only recovered 40s. against Mulliner, and is not entitled to costs.

Wheeler, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers refusing to allow the plaintiff costs as against the defendant Mulliner. The facts were these: the plaintiff brought an action of trover against two defendants. Mulliner and the Motor Carriage Supply Co. The plaintiff in his statement of claim alleged two separate and distinct conversions, one by Mulliner and the other by the company. Having alleged those two separate tortious acts he then no doubt went on to claim against them jointly and severally the return of the motor or £500, its value, and damages for its conversion. To that statement of claim the defendant Mulliner, in his statement of defence, with a denial of liability, paid 40s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim against him. The plaintiff took the 40s. out of court in satisfaction of his cause of action against Mulliner, and the action against him came to an end. The defendant company had paid into court, under an order of the judge, upon another application, the sum of £440, the price for which they had sold the car, and in their statement of defence they admitted their liability for £340, setting up as to the £100 balance a claim as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff took the £340 out of court, and the action as against the company proceeded. The plaintiff then brought in his bill of costs against Mulliner for taxation, when the master held that, as the plaintiff had recovered less than £10 against Mulliner, he was not entitled to any costs, under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The plaintiff applied to Day, J., at chambers for an order to the master to tax the costs upon the High Court scale, or for a certificate that the action was fit to be brought in the High Court. Day, J., refused the application.

The first question to consider is as to the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. For that purpose I will refer to the case of Chatfield v. Sedgwick, which was a decision upon section 67 of the Judicature Act, 1873, a section which provided that "the provisions contained in the 5th, 7th, 8th, and 10th sections of the County Courts Act, 1867, shall apply to all actions commenced or pending in the said High Court of Justice, in which any relief is sought which can be given in a county court." In that case this court put a construction upon those words. Sir George Jessel said: "In my opinion this means when relief is sought of a kind which can be given by a county court, and does not mean where relief is sought only of such an amount as could be given by a county court." Brett, L.J., said: "I am of opinion that the amount for which the writ was endorsed has nothing to do with the question." Cotton, L.J., agreed. Therefore, this court in 1879 placed a construction upon a section that was in operation at the time of the passing of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. That was a decision that the character of the action must be looked at to see if it is capable of being brought in a county court. Then came the County Courts Act, 1888. It is a consolidating Act, but for some unknown reason the Legislature thought fit to alter the phraseology of the former section. Section 116 is in pari materiâ with section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, but its phraseology is different, the words being "which could have been commenced in a county court." I read those words as meaning properly commenced, both as to the character of the action and the amount, in a county court. When is an action, as regards amount, ascertained to be within the jurisdiction of the county court? Not when the action is commenced, but when the action has been tried and the amount recoverable has been ascertained. The amount which the plaintiff chooses to claim by his writ is not the material element. The plaintiff here has recovered forty shillings from one of the defendants as sufficient to satisfy his claim against that defendant. That was a claim which could properly have been brought in the county court. The action therefore as against the defendant Mulliner comes within section 116 of the Act of 1888. The learned judge was therefore right. Nor do I see any reason for interfering with his discretion in refusing a certificate under the section. With regard to the cases, there seems to be some confusion among them. I have already pointed out the applicability of the decision in Chatfield v. Sedgwick. If I have to choose between the decisions in the Queen's Bench, I prefer the decision of the Divisional Court in Lovejoy v. Cole to the decision of Charles, J., in Goldhill v. Clarke. In my opinion the amount which the plaintiff claims has nothing to do with the question; the amount recovered is the material amount. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have had considerable difficulty in arriving at the result of the decisions on the subject. I should have thought that the rule in the matter would have been well settled, and it is curious that it should have remained indeterminate until now. Speaking for myself, I am unable to reconcile the decision of Charles, J., in Goldhill v. Clarke with the decision of the Divisional Court in Lovejoy v. Cole. Charles, J., seems to me to have held that the test whether an action could have been commenced in a county court is, what is the amount indorsed on the writ. Lovejoy v. Cole seems to me to be against that view, and it appears to me to involve, or at any rate to assume, that the test is, what is the amount recovered in the action. We have to choose between those two cases. When we look at the well-settled policy of the Legislature up to 1888, we see that it was that a plaintiff who recovered something less than a specified sum in an action of a class which could be tried in a county court should not recover High Court costs. That was declared in a most authoritative way in Chatfield v. Sedgwick. No doubt the words in section 67 of the Judicature Act, 1873, are not quite the same as the words in section 116 of the Act of 1888. Sir George Jessel, in answer to the same argument as was adduced to us to-day, said: "In my opinion this means where relief is sought of a kind which can be given by a county court, and does not mean where relief is sought only of such an amount as could be given by a county court." Is there any reason why the Legislature should have intended, in the later Act, to alter the law as there laid down? I do not see any such reason. In that attitude I approach section 116. A very slight modification of the words will suffice. The words would read "action which could properly have been commenced in a county court," describing the class of action and not the amount claimed. That brings this case within section 116. A question might have arisen of some complication. The plaintiff has not sued for a joint tort, as to which different considerations would have applied. The plaintiff has elected to base his claim against each of the defendants upon a distinct and independent tort. One of the defendants has paid into court a sum of 40s. as sufficient to satisfy the claim against him, and the plaintiff has taken that sum out in satisfaction of that cause of action. He has therefore recovered in that action 40s. as against that defendant, and he is not entitled to costs. Nor do I see any reason for interfering with the discretion of the learned judge in refusing a certificate.

Appeal dismissed.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Dec. 5, 6, 12, 13.

JACOBS v. MORRIS & MORRIS. (a.)

Principal and agent—Authority—Power of attorney—Construction — General power to borrow — Money applied by agent for his own purposes—Acceptance of bills "per pro"—Action for money had and received — Application of equitable principles — Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 25.

A power of attorney which authorizes the agent in England of an Australian firm to purchase goods in connection with the business carried on by the principal, and either for cash or on credit, and, "where necessary, in connection with any purchases made on my behalf as aforesaid or in connection with my said business to make, draw, sign, accept, or indorse any bill or bills of exchange . . . and to sign my name, or my said trading name, to any cheques or orders for the payment of money on my banking account in London, England," does not confer a general borrowing power on the agent.

Money borrowed by such agent under the power from a lender who is fixed with notice of the contents of the power of attorney, and secured by bills of exchange accepted by him in the name of his principal and paid into the London banking account of the firm, and then drawn out by the agent and applied for his own purposes, cannot be recovered in an action for money had and received to the use of the lender in the absence of proof by the lender that the principal knew, or had the means of knowledge, that the money, whilst it remained on the banking account, was the money of the lender, and not of the agent, or else that the principal had the benefit of it.

Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, and Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. C. 198, discussed and applied.

In this action the plaintiff, Louis Jacobs, was the sole representative of a business firm in Australia trading under the name of Jacobs, Hart, & Co., which had had an agency in London since 1882.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

For two months in 1888 the plaintiff was the London agent, as his father had been before him.

In 1882 he became a partner in the firm, and in 1898 he became the sole owner of the business.

In 1893 or 1894 his brother Leslie Jacobs became the London agent, and on the 30th of January, 1899, the plaintiff executed a power of attorney appointing Leslie Jacobs attorney "in and throughout the United States and the Continents of America and Europe, and all other parts of the world other than Australasia and New Zealand, for me and in my name or in my said trading name to purchase and to make and enter into, sign, and execute any contract or agreement with any persons, firm, company, or companies for the purchase of any goods or merchandize in connection with the business carried on by me as aforesaid, or for the purchase or acquisition by me of any patent right or of the right to the exclusive or partial use of any patent or invention or for the purchase or acquisition of the right to act as the sole or partial agent of any person, firm, or company, and to make such purchase or acquisition either for cash or on credit or partly for cash and partly on credit as my said attorney shall in his discretion think advisable"; then there was a power to modify or vary the terms and conditions of such contracts or wholly cancel the same on such terms as he might deem advisable; then it went on, "And for me and on my behalf, and where necessary in connection with any purchases made on my behalf as aforesaid or in connection with my said business to make, draw, sign, accept, or indorse any bill or bills of exchange, promissory note or promissory notes, notes of hand, or bills of lading which shall be requisite or proper in the premises, and to sign my name or my said trading name to any cheques or orders for the payment of money on my banking account in London, England."

This banking account had been continuously since 1882 kept in the name of the firm, but since 1893 had been exclusively operated upon by Leslie Jacobs, and it appeared that he had used it partly for the plaintiff's purposes and partly for his own.

Messrs. Morris, the defendants, were a firm of cigar importers who had dealt with the plaintiff's firm since 1889.

In June, 1899, Leslie Jacobs, purporting to act on behalf of the firm, applied to Messrs. Morris for a loan of £4,000, which they agreed to grant on condition that a large order was placed with them.

Accordingly, on the 12th of June they handed to Leslie Jacobs two cheques for £2,000 each drawn to the order of Jacobs, Hart, & Co., and received from him four bills of exchange to that amount, accepted "Jacobs, Hart, & Co., per pro Leslie R. Jacobs." These cheques were paid into the plaintiff's firm's banking account in London. On the same day Leslie Jacobs, purporting to act as aforesaid, purchased from Messrs. Morris cigars to £1,070, in payment of which he gave two bills for £1,000 and £70 accepted in the same way. The whole of the £4,000 was drawn out by Leslie Jacobs, and used by him for his own purposes.

In July, 1899, Messrs. Morris repurchased the cigars, and gave their bills in payment.

The plaintiff commenced this action in November, 1899, seeking to restrain the defendants from negotiating these bills, on the ground of fraudulent conspiracy between Messrs. Morris and Leslie Jacobs, who was also made a defendant to the action.

Messrs. Morris counterclaimed against the plaintiff and Leslie Jacobs for payment of the sums due on all the bills, or, alternatively, for the £4,000 as money had and received by the plaintiff to their use, and also for the £1,070 for the price of goods sold and delivered to the plaintiff.

Upon the counterclaim of Messrs. Morris the argument was as follows:

Lawson Walton, Q.C., Butcher, Q.C., and A. L. Morris, for Messrs. Morris.—Louis Jacobs is liable on two grounds: (1) By reason of a power to borrow given to Leslie Jacobs by the power of attorney in the words "in connection with any such purchases as aforesaid or in connection with my said business"; under the first branch of this clause he is clearly liable for the two bills for £1,000 and £70 given in payment for the cigars; the second branch implies a power to borrow, else there is nothing to satisfy it, and the words would have no meaning; further, a power to buy "for cash or on credit" implies a power to borrow money under a practice which in fact Leslie Jacobs had adopted, for he had drawn bills on Louis Jacobs and discounted them with the bank, at the same time depositing the bills of lading; this was in effect a borrowing; Messrs. Morris dealt in good faith with Leslie Jacobs and are under no onus to show that the money was borrowed on behalf of Louis Jacobs (Bank of Bengal v. McLeod, 5 Moo. Ind. App. 1, 7 Moo. P. C. 35); if a power to borrow is once made out, it is not necessary for an innocent lender to show the necessity for the particular loan. [Montaignac v. Shitta, 15 App. Cas. 357; Bryant v. La Banque du Peuple, 41 W. R. 600, [1893] A. C. 170, was also referred to.] (2) Louis Jacobs is also liable, because the £4,000 went straight into his banking account and so passed into his possession and under his control; this account, having been started by his predecessors in 1882, was continued by him, and in the power of attorney is in fact described as "my banking account"; although Leslie Jacobs used it for his own purposes, his only power to draw on it was derived from the power of attorney given by Louis Jacobs; the control of Louis Jacobs over the account is shown by the fact that he did draw from it himself at a later date, and he could have drawn out the whole £4,000 had he come to London and desired to do so any day after the 12th of June; money thus paid into a man's banking account is "money had and received to the use" of the person paying it in: Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. C. 198, at p. 219; Reid v. Rigby, [1894] 2 Q. B. 40. We ask for an account, and, if the plaintiff is held not to be liable, for judgment against Leslie Jacobs on the implied warranty of authority for £4,000.

Ellis Griffiths, for Leslie Jacobs, submitted to such judgment.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Upjohn, Q.C., and Johnston Edwards, for Louis Jacobs, admitted liability on the two bills for £1,000 and £70. As to the loan of £4,000, Messrs. Morris had notice of the limitation of the power expressly because they saw it, although they did not read it, and impliedly under section 25 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The power of attorney contains no power to borrow, express or implied, and a document of this nature must be construed strictly: Bryant v. La Banque du Peuple; Attwood v. Munnings, 7 B. & C. 278. As to the banking account, it was Leslie Jacobs' account, the only person who can draw upon such an account being he whose signature is deposited with the bank; and at any rate Messrs. Morris must show further that Louis Jacobs knew that the money was there, which he neither did nor could know; only statements showing shipments and not pass-books were sent to him; the onus is on Messrs. Morris to show that Louis Jacobs had the money. On the balance of the account there is money due from Leslie Jacobs to Louis Jacobs; therefore no account ought to be directed, this being a case to which the rule laid down in Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, does not apply.

[FARWELL, J., referred to Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, to show that equitable principles may be applied in this action "for money paid and received."]

FARWELL, J.—This is a case of some little difficulty. So far as regards the issue of fraudulent misrepresentation it is entirely unfounded, and so far as that issue is raised, the action will be dismissed with costs. So far as regards the bills for £1,000 and £70 given for the tobacco which was bought, those, subject to the various arithmetical calculations which have to be entered into for finding the exact balance, are not contested by the plaintiff. They were given under the power of attorney and there must be judgment for the amount.

Then there comes the question about the £4,000. [His lordship then stated the facts of the case, and continued as follows:] The transaction was of this nature: Leslie Jacobs had a meeting with Messrs. Morris; he told them that his firm was going to make cigarettes, and he wanted cash for machinery for this purpose and for buying leaf tobacco; he asked them to lend him the money to enable him to do that. They were willing to lend him the money because they had had dealings with the firm, because Leslie represented to them that they would get the benefit of the efforts of the Melbourne firm to push certain brands of cigars, of which they were the owners, in the colonies. I desire to say that as regards Messrs. Morris I think they are entirely free from any imputation of dishonesty, and that they acted quite honestly and openly, and believed what Leslie told them. They had known him for some years and they believed this was the true story. Then Leslie Jacobs gets the money and pays it into the banking account of Jacobs, Hart, & Co. That banking account was an old account which had been open for years, since 1882; and it was operated upon by cheques drawn by Leslie Jacobs under the power of attorney. It stood in the name of the firm, but Leslie Jacobs used it for his own purposes as well. The only accounts rendered to the plaintiff did not show all the dealings on that account but only such dealings as were properly attributable to the business of Jacobs, Hart, & Co. Now, in the power of attorney there is not a word from the beginning to the end of borrowing money. To begin with, it seems to me that it would be most improbable that a principal should give his attorney power to borrow money if he did not expressly state it. It is laid down in one of the cases cited to me that you do not construe general terms in such a way as to give a power of borrowing if it is not expressly stated; the general words are confined to matters ejusdem generis with the specific matters already stated. The specific matters stated there are simply purchases. Now stress was laid by the defendants' counsel on the words "or in connection with my said business," and it is said, with some force, that that points to something other than the purchases which have just been mentioned, which are the only matters specifically mentioned in the body of the power. In my opinion those words are not enough to give a general power of borrowing. I think they are satisfied by attributing them to such transactions as may be necessary to give effect to the modification or variation of the terms of the contract or the cancellation of the same, and I point to them in this very case as an illustration of it because the contract for the sale of cigars, which I have already decided in favour of Messrs. Morris, was varied by a selling back and giving bills of exchange to carry that out. That is, to my mind, within the power; it is not in connection with a purchase, but it is in connection with selling. It is a re-selling which is a part of the powers given to the attorney by way of cancelling the contract of purchase on terms, and practically that is within the terms of the power. It was not contested that that must be within the terms and that there are other matters of that kind which would be sufficient to give effect to those particular words "or in connection with my said business" without giving them the extraordinarily wide signification which the defendants desire now to attribute to them of a general borrowing power.

I do not think I need refer to the cases beyond perhaps the case of Bryant v. La Banque du Peuple, where Lord Macnaghten, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, says at p. 177: "Nor was it disputed that powers of attorney are to be construed strictly—that is to say, that where an act purporting to be done under a power of attorney is challenged as being in excess of the authority conferred by the power, it is necessary to show that on a fair construction of the whole instrument the authority in question is to be found within the four corners of the instrument, either in the express terms or by necessary implication." That accords really with the case of Attwood v. Munnings, and also with the other case in which Lord Blackburn pointed out that a power of borrowing was not to be inferred from general words which were to be restricted to matters ejusdem generis with those already stated. In Montaignac v. Shitta the point was a different one, because there was there admittedly authority to borrow, and the question was as to the extent and private quality of that particular power of borrowing. It was argued here that the power of attorney admittedly authorized some borrowing. I do not think that is the true view; the borrowings were described in Louis Jacobs' evidence where the mode of paying for goods bought was detailed by him. "If Leslie," that is, the attorney, "bought for use, the practice was to take the shipping documents to our Australian bank and get the cash from them under a letter of credit with which we furnished him and hypothecate the bills of lading." Now, that is not to my mind borrowing at all within the ordinary sense of the borrowing powers which it is desired to set up under this power of attorney. It was really a special mode of carrying out the power given to the attorney of buying goods and paying for them. It is one thing to give bills, and in that sense, if it be a borrowing, give the bills of lading in addition as security, assuming that is a borrowing. It is one thing to do that in exchange for, or in payment of, goods; it is quite another thing to do it in order to raise money generally for general purposes. A man may well intrust his attorney with power to give a bill of exchange for the specific goods that he purchases; it is quite another thing to say that he gives him a general power to borrow money on his mere statement that he is going to buy goods or is going to apply it in a particular fashion.

I hold, therefore, on construction, that there is no power to borrow under this power of attorney which would authorize the borrowing of the £4,000. That being so, so far as the counterclaim claims judgment on the bills of exchange, it fails.

Then it is said, "But the £4,000 was paid into the banking account of Jacobs, Hart, & Co., and therefore was received by the plaintiff, the sole owner of that title," and if the money had, in fact, ever come into his possession or was there still, that no doubt would be so. It is claimed under the head of "money had and received." That is a very ancient form of common law action and it is explained by Lord Mansfield in Moses v. Macpherlan, 2 Burr., at p 1010. He points out that one of the distinc ions between it and an action for debt is that the debt implies contract, whereas this does not. "This brings the whole to the question saved at nisi prius, viz., 'whether the plaintiff may elect to sue by this form of action, for the money only, or must be turned round to bring an action upon the agreement.' One great benefit which arises to suitors from the nature of this action"—that is, for money had and received—"is that the plaintiff need not state the special circumstances from which he concludes 'that, ex æquo et bono, the money received by the defendant ought to be deemed as belonging to him.' He may declare generally 'that the money was received to his use'; and make out his case at the trial. This is equally beneficial to the defendant. It is the most favourable way in which he can be sued. He can be liable no further than the money he has received, and against that may go into any equitable defence upon the general issue. He may claim every equitable allowance; he may prove a release without pleading it; in short, he may defend himself by everything which shows that the plaintiff, ex æquo et bono, is not entitled to the whole of his demand, or to any part of it." I have, therefore, got a case in which the money is paid into the plaintiff's account. If it stopped there, I should have this difficulty to contend with—that the evidence has been left in a somewhat uncertain condition as to whether the plaintiff could draw on that account or not. Mr. Upjohn has contended that it is not sufficient to show merely that the money was paid into the account of the plaintiff, but that it is necessary to go further and show that he could draw on that account. That seems to me to be a question, so far as that point is concerned, of the onus of proof. I find an account opened in the name of Jacobs, Hart, & Co. nearly twenty years ago; the account is in that name throughout, drawn upon under the power of attorney to draw cheques upon any London bank that the donor of the power may have, and an operating upon it under that power by Leslie Jacobs. If it were necessary for me to determine it, I should hold that the onus would be upon Louis Jacobs to show that he had not the power to draw, because primâ facie under those circumstances the man who owns the name in which the account is standing and has been standing for years has authority to draw upon it. But that is not the whole case. The point which I have to determine really goes a step further, and I take the facts necessary for me to find as questions of fact on which the point of law arises from the judgment of the court in Marsh v. Keating. "It is objected, thirdly, that the proceeds of the sale of the stock never came into the hands of the defendants so as to be money received by them to the use of the plaintiff." I should mention that in that case there was a firm of bankers, Marsh & Co., of which Fauntleroy was a member. Fauntleroy had forged the name of the plaintiff to a power of attorney, under which he realized a sum of £9,000 stock, and paid the proceeds of that sale into the account of Marsh & Co. with another banking firm of Martin & Co. The pass-book of Martin & Co. passed backwards and forwards between the house of Martin & Co. and the house of Marsh & Co. Fauntleroy took the precaution of getting hold of it and keeping it locked up, so that in fact his copartners never saw it and never discovered the particular transaction. There was no entry of this dealing in the house-book, as it was called, of Marsh & Co. The partners in that case did not in fact know, but they certainly had the means of knowing, if they had not somewhat blindly trusted Fauntleroy. The questions under those circumstances which the judges submit for the consideration of the court are: "First, did the money actually come into the possession of the defendants? Secondly, if it ever was in their possession, had the defendants the means of knowledge, whilst it remained in their hands, that it was the money of the plaintiff and not the money of Fauntleroy?" Now, the first question, I have already said, I shall have to answer in this case in the affirmative. I think the money did actually come into possession of Louis Jacobs, because I consider it went into his banking account on which he could have operated. I think if he had telegraphed or written a letter which reached the bankers the day after the £4,000 had been paid in, and before it was paid out again, he certainly could have effectually stopped it being paid out. In that case he certainly would now have the money in his hands, money belonging to Messrs. Morris, and I cannot see that he would have any defence to the action if the money were in fact in his hands. In that case it would have actually come into his possession, and it would be in his hands.

But then there comes the second question which the court considered it was necessary to answer in the plaintiff's favour before they could succeed: "Secondly, if it ever was in their possession, had the defendants the means of knowledge, whilst it remained in their hands, that it was the money of the plaintiff and not the money of Fauntleroy." Now I apprehend that this is really the application of those equitable principles which Lord Mansfield referred to in an action "for money had and received." It was not enough to show that the money merely went into the account of Louis Jacobs unless you also show that he also had the means of knowing it, or that he did know it. Now, in the present case the defendant, Messrs. Morris, necessarily from my construction of the power of attorney, knew that Leslie Jacobs had no power to borrow under the power of attorney. I do not say they actually knew it, because I accept their evidence that although the power was actually produced to Arthur Morris he did not in fact read it, but, unfortunately for him, relied on the assurance of Leslie Jacobs that he had the power of borrowing under it; but that Mr. Lawson Walton admitted he could not rely upon. Messrs. Morris are fixed with notice of the true contents of the power of attorney, and therefore they knew for this purpose that Leslie Jacobs had no power to borrow money. They therefore lend money not to him, but to Jacobs, Hart, & Co., knowing that Leslie had no power to borrow for Jacobs, Hart, & Co. It is not, therefore, sufficient for them to prove that they paid the money into Jacobs, Hart, & Co.'s account, on which they knew, or must have known, that Leslie Jacobs had the power to draw. I do not know whether that really was proved or not, nor do I think it material. It is not enough when they also knew that Louis Jacobs had not authorized that payment in by them by way of loan to him. They have to go further and show that he knew of it, either that he had the benefit of it, or that he knew of it and adopted it. He certainly never got the benefit of it. The account has been put in, and it is quite plain he never got the benefit of it, and he certainly never knew of it. His evidence on that is plain. He never knew this was borrowed, nor did he know of any borrowing at all (I find that as a fact) by Leslie Jacobs, or of any misdealing with the power of attorney except that which is stated in his re-examination. He says he had no knowledge of the transaction in June, 1899. He first heard of the transaction after he revoked the power of attorney. He knew in 1896 that Leslie had misused his name and the power of attorney for the benefit of Jay Brothers, who were brothers of Leslie and of Louis Jacobs This was the only instance of misuse that he knew of. Then he says he never knew of any borrowing at all in his name under the power of attorney. That being so, I find an equity against Messrs. Morris, because they chose to lend to a man who had not authorized anybody to borrow for him. True, it went into his account, but he did not want it and never asked for it, and no doubt his agent had no authority to do that. On the other hand, I find no equity affecting Louis Jacobs to prevent him saying "I did not want any money borrowed; it was never paid for my benefit; I never got the smallest part of it, and so far as I am concerned it has nothing to do with me from beginning to end." In my opinion that is the meaning of the second point put in Marsh v. Keating, and on that issue I find in favour of Louis Jacobs. I think the case before Charles, J., and Collins, L.J., entirely bear this out, and, so far as I am aware, there is no authority to the contrary. The result is that, as regards the action, therefore, on the bills for £4,000, and the alternative claim "for money had and received," the claim fails.

INMAN v. ACKROYD & BEST (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Directors' remuneration—Yearly payment—Apportionment—Apportionment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 35).

By the articles of association of a joint-stock company it was provided, inter alia, that "the directors shall be paid out of the funds of the company by way of remuneration for their services, and exclusive of their travelling expenses, the sum of £125 per annum per director, and such further sums as shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting, and the same shall be divided among them in such proportions and manner as the directors by agreement may determine, and in default of such determination, equally."

Held, that, according to the true construction of such article of association no director is entitled to remuneration except for service for a whole year, and therefore any director who retires before the end of the year cannot claim a proportionate remuneration.

Salton v. New Beeston Cycle Co., 47 W. R. 462, [1899] 1 Ch. 775, approved.

Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., 1 Megone C. C. 385, distinguished.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Bruce, J., at the trial without a jury (82 L. T. Rep. 621).

The action was brought by James Inman against the defendant company, who carry on business at Hombrigg Works, Morley, Yorkshire, to recover remuneration for services rendered by him as a director of the defendant company.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff claimed, firstly, the sum of £125, being one year's remuneration from the 1st of November, 1897, to the 1st of November, 1898.

This part of the claim the defendants admitted and paid into court, together with certain expenses incurred by the plaintiff.

Further, he claimed the sum of £72 18s. 4d. as being remuneration from the 1st of November, 1898, to the 30th of May, 1899, the date when he resigned his office as director.

As regards this part of the claim the defendants contended that under the articles of association the plaintiff was not entitled to claim remuneration for a period of less than a year's service.

Bruce, J., having taken time to consider his judgment, held that the plaintiff could not recover in respect of his services as director for any period less than a completed year.

By the articles of association of the company it is provided as follows:

81. "The directors shall be paid out of the funds of the company by way of remuneration for their services, and exclusive of their travelling expenses, the sum of £125 per annum per director, and such further sums as shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting, and the same shall be divided among them in such proportion and manner as the directors by agreement may determine, and in default of such determination, equally. The said sum of £125 per annum may be increased, but not diminished, by the company in general meeting."

82. "The office of director shall be vacated . . . (d) If by notice in writing to the company he resigns his office."

89. "The company may by extraordinary resolution remove any director before the expiration of his period of office, and may by ordinary resolution appoint another qualified person in his stead. The person so appointed shall hold office during such time only as the director in whose place he is appointed would have held the same if he had not been removed."

E. Bray, for the appellant.—It was contended on behalf of the defendants in the court below that article 81 should be construed as meaning that a director is only entitled to remuneration for services for a complete year. That is a possible construction, but it is an unreasonable one. It would involve this, that a director who has served 364 days out of a year, and is then by extraordinary resolution removed under article 89, would have no claim to remuneration for his services during that period. The reasonable construction of article 81 is that each director is to be paid at the rate of £125 per annum, just as in speaking of interest at 5 per cent. per annum it is understood to be at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. The case of Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., 1 Megone C.C. 385, is an authority in support of this proposition. The article of association in dispute in that case is erroneously reported as stating that the directors were to be remunerated "at the rate of £200 per annum." The articles of association in that case have been examined, and it appears that the article in question provides that the directors should "each receive out of the funds of the company the sum of £200 per annum," and does not contain the words "at the rate of." This case shows that where there is a reciprocal right—as in the present case—to determine the services of a director before the whole year is completed there is an implication that he shall be paid a proportionate part of his salary. There is no stipulation here that a director is not to be paid any salary unless he completes the year's service, and therefore his salary must be considered as accruing from day to day by virtue of section 1 of the Apportionment Act, 1870. Under that Act "annuities" includes "salaries."

Counsel also cited Ellis v. Rowbotham, 48 W. R. 423, [1900] 1 Q. B. 740.

A. Llewelyn Davies, for the respondents, was not called on.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This an appeal from a judgment of Bruce, J., in favour of the defendant company, in an action brought against them to recover directors' fees. The plaintiff had served as a director for a year and seven months. His claim in respect of the year's service was not disputed, and the amount was paid into court. The question we have to decide is whether he is entitled to any fees in respect of his services for the seven months. This depends upon the true construction of the company's articles of association. The article in particular which we have to construe in this case differs from that which was before the court in the case of Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., as well from the version as it was assumed by the court there to be, as from what it now turns out was the actual version. In the report of that case it is assumed that by the articles there in question the remuneration to be paid to the directors was to be "at the rate of" £200 per annum. It now appears that the true version of the article was that the directors should "each receive by way of remuneration out of the funds of the company the sum of £200 per annum."

In my opinion the interpretation put by Bruce, J., in his clear and excellent judgment upon the article with which we have to deal in the present case is absolutely right. This article provides that "the directors"—that is, the whole body of the directors—"shall be paid out of the funds of the company, by way of remuneration for their services . . . the sum of £125 per annum per director . . . and the same shall be divided amongst them in such proportion as the directors by agreement may determine, and, in default of such determination, equally." Suppose, for instance, that there were four directors. At the end of the year there would be £500 to be divided amongst them in such proportions as the directors might by agreement determine, and in default of such determination equally. That is to say, the lump sum which is to be divided amongst the directors at the end of the year is to be made up of the several sums of £125 for each director who has served a whole year. On the plaintiff's behalf it is contended that the article should be read as meaning that each director shall be remunerated at the rate of £125 per annum. This is not what the article says. What it says is that the fund to be divided amongst the directors is to be made up of £125 for every director who has served a year. In my opinion the true construction of this article is that no director is entitled to remuneration except for service for a whole year. The two cases relied upon by Bruce, J.—namely, Salton v. New Beeston Cycle Co., 47 W. R. 462, [1899] 1 Ch. 775, and In re Central de Kaap Gold Mines, 69 L. J. Ch. 18, 48 W. R. Dig. 42, are to the same effect. The case of Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co., in my opinion, is distinguishable. The article there, whether we take it to have been according to the true or the assumed version of it, differs from the article we are now construing.

As regards the Apportionment Act, it appears to me that as the directors had not served for a further whole year, there was no sum of money to be apportioned.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether the case of Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mining Co. was decided upon the article in the form as is stated in the report or upon the article as it was in reality, I think that decision does not cover this case. In the present case there is no fixed sum to be paid to any director. The article in fact negatives the right of any director to claim before the end of the year any specific sum. According to the article a fund is to be formed at the end of the year consisting of the several sums of £125 for every director who has served for that year, and such fund is to be divided amongst such directors in such proportion as they shall agree to determine, and in default of such determination it is to be divided amongst them in equal shares. Ex hypothesi, this division is only to be made at the end of the year, and therefore any director who retires before the end of the year is unable to participate in the division. He is not in a position to claim any sum as due to him up to the time of his retirement. I entirely agree with what the learned judge in the court below said upon this point.

But I prefer to say nothing as to the alternative suggested by him in that passage in his judgment where he says: "That, I think, means that the aggregate sum must depend upon the number of directors who have completed a year's service, or at least upon the number of directors who are serving at the time the annual sum is paid out of the funds of the company." I pronounce no opinion as to that alternative.

ROMER, L.J.—I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

BARRY v. BARRY. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Agreement for separation—Petition for alimony pendente lite—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 35—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4.

Where an action has been brought for dissolution of a marriage, the inquiry as to alimony, on a petition for alimony pendente lite, ought to proceed in the usual way, notwithstanding that the parties have entered into a separation agreement providing for an allowance to be paid by the husband to the wife.

This was an appeal from an order of Jeune, P.

In July, 1900, the plaintiff Mrs. Barry filed a petition for the dissolution of her marriage with the defendant.

In October she filed a petition for an allowance by way of alimony pendente lite, and for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage.

There were seven infant children, of whom the plaintiff had the custody.

In an affidavit filed in answer to the petition for alimony the husband alleged that in March, 1900, an agreement for separation had been entered into between himself and his wife, by which he had agreed to pay her an allowance of £600 a year for her maintenance and the maintenance and education of her children. And he submitted that it was neither just nor equitable that she should receive any sum by way of alimony or for the maintenance and education of her children beyond what was provided by the agreement.

By his subsequent answer to the divorce petition he submitted that the wife was estopped by the separation agreement from seeking either a divorce or a separation on the grounds alleged by her.

The wife denied that she had executed the alleged agreement.

The wife had instituted an action in the Chancery Division to set aside the alleged agreement for separation, and the husband had instituted a cross-action in the same division for specific performance of the agreement.

On these facts Jeune, P., made an order staying the trial of the petition and all proceedings for alimony pending the hearing of the two Chancery actions.

On the 14th of November, 1900, that order was, by consent, discharged by the Court of Appeal, each party undertaking that the Chancery action and cross-action should be stayed until after the hearing of the divorce action or till further order.

The plaintiff then issued two summonses—one in the alimony proceedings, that the husband should give a further or better answer to the petition for alimony as to his means; the other to strike out so much of the answer to the petition for dissolution of the marriage as alleged that the separation agreement constituted a bar to the proceedings on that petition.

On the hearing of these summonses Jeune, P. ordered that (1) the question of the existence of the alleged separation agreement, and (2) the question whether by reason of that agreement (if existing) the wife was not entitled to any relief on her divorce petition should be tried before the other questions in the suit. In the meantime all other proceedings in the divorce action were stayed.

The wife appealed.

Beddall and Grazebrook, for the appellant.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Priestley, for the respondent.

RIGBY, L.J.—The plaintiff brings an appeal, with the leave of the court, against an order which directs, in substance, that two issues—one, whether there is in fact an agreement for separation, and the other, whether, if in fact there is that agreement, it would be a bar or an estoppel against proceedings for a divorce—shall be heard separately. In the first place the alimony proceedings were peremptorily stopped, because the practice of the Probate Division, as set up, is never to go out of an agreement entered into by the parties for a separation, and never to inquire, when there is such an agreement, as to the husband's means. Now, as regards that, Mr. Beddall agrees for the purposes of the alimony application, and that only, to admit that there is an agreement for a separation. But I hold that, notwithstanding any practice in the Divorce Division—a practice depending, I think, a great deal upon the circumstance that the proceedings are generally by no means of a lengthy kind in point of time—he has the opportunity and the right of urging upon this occasion any arguments that are properly to be brought forward under section 35 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, on the part of the children of the marriage. And further, inasmuch as there is that submission on the part of the husband in his answer to the alimony proceedings, I am of opinion that he ought to give the proper particulars showing what his income is to enable the court of first instance, or the Court of Appeal if it ever should be necessary, to decide what the alimony pendente lite, including an allowance for the maintenance and education of the seven children, should be. [His lordship then went on to direct the issues to be tried together.]

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree with the conclusion which has been stated by Rigby, L.J. [His lordship then stated the facts in the case, and continued:] Now, having made these preliminary observations, I have to express my opinion as to how these pending summonses should be dealt with. First of all, as to the question of alimony. Mr. Beddall has expressly stated that, for the purpose of considering that application he does not propose to dispute the existence or binding nature of the agreement; for the purposes of the application for alimony the existence of a binding agreement is to be assumed. But he says that he is entitled, under the statutory provisions which have been referred to in section 35 of the Act of 1857 and section 4 of the Act of 1859, to make an application with reference to the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage. It seems to me that in that he is well founded. In my judgment, therefore, upon that submission of Mr. Beddall the inquiry as to alimony ought to proceed in the usual way.

Appeal allowed.

NEW YORK SECURITY AND TRUST CO. v. KEYSER & CO. (a.)

Lunacy—Lunatic—Private international law—English domicil — Committee appointed by foreign court — Personal estate in England—Right to recover—Next friend—R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 17.

A lady of English domicil, confined in an asylum at New York, is adjudged by an order of the Supreme Court of New York to be of unsound mind, and committees are appointed authorized to take proceedings in England to recover and obtain payment of certain trust personal estate in this country to which she was entitled. In this action, brought by the committees and the lunatic lady suing by a "next friend" against the trustees, Held, that the court had a discretion to order the moneys claimed to be paid to the committees; and, in the circumstances of this case, the proceedings being for the benefit of the lady, an order was made recognizing the title of the co-plaintiffs to recover the property.

This was an action brought by the committees appointed by a foreign court of a lunatic lady whose domicil was English but whose residence was within the jurisdiction of the foreign court by which she had been adjudged incompetent to manage herself or her affairs, and who was now suing by a "next friend" as co-plaintiff, against trustees for the recovery of certain personal estate in England to which she was entitled; and the question was whether the courts of this country could recognize the title of the co-plaintiffs to sue in this country.

The facts as taken from his lordship's considered judgment were as follows:

Mrs. Samuels, the widow of Mr. Robert Samuels, was entitled to a sum of cash in court to the credit of this action, and to further sums of cash representing dividends in the hands of trustees of a post-nuptial settlement, and of her father-in-law's will, and she would become entitled during the remainder of her life to the future income arising from those trust funds.

She was born in America, but for the purpose of this case it was assumed that her domicil became on her marriage and still was English.

She was now a person of unsound mind; she was, after her husband's death, confined in a private lunatic asylum in Brussels till November, 1899, when she was removed by her family to an asylum in the State of New York, where she was still remaining.

By an order of the Supreme Court of the State of New York she was adjudged incompetent to manage herself or her affairs, and the plaintiff company were appointed committees of her person or property, and by a subsequent order they were authorized and directed to take proceedings in this country to recover and obtain payment of the moneys and property above referred to.

According to the law of New York the property of a lunatic does not vest in the committees, but they have a right to receive and give good discharges for it.

It was admitted that the income of the above property was more than was required for the maintenance of the lunatic in the asylum.

In these circumstances the action was brought by the committees and Mrs. Samuels, "a person of unsound mind, by A. T. Tallent, her next friend," as co-plaintiffs, against the trustees.

Danckwerts, Q.C., and Methold, for the plaintiffs.—This case is within the principle of Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank, 48 W. R. 501, [1900] 2 Ch. 15. The court has jurisdiction to make the order asked for in respect of the lunatic's personal estate: Scott v. Bentley, 3 W. R. 280, 1 K. & J. 281. The action is properly brought by the lunatic and her next friend, ord. 16, r. 17, and is for the lunatic's benefit. The domicil of the lunatic is not material to the question of jurisdiction, though it may affect the exercise of the discretion of the court: In re Princess Bariatinski, 1 Ph. 375.

They also referred to In re Houstoun, 1 Russ. 312, where a commission of lunacy was issued against a lunatic when he was in this country with one of his committees, though he was found lunatic, and his property was situated, abroad.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and G. S. Alexander, for the defendants.—The case is not covered by that of Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank. In In re Garnier, 20 W. R. 288, L. R. 13 Eq. 532, an Englishman, while resident in France, was found a lunatic by the laws of that country, and a curator bonis was appointed by the French court; upon petition by the curator bonis for payment of a fund in this country as a matter of right, the court held it could exercise a discretion, and the lunatic appearing to be sufficiently provided for, an order was made for retaining the corpus of the fund in court and the payment of the dividend only to the curator. [They also referred to Cooper v. Cooper, 13 App. Cas. 88, 36 W. R. Dig. 98; Sottomayor v. De Barros, 26 W. R. 455, 3 P. D. 1.] In any event the defendants are justified in requiring the protection of an order of the court.

COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts, continued: Now if the lady had been domiciled in New York, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank would have been a direct authority. But Lindley, L.J., says: "If, as in In re Garnier, the lunatic were an Englishman temporarily abroad and confined as a lunatic abroad, we should feel considerable difficulty in holding that the courts of this country were bound to recognize the title of a foreign curator to sue in this country." The question thus left open now arises for my decision. Now, the lady sues by a next friend as provided by ord. 16, r. 17, which refers to the old practice of the Chancery Division. There is nothing in that order or in the established practice of the Court of Chancery prior to that order which entitles the next friend—who may be anybody—to receive and give a discharge for the lady's money. It is only on the footing that the action is for the benefit of the lady, and in so far as it is for her benefit, that the court allows such an action to proceed: see Light v. Light, 25 Beav. 248; Beall v. Smith, 22 W. R. 121, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 85, Jones v. Lloyd, 22 W. R. 785, L. R. 18 Eq. 265, Porter v. Porter, 36 W. R. 580, 37 Ch. Div. 420. I cannot regard the action as for all purposes the same as it would be if Mrs. Samuels were of sound mind and suing in her own right. But the lady joins as co-plaintiffs persons who are competent to receive and give a good discharge for the money, and she asks that payment may be made, not to Mr. Tallent, her next friend, but to them. I am not satisfied that this lady, suing by her next friend, can, as a matter of strict right, insist upon such payment; but in the exercise of my discretion I can see no reason why the order should not be made in the present case. The lady is by birth an American. Her relations reside there. The New York court has jurisdiction over her by reason of her residence in that state, and wholly irrespective of any question of domicil. I am satisfied that everything that is proper and kindly is being done for her custody and her comfort. Scott v. Bentley, as explained and corrected by the Court of Appeal in Didisheim's case, seems to me to warrant the view which, apart from authority, I should be prepared to adopt. The defendants are abundantly justified in the course they have taken of requiring the protection of an order of the court. The costs as between solicitor and client, including any charges and expenses properly incurred, must be paid out of the fund in court, and the balance of that fund, together with the sums of cash now in the hands of the trustees—the precise figures will doubtless be agreed—must be paid to the plaintiff company as committees. With regard to future income, I think it will be better simply to give liberty to the respective trustees to pay to the committees until further order, and, general liberty to apply will be reserved.

In re GASELEE AND THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.).

Lands Clauses Acts — Practice — Costs — R. S. C., ord. 22, r. 17—Cost of interim investment—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 70, 80.

Where money has been paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and has been invested in securities authorized by R. S. C., ord. 22, r. 17, the whole of the costs of such investment must be paid by the promoters of the undertaking under section 80 of the said Act as though such securities had been expressly authorized by the Act.

(a.) Reported by R. LEIGH RAMSBOTHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The applicant in this case was tenant for life of certain property which had been taken by the London County Council under compulsory powers conferred by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The money payable by the council under the Act in respect of the property had been paid into court and invested by way of interim investment in certain registered railway stocks authorized by R. S. C., ord. 22, r. 17.

The cost for brokerage in making this investment was more than would have been the case had the money been invested in Government securities authorized in terms by section 70 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the point raised for the decision of the court was whether the council was liable to pay the difference between the brokerage which would have been charged had the interim investment been made in Consols and that chargeable for investments authorized by the enlarging ord. 22, r. 17.

At an early stage of the proceedings the objection was taken by the judge that the question was one which ought to come before the taxing-master in the first instance, and that inasmuch as there had not been any taxation as yet, the court was not in a position at this stage of the proceedings to decide the point. But, as both parties desired that the point should be decided at once, his lordship agreed to hear and determine the question.

Dickinson for the tenant for life.—The money paid into court under the Act of 1845 was cash under the control of the court within R. S. C., ord. 22, r. 17: Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, 31 W. R. 55, 22 Ch. D. 93, and In re Brown, 38 W. R. 529, 59 L. J. Ch. 530. The investment was therefore a proper one and ought to be treated for the purposes of section 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, as though it had been in terms authorized by that Act. Although the costs referred to in section 80 in terms only refer to the investments mentioned in the Act, yet the spirit of the Act and justice require that they should cover the case of investments authorized by an order enlarging the scope of section 70. The Act must be construed according to its spirit: In re Bethlem Hospital, 23 W. R. 644, L. R. 19 Eq. 457. The case of In re Brown does not decide the point expressly but does so by inference. The costs of interim investment must be treated as a whole and not divided or split up.

F. Thompson, for the London County Council.—We ask for a declaration that the council is not liable to pay for the costs of investment more than it would have had to pay if the investment had been in Consols. The liability of the council is limited strictly by section 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, and the reason why the tenant for life chose to invest in railway stock rather than in Consols is because the former yields more income. It is therefore only fair that the tenant for life rather than the council should bear the increased cost of investment.

BUCKLEY, J., in giving judgment, held that the investment actually made being authorized by ord. 22, r. 17, was a proper interim investment for money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, and that in accordance with In re Bethlem Hospital, the spirit of the Act required that the council, having taken a person's land against his will in exercise of the powers conferred by the Act, should pay for the whole of the costs of the brokerage in making the interim investment which had been made, notwithstanding that the securities were authorized, not by the Act of 1845, but by the enlarging ord. 22, r. 17. This view was supported by the case of In re Brown.

MOORE v. MOORE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Incidence of estate duty as between an appointed fund and residuary estate—Property passing to the executor as such—Finance Act, 1894, ss. 6 (2), 9 (1).

A fund appointed by will pursuant to a general power of appointment is property which passes to the executor as such within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, so that, apart from a direction to the contrary in the will, the estate duty payable in respect of the fund is payable out of the general residuary estate of the deceased rather than out of the appointed fund.

In re Treasure, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648, not followed.

Under her father's will a testatrix had a general power of testamentary appointment over a legacy bequeathed to her by the said will, and the question before the court was whether the estate duty payable on the death of the testatrix in respect of the fund which was the subject of the power, was payable out of the fund or out of the testatrix's general residuary estate.

The testatrix's father, Charles Moore, died on the 15th of August, 1869, and the testatrix died unmarried on the 26th of August, 1899, having by her will appointed the fund to persons other than her legal personal representatives or her residuary legatee. There was no direction in the will as to payment of duty.

Stokes, for the residuary legatee.—The fund was property of which the deceased was competent to dispose, but it was not property which passed to the executor as such within the meaning of the Act: In re Treasure, Wild v. Stanham, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648. Strictly speaking, only legal assets pass to the executor as such. The appointed fund here was not legal assets, but equitable assets. The donee of the power appointed the fund over the heads, so to speak, of the executors. It is true that the executors could get at the fund for payment of debts of the deceased, but that is not material in this case.

Counsel also referred to Cook v. Gregson, 4 W. R. 581, 3 Drew. 547; In re Philbrick's Settlement, 13 W. R. 570, 34 L. J. Ch. 368; and In re Hoskin's Trusts, 25 W. R. 779, 6 Ch. D. 281.

Hon. Frank Russell, for the appointees of the fund.—The decision on this point in In re Treasure was not necessary for the proper disposal of that case. Further, it is inconsistent with In re Philbrick's Settlement and In re Hoskin's Trusts. The court is not bound by In re Treasure.

Dawnay, for the executors of the will.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question here is whether the sum of £740 estate duty payable in respect of the fund over which the deceased testatrix had a general power of appointment ought to be borne by the appointed fund or by the testatrix's general residuary estate. The answer to this question depends upon sub-section 1 of section 9 of the Finance Act, 1894, which in turn raises the question whether the appointed fund passed to the executor as such.

Now, the substance of the case of In re Philbrick's Settlement is that as between the trustees of a deed and the executors of a will the latter take the place of the former for the purpose of distribution. But it does not say in what character the executors take as against creditors and the like.

The case of In re Hoskin's Trusts says that the executor gets such a fund virtute officii. When he gets the fund, his duty is to discharge the debts and then to hand over what is left to the appointee. The appointed fund comes to the executor because he has proved the will. He only becomes trustee when he has paid the debts of the deceased.

As to the case of In re Treasure, the decision on this point was not necessary for the proper disposal of that case, because there the will of the deceased directed testamentary expenses to be paid out of residue. In the present case there was no such direction. Moreover, the decision is inconsistent with In re Hoskin's Trusts and In re Philbrick's Settlement. I am therefore entitled to disregard In re Treasure, and I hold that the appointed fund passed to the executor as such, and that consequently the estate duty payable in respect of the appointed fund must be paid out of the general residuary estate.

County court—Prohibition—Jurisdiction—Commitment—Judgment against firm in High Court of Justice—Judgment summons against alleged partner in county court—County Court Rules, ord. 25, rr. 14b, 17—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5.

The affidavit which the plaintiff is required to file under ord. 25, r. 14b, of the County Court Rules must set out the sources of information and grounds of belief on which the plaintiff alleges the defendant is a partner in the firm against which he has recovered judgment, or there is no jurisdiction in the county court judge to try the case.

Where a plaintiff has recovered judgment against a firm in the High Court, he can enforce such judgment against a partner by a judgment summons in the county court, and on the trial of such judgment summons the county court judge, if satisfied that the defendant is a partner in the firm, and that he has had means since the date of the judgment against the firm, may forthwith commit the defendant to prison.

Motion by the defendant for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the Croydon County Court to prohibit him from further proceeding upon an order of commitment made by the said judge on the 23rd of March, 1900, ordering the above-named defendant to be committed to prison for forty-two days.

On the 28th of November, 1899, the plaintiff issued a writ in the High Court of Justice against the firm of Osborne & Co. for £41 2s. 6d. (price of goods supplied), and served the writ on the defendant as manager of the said firm.

On the 21st of December, 1899, the plaintiff recovered judgment by default.

On the 5th of March, 1900, the plaintiff took out a judgment summons under ord. 25, r. 14*b*, of the County Court Rules in the Croydon County Court against the defendant as a partner in the firm of Osborne & Co. The summons was returnable on the 23rd of March, 1900, and on that day the summons was heard. Two witnesses were then called by the plaintiff, but the defendant did not appear. The judge held that the defendant was a partner in the firm, and that he had had means to pay, and made an order of which the following are the material parts:

"Whereas the plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant in the High Court of Justice on the 21st of December, 1899, for the sum of £41 2s. 6d., and there is now due and payable upon the said judgment the sum of £41 2s. 6d.

"And whereas a summons was at the instance of the plaintiff duly issued out of this court by which the defendant was required to appear personally at this court on the 23rd day of March, 1900, to be examined on oath touching the means he had then or had had since the date of judgment to satisfy the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment, and to show cause why he should not be committed to prison for such default, which summons has been proved to this court to have been personally and duly served on the defendant.

"And, whereas, at the hearing of the said summons it has now been proved to the satisfaction of this court that the defendant has had since the date of the judgment the means to pay the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment and had refused or neglected to pay the same, and the defendant had shown no cause why he should not be committed to prison.

"Now, therefore, it is ordered that for such default as aforesaid the defendant shall be committed to prison for forty-two days."

S. R. Earle, for the applicant, the defendant.—The judge had no jurisdiction to make the order because the plaintiff had not recovered judgment against the defendant in the High Court of Justice. The judgment recovered by the plaintiff was against the firm of Osborne & Co. A judgment recovered in the High Court against the firm could only be transferred into a judgment against an individual partner by proceedings in the High Court. The county court had no jurisdiction to try the question of partnership on a judgment obtained against the firm in the High Court. Ord. 25, r. 17, of the County Court Rules only deals with cases where judgment is recovered against an individual and not against a firm. Ord. 25, r. 14*b*, only applies to cases where judgment has been recovered in a county court. Further, the affidavit filed by the plaintiff was not in the form required by ord. 25, r. 14*b*, of the County Court Rules, being Form 52*c*, since it did not state the sources of information and grounds of belief: McIntosh v. Simpkins, ante, p. 241, 17 Times L. R. 195. Also there was no evidence of means given. There was no judgment against the defendant until the judge on the 23rd of March, 1900, found he was a partner in the firm of Osborne & Co., and since the committal order was made immediately there could have been no evidence adduced that between the time of judgment and the committal order the defendant had means to pay.

Whateley, for the plaintiff.—The judgment was properly removed to the county court under ord. 25, r. 17, of the County Court Rules, and the judgment summons was rightly taken out under ord. 25, r. 14*b*. The county court judge's power under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, had been exercised in accordance with the terms of that Act. As to the defect in the affidavit, it was not a substantial defect and had been waived by the defendant. There was evidence of means.

Earle replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9.—WILLS, J.—I think that the proceedings in the county court were rightly taken under the 5th section of the Debtors Act, 1869. At the time when that Act was passed it was not possible to sue a firm in the firm's name. Now that can be done, but it is necessary to show that any individual against whom it is sought to enforce a judgment recovered against the firm is a partner in that firm. In the present case the proceedings are governed by ord. 25, r. 14*b*, of the County Court Rules, and I have little doubt that, although in 1869 there was no power of applying a judgment against a firm against a member of that firm, the county court judge was right in this particular. Instead of having two summonses, one to ascertain whether the person is a member of a firm, and another to ascertain whether it is a proper case to commit the defendant, one summons is sufficient to do both. This is a reasonable procedure and diminishes expense, an important consideration. I think that, the defendant having been found to be a partner, the debt was due from him at the time when judgment was entered against the firm, although it could not be enforced against him until the fact of partnership was established. That being so, I think there was jurisdiction to commit under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869. If the judge came to the conclusion that he was a partner and took in consideration that he had had means to pay the judgment previously obtained, I think the judge was right. As to the point, however, that the affidavit under ord. 25, r. 14*b*, of the County Court Rules must show the grounds of belief that the defendant is a partner, I think the contention of the defendant is right. It is a matter of substance, and has been decided so to be. This being so, there was no jurisdiction, provided the objection was taken. There is contradictory evidence on this point, but on the whole I think that the objection was taken and not waived.

As to there being no evidence of means the evidence again conflicts. I am not satisfied that there was such evidence. I can't help thinking that the witnesses were only called to show defendant was a partner, and that such evidence was taken as being evidence of means to pay as well as of partnership. But I do not decide this point, as it is not necessary.

CHANNELL, J., concurred, and added that on the question of waiver it was for the plaintiff to show that the defendant had waived the objection to jurisdiction, and this, in his opinion, the plaintiff had failed to do.

Writ of prohibition issued.

By section 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is enacted that, where a mine or seam of coal is abandoned, the owner shall, within three months after the abandonment, send a plan of the workings to a Secretary of State, and that, if an owner of a mine or seam fails to comply with the section, he shall be guilty of an offence; and it is further provided (sub-section 5) that "a complaint or information of an offence under this section may be made or laid at any time within six months after abandonment of the mine or seam, or after service on the owner aforesaid of a notice to comply with the requirements of this section, whichever last happens."

Held, that an information could not be laid of an offence under the section after a period of six months had elapsed since the service of a notice to comply with the section.

Held, also, that section 59 (2) of the Act did not apply to offences under section 38.

Held, also, that a notice in the following terms: "I beg to point out to you that no plan of the abandoned workings in the seven-feet coal seam has yet been forwarded as required by section 38 of the Mines Act. Will you please give the matter your early attention?" is a good notice under the section.

Case stated by justices of Warwick.

On the 27th of July, 1900, an information was laid by the appellant, one of his Majesty's inspectors of mines, against the appellant charging him that, being the owner of Pooley Hall Mine, he did unlawfully fail to comply with section 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, as amended by section 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1896, in that he did not within three months after the abandonment of the seven-feet coal seam in such mine send to a Secretary of State an accurate plan of the said seam showing the boundaries of the workings thereof up to the time of abandonment, and the several other particulars specified in the last-mentioned Act.

When the information came on for hearing the preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear it, on the ground that the information was laid after the period of six months referred to in section 38 (5) had elapsed.

It was proved that the abandonment of the seam took place prior to the 25th of January, 1900, and that on that date the appellant wrote a letter to the Pooley Hall Colliery Co. in the following terms:

"Gentlemen,—I beg to point out to you that no plan of the abandoned workings in the seven-feet coal seam has yet been forwarded as required by section 38 of the Mines Act. Will you please give the matter your early attention.—Yours faithfully, A. H. STOKES."

This letter was received in due course on the following day.

On the 25th of May, 1900, the appellant gave a formal notice requiring the Pooley Hall Colliery Co. to comply with the requirements of section 38.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the letter of the 25th of January, 1900, constituted a notice under section 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, to the owner to comply with the requirements of that section; that the six months within which the information is required to be laid by that section and sub-section commenced to run from the service thereof—namely, the 26th of January, 1900; that it was not open to the appellant to extend the period of six months therefrom by giving one or more subsequent notices; and that the information having been laid on the 27th of July, 1900, was out of time.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices upheld the contention of the respondent and dismissed the information subject to a case for the opinion of the High Court.

H. Sutton, for the appellant.—The letter of the 25th of January, 1900, was not a notice to comply with the requirements of the section. It was merely a courteous reminder to the colliery company of their duty under the Act. The time for laying the information, assuming the time was limited, did not begin to run until the 25th of May. The true construction, however, of section 38 (5) is that where notice has been served there is no limitation of time for laying an information. The words "within six months" in the sub-section do not govern the words "after service, &c.," but only govern the words "after abandonment of the mine or seam." If the words "after service, &c.," were governed by the words "within six months," then the final words "whichever last happens" would be unintelligible. Failure to send in plans of an abandoned working in accordance with section 38 after notice by an inspector is a continuing offence punishable under section 59 (2), which provides that "every person who is guilty of an offence against this Act for which a penalty is not expressly prescribed, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding, if he is the owner, agent, or manager, or under-manger, twenty pounds, and if he is any other person, two pounds, for each offence; and if an inspector has given a written notice of any such offence, to a further fine not exceeding one pound for every day after such notice that such offence continues to be committed."

Simey, for the respondent.—The letter of the 25th of January, 1900, is a good notice under the section, and as the information was not laid within six months after it the proceedings must fail. The construction put upon section 38 (5) by the appellant does not make the words "whichever last happens" intelligible. The only use of the notice was to make a point of time from which the period of limitation should run.

BRUCE, J.—I think that the justices were right. The question turns upon section 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. I think that that section is a section of limitation. First, it limits the time for laying an information for offences against the section to a period of six months after the abandonment of the mine. Then the section proceeds "or after service on the aforesaid owner of a notice, &c." I think that those words mean within six months after the service of the notice referred to. It is true that a difficulty is created by the final words in the section—"whichever last happens," and if those words could be construed intelligibly effect ought to be given to them. But they are inconsistent with either of the constructions of the section which have been suggested, and they throw no light upon the question before us. They must therefore be disregarded. Next, was the information laid within six months after service of the notice. That depends upon whether the letter of the 25th of January, 1900, was a good notice under the section. The letter does not formally require compliance with the requirements of the section, but it does refer to the section and to the necessity for sending in a plan of the abandoned seam, and it calls upon the respondent to give his early attention to the matter. We ought not to be too strict in cases of this kind, and I, for my part, cannot say that the justices were wrong in holding that the letter of the 25th of January, 1900, constituted a good notice.

With regard to the argument that the offence was a continuing one which could be dealt with under section 59, I am clearly of opinion that that section does not apply to the offence. Section 59 only refers to cases where "a penalty is not expressly prescribed," and by section 38 (4) a penalty is expressly prescribed for offences against this section.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons.

SOUTHALL NORWOOD URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (Appellants) v. MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL (Respondents). (a.)

Local government—Sewage—Sewage matter — Pollution of stream—Trade effluent—Pollution of river—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 7—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

A district council, having taken over a sewage farm from a local board, their predecessors in title, collected and treated on such farm the sewage of the district and discharged the effluent therefrom into a river. By a contract between the board and the owner of a margarine factory it was agreed that the said owner should be entitled to discharge the liquids and effluents from the said factory into the sewers of the board, subject to the condition that the said owner before so doing should extract all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the said liquids and effluents. This condition was not efficiently fulfilled, and the result was that the effluents, containing fat and fatty matter, became mixed with the sewage on the farm and the land became clogged with the fat and was not capable of filtering the sewage. On a summons being taken out under the Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, by the county council against the district council for "causing and suffering" sewage and other injurious and offensive matter to flow and pass from the said farm into the river the justices ordered the district council to discontinue such flow or passage.

Held, on appeal, that such order was rightly made, and that the district council had "caused or suffered" the filthy effluent to pass into the river. The district council were not compelled to receive into their sewers liquid containing fat or fatty matters, and if they did receive it they were bound to adopt some process on their farm which would effectually purify the effluent therefrom.

Special case.

This was an appeal by the Southall Norwood Urban District Council on a case stated by justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex upon the hearing of a summons issued by the respondents charging the appellants with having, contrary to the Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, on the 26th day of July, 1899, and on other days caused and suffered sewage and other offensive and injurious matter to flow and pass from certain land and premises known as the Southall Norwood Sewage Farm, and owned and occupied by them, into the Grand Junction Canal after notice thereof.

In the case stated the following facts appeared:

Prior to the year 1891 the Rural Sanitary Authority of Hillingdon had acquired for the purposes of a sewage farm seventeen acres of land adjoining and abutting on a canalized portion of the River Brent at the junction of the parishes of Norwood, Isleworth, and Hanwell, and had constructed thereon sewage works upon which the sewage of the precinct of Norwood was treated, the effluent therefrom being discharged into the said river.

In the year 1891, the said precinct was formed into an urban sanitary district, and a local board was constituted for such district, and the said farm and works were vested in the said board, which by operation of the Local Government Act, 1894, became known as the Southall and Norwood Urban District Council.

In 1894 the said local board, the predecessors in title of the appellants, was required by the owner of land, within its district, upon which it was intended to erect a margarine factory to afford facilities for carrying the liquids and effluent from the factory into the sewers, and an agreement, dated the 23rd of January, 1894, was entered into between the board and the said owner whereby it was agreed that, subject to the conditions therein mentioned, the owner for the time being of the factory should be entitled to discharge the liquids and effluents from the factory into the sewers of the board.

One of such conditions was that the owner should erect and maintain on part of the land upon which the factory was to be built settling tanks for the purpose of extracting, so far as might be practicable, all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the said liquids and effluent.

The factory having been erected, and disputes having arisen between the board and the owner of the factory as to his compliance with the aforesaid condition of the agreement, an action was commenced on the 14th of May, 1896, in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, wherein the board claimed an injunction restraining the said owner, his servants, agents, and workmen, from discharging the effluent from the said works into the sewers of the board until such effluent had been properly purified, and from causing or permitting the liquids and effluents from the works to flow into or remain in the sewers or drains of the board so as to become or cause a nuisance, damage, or annoyance to the board, and from committing a breach of the aforesaid contract.

The action came on for trial upon the 1st of June, 1897, and an order by consent was made on the defendant in the action expressing his intention to execute further works, whereby in case the board should not be satisfied with what should be done the matter should be referred to an arbitrator to say whether there were settling tanks sufficient, when efficiently worked, for the purpose of extracting, so far as might be practicable, all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquid and effluent discharged from the factory into the sewers of the board.

The board not being satisfied with the further works executed pursuant to the aforesaid order, the above question was submitted to an arbitrator for his decision. The said arbitrator decided that the settling tanks and other alterations in the defendant's plant would be sufficient for the purpose of extracting, as far as might be practicable, all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquid and effluent referred to in the said order of the court.

Notwithstanding the award the liquid and effluent discharged from the factory into the sewers of the board still contained solid fat or fatty matter in suspension, which was, in itself, objectionable and difficult to treat, and such effluent when mixed with the sewage rendered it more difficult for the appellants to effectually purify the sewage and the effect was to so clog the land in the said farm that it became saturated with sewage and was rendered less capable of effectually filtering the sewage of the district.

On the 15th of August, 1899, the respondents, in pursuance of the provisions of the Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, gave to the appellants notice in writing requiring them within three months to discontinue the flow or passage into the stream, known as the River Brent, of sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter from the said sewage works.

In September, 1899, the appellants discovered that the drains of certain chemical works in their district had, without their knowledge or consent, been connected with a sewer belonging to them, whereby large quantities of effluent were discharged from the said chemical works into the appellants' sewer.

The effect of this discharge into the appellants' sewers being to render it still more difficult to purify the sewage discharge from such sewers upon the farm, notice was served by the appellants upon the owners of the said chemical works on the 10th of December, 1899, requiring them to disconnect from the appellants' sewers the drains by means of which the effluent was discharged from the chemical works into the sewers, and on the 12th of the same month the said drains were disconnected in accordance with such notice.

The justices found that sewage and other offensive matters had flowed or passed into the River Brent from the appellants' farm and works subsequently to the expiration of three months from the date of the said notice of the 15th of August, 1899, but they were satisfied that such flow or passage would contain sewage and other offensive and injurious matters so long as the reception of effluent from the margarine factory and from the chemical works into the appellants' sewers and the infusion of such effluent into their system continued.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that they had not, under the circumstances, caused or suffered sewage or other offensive or injurious matter to flow or pass into the River Brent within the meaning of section 13 of the Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, and that the justices had, therefore, no power to require them under section 34 of that Act to abstain from carrying or suffering to flow or pass into the said river any sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that an offence had been committed by the appellant within the meaning of section 13 of the Act.

The justices were of opinion that the appellants were persons causing or suffering sewage and other offensive and injurious matter to flow or pass into the said river from the said farm and works, and they, accordingly, ordered the appellants to discontinue such flow or passage.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the appellants were, under the circumstances, persons causing or suffering sewage or other offensive or injurious matter to flow or pass from their said farm and works into the said River Brent.

The Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, provides as follows:

13. "(1) Whenever any sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter is caused or suffered to flow or pass into any stream, then and in every such case, even though such sewage or matter aforesaid had been lawfully so caused or suffered to flow or pass before the passing of this Act, the council may under the hand of the clerk of the council give notice in writing to the person causing or suffering the same so to flow or pass requiring him within a time to be specified in such notice, but not being less than three months, to discontinue such flow or passage.

"(2) The council may in like manner if they think fit at any time extend the time specified in such notice by another notice in writing."

"(4) Any person to whom any notice is under this section given by the council shall . . . discontinue the flow or passage of the sewage or matter to which the notice refers, and in default of so doing shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds and to a daily penalty not exceeding fifty pounds."

15. "Any notice given under the provisions of this part of the Act by the council to the owner or occupier of any land or premises shall continue in force notwithstanding any change in the ownership or occupation of such land or premises and shall affect the owners and occupiers of such land or premises in succession to the owner or occupier under whom such notice was served in like manner and in every respect and with the same obligations and consequences as though such successive owners were the owner or occupier upon whom such notice was served."

R. C. Glen, for the appellants.—The district council did not, under the circumstances of the case, cause or suffer the sewage or injurious matter to flow into the river. They were bound by section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to receive the effluent from the margarine factory, and they did everything in their power to render such effluent pure. There is no finding in the case of any act of negligence or misfeasance on their part, and they cannot be held liable for a mere nonfeasance: Reg. v. Staines Local Board, 60 L. T. Rep. 261, 37 W. R. Dig. 131; Attorney-General v. Guardians of Poor of Union of Dorking, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595; Brown v. Mayor, &c., of Dunstable, 47 W. R. 538, [1899] 2 Ch. 378; Eastwood Brothers (Limited) v. Honley Urban District Council, 48 W. R. 614, [1900] 1 Ch. 781; Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, [1897] 1 Q. B. 384 (reported on appeal 45 W. R. 454, [1897] 1 Q. B. 625); Pasmore and Others v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, [1898] A. C. 387, 46 W. R. Dig. 106.

Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C., and Herbert Smith, for the respondents.—It is admitted on the special case that sewage does pass into the River Brent. Firstly, the appellants are not bound to receive this margarine refuse into their sewers. There is no obligation on their part to receive a liquid containing solids in suspension, and they have power to obtain an order prohibiting the margarine manufacturers from putting such liquid into the sewers: St. Helens Chemical Co. v. Corporation of St. Helens, 1 Ex. D. 196, 24 W. R. Dig. 165. The appellants should not have entered into the agreement with the manufacturers. A public body cannot make an agreement releasing them from the performance of a binding duty: Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623, 32 W. R. Dig. 112. Even if the appellants are bound to receive this margarine refuse, they must effectually treat it. There is nothing to show here that they could not send it into the river as a perfectly pure liquid. If they receive the margarine refuse they must alter their treatment of it.

R. C. Glen replied.

PHILLIMORE, J.—My learned brother has asked me to deliver my judgment first. We both think this conviction should stand. The section of the special Act of Parliament, the Middlesex County Council Act, 1898, under which the proceedings are taken is section 13. [The learned judge here read the section.] The person who is given notice under this section has the power of demanding an extension of time, and if an extension of time is not assented to, he can go to arbitration before an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade in order to obtain such extension of time as the arbitrator may think proper. In this case there was a sewage farm constructed by the predecessors in title of the present district council, the appellants, to which the sewage of the district was led and on which it was treated, and from which it passed out by an effluent. An effluent, we know, is a modern word meaning the pure, or as near as possible the pure residuum, after some impure substance has been deposited; and we may take it that the effluent from this sewage farm was a pure effluent until the circumstances which I am now going to mention happened. Latterly the effluent is no longer pure; it carries sewage and other offensive matter into the River Brent, and if there is anybody who causes or suffers sewage or other offensive matter to flow or pass into the stream, then such person or body comes within the purview of section 13.

Now it is said by the Middlesex County Council that the Southall Norwood Urban District Council, who are the owners, occupiers, and managers of this sewage farm, are persons who "cause or suffer" this noxious matter to flow into the stream, and they have given them the proper notice provided under the section. The notice does not seem to have been appealed against, and after the lapse of time prescribed by the notice, the offensive matter continuing to pass into the stream, a summons was issued, and the county council obtained a conviction.

Now Mr. Glen has argued that you do not "cause or suffer" if you are merely acting ministerially; and he cited to us a number of cases of public bodies who had been held not to "cause or suffer" sewage to reach a river when all they have done has been not to interfere with the user of the pipes which they took over from some prior body, and into which pipes individuals have a right of passing their sewage. They do not use the pipes, but simply leave them there; they do not make the pipes, and, therefore, it was suggested, they do not "cause or suffer," because they could only stop the sewage passing through the pipes in one of two ways, either by a physical obstruction, which probably would be a breach of their statutory duty, and would create an intolerable nuisance, or by bringing actions against every individual who drained into their sewers, which would be an intolerable burden upon the local board, and a burden which is not imposed upon anyone without express words.

The courts have held they are not so bound to do; neither can an action lie against the persons draining into the sewer, nor can they be indicted.

In this case there is a channel sending clean water into the River Brent, and what the district council have done is that they collect all the sewage of the district upon a sewage farm and have then, when the sewage failed to be properly treated thereon, issued the filthy effluent into the river. It seems to me that is a case in which they may well be said to have "caused or suffered" it to pass; if not "caused" at any rate "suffered."

Here there is a margarine manufacturer who is entitled, under the Rivers Pollution Act, to require the local board of health or the district council to take into their sewers the liquid products of his factory. I do not think he is entitled to send large masses of solid matter in solution into the sewer. The appellants, instead of leaving the manufacturer to his legal rights, entered into an agreement with him under which he was given, in addition to those rights, certain contractual rights, and they were given certain contractural rights as against him. They say he has not fulfilled his duty according to his contract, and they brought an action against him, and the matter was referred to an arbitrator, who held that he would be discharging his duty if he retained all the solids and sent down nothing except the liquid. The case as stated does not find that that award has been enforced nor that there has been any attempt to enforce it; I am not quite sure in a case like this there would not be a duty on the district council to attempt to enforce the award. Be that as it may, the fact remains that the fatty matter from the margarine factory comes upon the soil of the sewage farm, and the effect on the farm is that the latter gets coated with grease and the sewage does not sink into the soil, but passes down the effluent into the river, together with fatty matter. It seems to me that the district council are "suffering" the matter to come into the river. I think upon the true construction of the case as stated it would appear that even if the manufacturer continues to send, without filtration, the whole of his refuse, including the solids, into the sewers of the district council, there is nothing to show that the district council could not nevertheless, by some form of treatment at the sewage farm, prevent the effluent being otherwise than pure. It may be very expensive, or disagreeable, or hard on them that they should be put to further expense, but still there is nothing which compels them, firstly, to receive these solids, and, secondly, so to treat the sewage that the result is an impure instead of a pure effluent. I rest my judgment upon the fact that the district council, having taken over this place from its predecessors in title, collect and treat the sewage thereon and discharge it through an effluent, and primâ facie they have to excuse themselves from discharging a filthy effluent into the river. The excuse they offer is not sufficient. Either they ought not to have made an improvident contract, if it is improvident, or, having got a contract, should see that the contract is properly carried out, and either not receive the stuff which they are not bound to receive or take the trouble of enforcing their right under the award and have the stuff purified, or, finally, if they must receive the stuff in its present state, they ought to take other steps on the sewage farm to purify the effluent. I therefore think there must be judgment for the respondents.

BRUCE, J.—I agree with my learned brother in the conclusion at which he arrives. I also agree with the reasons he has given, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Upon the 28th of November, 1899, the petitioning creditor obtained an order upon a petition in the Chancery Division revoking certain letters patent granted to William Owen, and ordering the said William Owen to pay to the petitioner his costs to be taxed. The costs were taxed and certified on the 7th of May, 1900, at £858 14s. 9d.

Upon the 14th of May, 1900, the petitioning creditor issued a bankruptcy notice founded upon the order and certificate for the sum of £874 9s., the amount of the costs with interest, as being due upon a final judgment. The debtor failed to comply with the notice within the statutory period, and the creditor presented a bankruptcy petition against him upon the 23rd of May.

The petition came on for hearing upon the 2nd of October, when it was dismissed by the registrar, who held, on the authority of In re Binstead, Ex parte Dale, 41 W. R. 452, [1893] 1 Q. B. 199, that the order on which the bankruptcy notice was founded was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The petitioning creditor appealed.

Carrington and G. G. Solomon, for the appellant.—The registrar did not rightly understand the decision in In re Binstead, Ex parte Dale; the real principle is to be found in Ex parte Moore, In re Faithfull, 33 W. R. 438, 14 Q. B. D. 627, where an order for payment of costs was held to be a "final judgment" within the meaning of this sub-section. Further, In re Gaulard & Gibb's Patent, 35 W. R. 301, 34 Ch. D. 396, North, J., held that a petition for the revocation of a patent was to all intents and purposes an action. The meaning of the term is also discussed in Bradlaugh v. Clarke, 31 W. R. 677, 8 App. Cas. 354, and In re A Bankruptcy Notice, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 43 W. R. 305, [1895] 1 Q. B. 609.

R. Vaughan Williams, for the respondent, referred to Ex parte Chinery, In re Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342, and was stopped by the court.

WRIGHT, J.—The Court of Appeal in several cases, in particular in Ex parte Chinery, In re Chinery, In re Binstead, Ex parte Dale, and In re A Bankruptcy Notice, Ex parte The Official Receiver, have put upon section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a construction which we are bound to follow, although the judgments of the Lords Justices may not have been altogether identical. According to those cases there must be a final judgment, a final judgment in an action—and the action, in the view of some at least of the Lords Justices, must be an action within the meaning of section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873—that is, a "civil proceeding commenced by writ or in such other manner as may be prescribed by Rules of Court."

In the present case the order of the court does not purport to be a judgment, but only a declaration. It is not made in an action, but on a petition, which is commenced, not by writ nor in any manner prescribed by Rules of Court, but in manner prescribed by section 26 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

On these grounds this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HODDINOTT (PAUPER) v. NEWTON, CHAMBERS, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Building exceeding thirty feet in height—Building being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding—Scaffolding inside building—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

A building over thirty feet high, measured to the top of the roof, was being stiffened with iron stays some months after its completion according to the original specifications. Planks supported on ledgers and trestles, inside the building and about eight feet from the ground, were used for the purposes of the work, and while lifting material on this platform one of the workmen was injured.

Held (Lord Shand and Lord Lindley dissenting), that the building was being constructed by means of a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (47 W. R. 499, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1018) reversed.

The meaning of "building being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding" considered.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (47 W. R. 499, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1018).

The facts are concisely summarized in Lord Macnaghten's judgment.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Moyses (Holland Biggs with them), for the appellant.

Bray, Q.C., and Spencer Bower, for respondents.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The claim in this case as presented to your lordships is a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for compensation in respect of an accident to a workman. It seems that about six months before the date of the accident the London General Omnibus Co. took over a building which had been erected for them. They have used it as stables ever since. It may be assumed, I think, that the building was erected in accordance with the specifications prepared on behalf of the company, and that at the time when it was taken over nobody contemplated that anything further in the way of construction would be required. However, when the stables came to be used it was found that there was some vibration, and the company determined to have the building stiffened. Accordingly, they engaged the respondents, who are ironwork contractors, to put in some heavy iron stays, weighing about 1cwt. apiece, between the girders and the pillars which supported the building. The appellant's husband was employed by the respondents on the work. In the course of his employment he met with an accident. He slipped and fell off a temporary staging while helping another workman to lift one of these iron stays. The stay fell upon him and he was crushed to death. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal agreed with the county court judge in holding that the building exceeded thirty feet in height. They were not agreed on the question whether the staging erected for the purpose of the work in hand was a "scaffolding" within the meaning of the Act. A. L. Smith, L.J., without expressing any opinion of his own, thought there was evidence sufficient to justify the finding of the county court judge to that effect. Collins, L.J., took a different view. Romer, L.J., did not attempt to determine the point. All the learned judges, however, concurred in holding that the building in which the accident happened was not at the time being constructed or being repaired, and that the respondents were not undertakers within the meaning of the Act. The ground of their decision is stated very clearly by A. L. Smith, L.J.: "Were the iron-founders," he asked, "who put in these stays constructing the building? That cannot be," says his lordship, "for it had already been constructed, and what was then done was only an addition to that which it had originally been contemplated would be wanted. How can it be said that the deceased was employed in a building which was being constructed? The construction was at an end, but some strengthening was afterwards needed to be done." Collins, L.J., as it seems to me, went rather further, following out the views expressed by the other members of the court to their logical conclusion. He thought that the only work contemplated by the Act in the case of a building besides demolition was construction or repair of the building "as a whole."

The argument addressed to your lordships by the learned counsel for the respondents followed the same lines. The building, they said, when it was handed over, was complete according to the original design. Construction, therefore, necessarily was at an end. What was done afterwards, whether it was the result of caprice on the part of the company's engineer, as they suggested, or a bonâ fide attempt to make the building more suitable for the purpose for which it was intended, was only an alteration, or at the most an addition, and perhaps an improvement. It was not either construction or repair.

I do not think it advances the argument to call the work an alteration, or an addition, or an improvement. I should suppose that any one of those terms might be applied to it properly enough. The question, as it seems to me, is this: Was the work—the thing that was actually being done—a work of construction or a work of repair, or something which was neither the one nor the other, neither construction nor repair? It seems a strong thing to say that when a building is once completed according to the original design you cannot have anything further in the way of construction unless the work be of such a character as to make the building practically a new building. That, however, was the argument. But the Act, it will be observed, uses the word "construction," not the word "erection." It speaks of a building "being constructed," not of a building "being erected." And it couples "construction" with "repair." Now repair, as the word is commonly understood, is repair whether much is done or little. Repair for the most part is occasional and partial. A man does not usually wait to repair his house until it is altogether ruinous and on the point of falling to pieces. Why may not construction be partial just as repair is partial?

Many cases were put in argument, and many others may be suggested. Is a man who adds a storey or a new room to a house constructing a building? Is a man constructing a building if he strips off a coating of stucco and faces his house with red brick or cut stone? In one sense he is; in another sense he is not. It depends upon what is meant by "constructing," and whether reference is made to the building as it was, or to the building as it will be when the proposed alteration is complete. These and such-like questions may be very interesting puzzles, but I do not think they help one much. The question, after all, must be what is construction and what is repair in this Act of Parliament, where construction and repair are associated together. I do not think that "construction" can be limited to the original construction. That would be in effect substituting "erection" for "construction." Nor do I think that "construction" and "repair" can be limited to the construction and repair of a building "as a whole." Neither the word "original," which the learned counsel for the respondents so continually interpolated, nor the words "as a whole," which Collins, L.J., would introduce, are to be found in the Act. They are glosses, and I think misleading. It seems to me that whenever new material is put into a building so that it becomes an integral part of the structure, you have something in the nature of construction; and that a building which is being so treated is being constructed within the meaning of the Act. You are putting together the old materials and the new. Now, if this be "construction," I do not think it can matter in the least whether the work is taken in hand immediately after the erection of the building, or not commenced until months or even years later. Nor do I think it is of importance to inquire why the work has been undertaken. It cannot, as it seems to me, make any difference whether the person who gave the order for it was moved by a reasonable apprehension of danger or prompted by some idle fancy. What has to be looked to is the thing done, not the motive for doing it or the relative dates of the erection of the building and its subsequent alteration. Construction, repair, demolition—these three operations cover, I think, every varying phase in the life of a building from its beginning to its end.

I prefer to rest my judgment on this broad ground. But I cannot help thinking that something narrower would lead to the same result in the present case. May one not say with the strictest propriety that a building is in course of construction when it is being reconstructed in order to make it what it was intended to be—a firm and substantial structure, capable of resisting the action of wind? Reconstruction is but construction over again.

The learned counsel for the respondents sought to draw an inference in their favour from the circumstance that the word "alteration" occurs in connection with engineering work, but not in connection with buildings. I should suppose that in the latter case it was omitted designedly, because it is impossible to conceive any alteration in a building—that is, of course, any substantial alteration—which does not involve construction. In the case of engineering work it is very different. If you look at the definition of engineering work, that may include shifting of rails, alteration of points, change of levels, and many other things which no one would ordinarily call construction or repair.

There was one point made by the learned counsel for the respondents which ought, I think, to be noticed. The learned counsel did not contend that the arrangement of boards and ledgers and trestles, which for want of a better word I have called a staging, was not a scaffolding in the common acceptation of the word. Everybody called it a scaffolding. But they argued that it was not such a scaffolding as was contemplated by the Act. Taking the view which commended itself to Collins, L.J., both in the present case and in Maude v. Brook, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575, they said that the scaffolding "must have some relation to the height of the building." And when pressed to submit a more definite proposition they proceeded to contend that it must be a scaffolding adequate for the construction or repair of a building exceeding thirty feet in height "as a whole," or to use the language of the Lord Justice in Maude v. Brook, "One system of scaffolding for the whole building which is capable of being used for its construction or repair as a whole." That might have been a reasonable provision if the accidents to which the Act applies had been confined to accidents in some way connected with the use of the scaffolding. But it is not suggested that anything of the sort is to be found in the Act. All that the Act requires is that there should be a building exceeding thirty feet in height which is being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding. It says nothing about the height or position or extent of the scaffolding. It is not, I think, for the court to lay down conditions which Parliament has not thought fit to impose.

I ought perhaps to add that I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Brampton and with Collins, L.J., in thinking that the question whether a temporary staging is a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act is not a mere question of fact on which the finding of the county court judge is final. It is a mixed question of fact and law. When the facts are ascertained it is a question of law on which the Court of Appeal is entitled, and I think bound, to express an opinion.

The provision as to the height of the building, and the provision with reference to a scaffolding, serve roughly to draw a line of demarcation between employments with which the Act is not concerned and those to which it is intended to apply. They were intended to exempt a certain class of buildings, and perhaps a certain class of builders of the humbler sort, from the operation of the Act. They are obviously copied from the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, where the same provisions serve a somewhat similar purpose. I do not think they throw any light on the construction of the Act.

I agree that the only way to construe the Act is to read it fairly, taking the words in their common and ordinary signification, and that the court ought not to strain the language in order to bring in or to exclude any particular case, however arbitrary or unscientific the line of demarcation drawn by the Act may seem to be. But I think that in the present case the learned judges of the Court of Appeal have taken too narrow a view. If you construe the words of the Act so narrowly as to exclude one of the commonest operations of the builder, the alteration of buildings once completed, and so debar workmen engaged in that operation from all benefit of the Act, you are, I venture to think, violating the letter as well as the spirit of the enactment.

I think that the appeal ought to be allowed with costs in the Court of Appeal, and with such costs in this House as are allowed in pauper cases, and that the order of the county court judge ought to be restored. And I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord MORRIS AND KILLANIN.—I agree in the judgment of my noble and learned friend in the chair, and in the reasons he has given.

That the building exceeded thirty feet in height and had some operations performed on it by means of scaffolding are questions of fact mainly, and were found in the affirmative by the county court judge, and not dissented from by the majority of the Court of Appeal. Nothing, in my opinion, remains but the question, Was the operation being performed on the building at the time of the accident either constructing or repairing the building? In my opinion, when you realize what the entity called the building is, all operations on it must be either constructing or repairing or demolishing—alteration in its construction is, in my opinion, constructing. I can find no reference in the statute to what is called, in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., a completed building.

In my opinion, whether completed or not completed, if work of the nature of construction goes on, that is constructing, and if work in the nature of repair, that is repairing, and there is no room for any third operation of so-called alteration, as distinct from constructing or repairing.

Lord SHAND.—The question for the decision of the House in this appeal is whether, when the deceased Benjamin Hoddinott lost his life, the respondents were engaged in the construction or repair of the building in which the accident occurred, or whether the work then being done was of the nature of an addition or alteration of a building, the construction of which had been completed about six months previously, the addition or alteration not being construction or repair as referred to in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That the question is one of difficulty sufficiently appears from the division of opinion in your lordships' House. I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right and ought to be affirmed.

The statute in its seventh section draws a marked distinction between employment in engineering work and in the construction of a building, and in construing the statute the distinction is of importance to the decision of the case. In the opening part of that section the Act is declared to apply to "engineering work," and also to employment about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either "being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding or being demolished." In the same section engineering work is defined or described to mean "any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer," or the other works there enumerated. Again, under the description of undertakers in the case of an engineering work, the term means "the person undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair," and in the case of a building means the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition.

Within the provisions of section 7 of the statute, on the meaning of which the whole question in dispute turns, in three different passages engineering work is thus defined to include, not only construction or repair, but "addition," while in contrast with this, in the case of a building, the definition twice repeated includes construction or repair only. The work by way of "addition" is not included. It must, in my opinion, especially having in view the juxtaposition of the provisions, be taken to have been designedly intended to create a distinction between the two classes of work.

It is more than doubtful whether the question really in dispute, as it has been argued in the Court of Appeal and again in this House, was clearly before the learned judge of the county court. The claim which was made under the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, which failed, suddenly became before him a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, under which he came to act as arbitrator. It is recorded by him in his notes that the court holds: "The defendants were undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair." If the case was one of alteration only of an existing construction, it does not follow that the circumstances would create the liability insisted on, because that word is not in the statute applied to a building. The finding seems to show that the learned arbitrator could not hold the case as one in which there was "construction," which inferred liability under the statute.

As to the question of repair, I say it out of consideration, for, whatever was being done at the building, there was no repair going on. None of the completed work had gone wrong or given way so as to require any repair, or setting right in itself; and what was done was, therefore, no act of repairing, but something entirely new. The question remains, and it seems to me the only question in the case, Was the building in the course of construction?

There was little, if any, evidence given as to the facts bearing on that question, apparently because the appellant's case was really presented as one, under the Employers' Liability Act, of fault or negligence on the employer's part from alleged defective scaffolding. The evidence taken before the coroner seems to have been put in, and there the witness Nicholson said that the alteration to the building was to stay the building, "so that the wind may not vibrate it." Accordingly the facts beyond this statement must be taken from the admissions made before the Court of Appeal. These admissions are really part of the appellants' case, for they are necessary to raise the question of liability as well as to give the grounds on which the Court of Appeal proceeded in holding that the statute did not apply; and Mr. Ruegg, in his able argument, candidly admitted the facts on which the Court of Appeal in their judgment proceeded. The facts are—(1) that the building had been completed and in use for somewhere about six months before the accident occurred; (2) that the work then being carried on was not contemplated when the building was constructed; (3) that the iron stays were being put in to strengthen or stay the building and prevent vibration; and (4) that the appellants, who had not been employed in the construction of the building, where employed in putting in the stays.

In this state of the facts, I am of opinion, with the Court of Appeal, that the case is not within the provisions of the seventh section of the statute, as the building was not "being constructed by means of a scaffolding." It was a building which had been so constructed months before, and had been in use as a completed building, and on which an improvement, or an addition only, was being made. What is the distinction which the statute has drawn between engineering work and buildings? As I have said, the former includes construction, alteration, or repair; the latter, only construction and repair; and, repair being out of the case, "construction," which seems to me equivalent in meaning to "erection," only remains. If the word erection had been used, the appellant's argument would have been the same, that the placing of stays was erection in part, as it is now said to be construction of a part of the building. This was a constructed building, long in use, on which it was thought desirable to make an improvement, or addition, to make it more secure or more comfortable. Is it to be said that every such improvement or addition, where scaffolding is in use in the building, is "construction" of a building within the meaning of the statute? I cannot give to the term "construction" so wide, I might say so loose, a signification. The work might be the putting in of one or more windows in order to light the building better, or it might be the making of commodious presses, internal presses or closets, or the making of closet or lavatory arrangements by internal work. It appears to me that such additions, alterations, or improvements in a building cannot be regarded as "construction," and I say the same in regard to stays put in in order to prevent vibration.

The erection of a new or additional storey to a building might be represented as construction, because in that case a new building, including an outside structural wall, is really made or constructed; but that entirely differs from such internal operations as occurred in the present case, and the character of the addition, improvement, or alteration, in my opinion, makes all the difference.

The argument of the appellant disregards the distinction which the statute has drawn between engineering work and work on a building. It has been observed that the word "alteration" may have been omitted designedly, because it is impossible to conceive any alteration in a building which does not involve construction. The observation would, it appears to me, apply with the same force to a "railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer" in which engineering work may be employed. The use of the term construction was not deemed sufficient to include in that case work of the nature of an addition, and accordingly that term was added, and I am unable to construe the term construction in a wider sense when it is used as applied to a building, so as to include everything of the nature of an improvement or addition, than the proper sense in which it is used as applicable to engineering works in the same sentence.

It was argued for the appellant that if a case of repair, and it might be of comparatively small repair, is sufficient to bring the building within the statute, why should not an improvement or addition also have the same effect? The answer to that observation is that the statute in its terms has drawn and enacted a distinction between the two cases. For my part I agree in thinking the distinction ought to be done away with, and cases of alteration should be put on the same footing as those of repair; but this must be done by amending legislation, and not by straining the language used so as to include cases which it may seem desirable to include, though the terms used will not, according to their ordinary and proper interpretation, do so.

I agree in thinking that the staging from which the deceased fell was a scaffold or scaffolding within the ordinary meaning of these words, and that it was so seems to be simply a question of fact.

I further agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten that, as a matter of law, the erection and use of a scaffold or scaffolding "capable of being used for the construction or repair of the building as a whole" is not required in order to bring the building under the provisions of the seventh section of the statute.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and I only desire to add two observations of my own.

This case is, of course, not free from difficulty, but I have come to a clear opinion that the addition of these iron stays was "construction" within the meaning of the Act. The Master of the Rolls says it was not construction, because the building was already completed. I take leave to say that the learned judge assumes the whole point in controversy. No doubt it was intended to be completed, and the parties thought it was completed, when the omnibus company took possession. But the experience of a few months showed that something more was needed to adapt it to the purpose for which it was intended, or, in other words, that it was not in fact complete; and the addition of these iron stays was required to complete the construction. It is none the less construction because it was an addition made at a later date, or because the addition was not contemplated or was omitted in the original specification, and the necessity for it was not then apparent.

The second observation is as to the construction put by Collins, L.J., on the words of the Act. The learned Lord Justice says that the scaffolding must bear some relation to the height of the building, and be such a scaffolding as would be required to construct or repair a building of that height. I think it very likely that the draftsman had something of that kind in his mind, but I can only interpret the Act by the language which he has used. The Lord Justice further says that the requirement of a building of a certain height and of a scaffolding was intended to fix the standard of danger to the workman. That would be all very well if the compensation was confined to accidents arising out of or in some way connected with the height of the building or the scaffolding. But that is not so. By the seventh section the Act is made applicable to any employment "in or about any building," &c., without any qualification. A carpenter, for example, employed on the ground-floor in preparing and putting in the woodwork, the joists, doors, and window-frames, would be within the Act though he never went near the scaffold.

I will not detain you further. I have had the opportunity of seeing the judgment about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Brampton. He has gone very fully into the question whether the platform in question was scaffolding within the meaning of the Act. I will not anticipate what he will read, but only say that I entirely agree with his reasoning. I express my concurrence in the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

Lord BRAMPTON.—Benjamin Hoddinott, the late husband of the appellant, a riveter, being a workman in the employ of the respondents, ironwork contractors, was, on the 19th of August, 1898, fatally injured whilst working for them at and in a building at Putney exceeding thirty feet in height, and occupied as stables by the General Omnibus Co. He died on the 22nd of the month, leaving the appellant surviving him, and it is not disputed that if any compensation is payable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of his death, she is the person to claim it.

The facts of the case are very loosely stated in the appendix, but are sufficiently supplemented in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., to enable me to form my opinion upon them. The building, a new one, especially designed for stables, was erected for the General Omnibus Co., according to a contract and specification, by a firm of builders unconnected with the respondents, by means of ordinary builders' external scaffolding. It was roofed in and completed by the builders, so far as they were concerned, about six months before the time of the accident. On the completion of the building the scaffolding was removed, and from that time the stables have been occupied by the horses of the omnibus company. A few months after such completion, and very shortly before the accident, it was considered by the engineer of the company that the building was deficient in stability and required to be stiffened in order to strengthen it and prevent its vibration by the wind, with possible danger to the whole structure. To remedy this it was determined to introduce iron stays (each weighing about one hundredweight), and by means of them to connect the iron girders over the stalls with the upright iron columns inside the building. The respondents were employed by the omnibus company, and they undertook to do this work, and the appellant's deceased husband was employed by them upon it. At the time of the accident he was with a fellow-workman inside the stable, standing upon a platform erected solely for the purposes of this work. It was used by the workmen in the daytime, but was removed every evening to enable the horses to occupy their stalls for the night. No poles were used in its construction; it was formed by boards each twelve feet long, nine inches wide, and one and a-half inches thick, resting on ledgers lashed to the iron columns, and, in order to make the structure more firm, trestles were placed under the middle of the scaffold boards to support them. The platform on which the deceased was standing was raised about eight feet above the ground. He was in the act of lifting one of the stays when he lost his balance and fell to the ground, the stay falling on him, and he died from the injuries thereby occasioned.

No question arises as to the regularity of the proceedings before the county court judge, who found as facts, first, that the building was of a height exceeding thirty feet, measured from the ridge of the roof, though the top of the parapet wall was only twenty-eight feet; secondly, that the work the deceased was employed upon was a work of "construction, alteration, or repair," and he held that the structure from which the deceased fell was "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act, and awarded to the appellant, as widow of the deceased, £245 14s. as compensation.

I would here point out that there really was no finding to justify any award, for the county court judge only found that the deceased was engaged on one of three descriptions of work—construction, alteration, or repair. If it was "alteration," no claim would arise. The point, however, was not taken, and this House, I assume, will treat the finding as though the word "alteration" had been omitted.

The 7th section of the Act, sub-section 1, enacts: "This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished."

In endeavouring to arrive at a satisfactory interpretation of this section one labours under considerable difficulty. The whole statute is full of incongruities. In it, so many things are said which could not have been meant, and so many things which must have been meant are left unsaid, that one often has great hesitation in even forming a conjecture as to what may have been the views and intentions of its framers.

What, for instance, could be the object of debarring a workman from seeking compensation under the Act for any injury he might sustain during his employment in erecting a building intended to be of much greater height than that mentioned by means of a scaffold, until that building has been already actually erected to a height exceeding thirty feet, even though such injury is caused by something falling on him from the very scaffold which had been put up to a much greater height for the purposes of the building then in course of construction? Yet such was the substance ruled in the case of Billings v. Holloway, 47 W. R. 105, [1899] 1 Q. B. 70, by compulsion of the plain unambiguous language of the Act. The effect of this enactment would, in the case of a building intended to be thirty-one feet high, be to limit the liability of the employers to the period of time occupied in erecting the last foot.

I have neither heard nor read any satisfactory reason for the enactment. I am rather inclined to think it was taken and adopted without consideration from article 2 of the Schedule to the Notice of Accidents Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 28), defining the character of the accidents required to be notified to the Board of Trade—an article which is foreign to the objects of the Act I am now considering, and which article was repealed by 58 & 59 Vict. c. 37, s. 54, before the passing of the Employer and Workmen Act. It is not disputed by anyone that the Act applies to internal as well as to external scaffolding.

I pass on to consider now the only questions which this House is called upon to decide in the present case.

They are, first, whether the work upon which the deceased was employed when he met with his injury was a work either of construction or repair; secondly, whether the structure from which he fell was "a scaffolding" within the meaning of the 7th section, sub-section 1.

In his judgment in the Court of Appeal, A. L. Smith, L.J., said that it could not be construction, for that the building had already been constructed and completed, and was in actual use, and that which was done was only an addition to that which had originally been contemplated; and that an addition could not come under the head of repairs; and on that ground the appeal from the county court judge was allowed.

I cannot assent to this view of the case, my own opinion being that that which was being done to the building was a work of construction. It must be conceded that, so far as the original builder was concerned, his contract had been carried out according to the specification, and the external scaffolding had been removed six months before the accident, and it was then considered by all concerned that the building needed nothing more to make it fit for permanent use. This concession, however, seems to me to be immaterial. We have nothing to do with the building contract. The question we have to deal with is, Was the building in fact fully constructed, or was it faulty and deficient in its construction, for the purpose for which it was intended? If that which was being done when the accident occurred was needed for the proper strength of the building, and ought to have been done, but was omitted to be so when the builder had finished his work, then, whether such omission was attributable to the neglect or oversight of those who framed the specification, or to to the builder failing to perform his obligations, the building was in fact deficiently constructed, and if the work done was simply to supply that deficiency and make the building what it ought to have been at the first, it was a work of construction. It may be that it was also an addition in the sense that it was an addition of something necessary to supply an omission, and give to this building that inherent strength which it ought to have had originally.

If the same stays which were in course of being fitted when the accident happened had been so fitted before the original building had been handed over by the builders to the company, they would clearly have formed a part of the building: why should they not become so when fitted to supply the omission of that which was deemed to be essential to its security? I fail to see any reason, and I therefore think the work was one of construction. Suppose the foundation of one of the walls had been found to be insecure, would not work done to make it safe be work of construction? Assuming I am right in the view I have expressed, what signifies it that the discovery of the defect was not made for a long time? That would not alter the fact.

Assuming, however, for a moment that when the builders' work was originally completed, it was in all respects apparently perfect, but that in the course of a few months it was from some undiscovered cause found to be deteriorated, and so unsteady that it was necessary to put in the stays or to do some other work to restore it to the condition it had been in when the builders left it: why might that not be treated as repair, I fail to see. No cases have yet been decided upon the subject of what is "construction" and what is "repair." In Wood v. Walsh, 47 W. R. 504, [1899]

1 Q. B. 1009, A. L. Smith, L.J., said, "Constructed or repaired means some work relating to the structure of the buildings."

I will now deal with the question whether the arrangement on which the deceased was working, and from which he fell, was a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the statute.

Hitherto the Court of Appeal seems to have treated this question as a matter of fact for the county court judge or the arbitrator, by whom the claim for compensation is heard, to determine, and upon which his finding is not open to review. In the last reported case on this subject, Ferguson v. Green, ante, p. 105, W. N. [1900] 247, it was so expressly ruled by the Master of the Rolls (Sir A. L. Smith) and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ., following previous decisions by the same court, Wood v. Walsh and Maude v. Brook. With all respect for those judgments, I cannot concur in them.

I thoroughly agree that the arbitrator or county court judge is the proper tribunal to find every fact which is necessary for the determination of the question whether the arrangement in the particular case before it is or is not "scaffolding" within the meaning of the Act. Such, for instance, as the mode in which the arrangement is put together, the component parts of it, the materials used for its construction, the use to which it is applied, the place and the size of the place in which it is used, the dimensions of it, &c.; and his finding upon such facts is, according to the general rule, final; but whether upon the facts so found, the arrangement so constructed is a scaffolding sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 7 is, in my opinion, a question of law, which in the first instance must be adjudged by him to enable him to determine the case before him, his judgment on the question of law being open to review by the Court of Appeal. I think it is expedient that it should be so, for were it otherwise, considering the number of county court judges and arbitrators who are called upon to try such cases, there would probably be much diversity in their judgments upon the question, and the law would be very unsettled. Whereas by holding that the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to review such finding, something like uniformity in the decisions as to what constitutes a scaffolding will very soon be established.

This view is confirmed by the opinion of Collins, L.J., in the case of Maude v. Brook, in which he expressly said: "Whether a particular arrangement is a scaffolding is not a question of pure fact, and therefore not merely a question for a jury without direction as to the law."

Whether a bicycle was a carriage within the meaning of the Highway Act was treated as a question of law in Taylor v. Goodwin, 27 W. R. 489, 4 Q. B. D. 228.

No definition is given in the Act as to what shall be deemed a scaffolding within the meaning of the 7th section. Nor do I think it would be possible to frame a satisfactory definition which would be universally applicable. Few people are unacquainted with that character of scaffold which has for certainly many generations been commonly used by builders, but nobody in these days would venture to assert that the meaning of the word "scaffolding" is confined to such arrangements as those; and I entirely agree with Rigby, L.J., who, in his judgment in Maude v. Brook, says: "In construing the Act we are not at liberty to confine the meaning of the word 'scaffolding' to that which is its most usual form; anything whether usual or unusual that can properly be called scaffolding is within the Act"; and a little later on he illustrates his meaning by expressing a clear opinion that, if a builder had the control of two walls, one on each side of the site where a scaffold was needed, he might, if he could do so, utilize them by laying planks across from one to the other, and that such a structure would be a scaffolding without the use of either poles or trestles; so in like manner in the present case, in my opinion, the iron columns already existing in the stables might equally be used—as they were—to form a scaffolding by lashing to them by ropes pieces of wood or metal to help in the support of the boards which were to form the platform on which the workmen were to do their work. No doubt for all external scaffolding wooden poles, boards, and planks, fastened together by ropes in the ordinary way, are commonly used, because they are found to be most convenient; but they are not essential to the formation of external scaffolding, while for internal scaffolding it would for the most part be impossible to use such scaffolding in houses or buildings divided into rooms.

Possibly some day a question may arise whether an arrangement suspended from the ceiling, such as is often used for the interior of cathedrals, &c., is a scaffold within the Act. Old dictionary definitions, written more than a century ago, on such a subject are but of little use in these modern days, except to inform us as to the general character and use of a scaffold or scaffolding. For that purpose only I refer to an old dictionary published in 1754, composed by Dyche and Pardon, in which a scaffold is described as "a place erected above the ground with poles for walls and supports, and boards laid loosely for floors, to serve a present occasion of workmen's standing safe and easily to repair or build a house, church, &c., or for spectators to see a show, &c.," and "scaffolding" is defined as "the poles, boards, &c., that are kept or made use of to build or erect scaffolds upon any occasion."

In Walker's Dictionary, "scaffolding" is defined as "a support for workmen." Now, when section 7 speaks of "a building which is either being constructed or repaired by means of scaffolding," it obviously includes either external or internal work of construction or repair, and it contemplates a scaffolding being used for either, and it is noticeable that it speaks of workmen employed "on, in, or about" a building. The line between that which constitutes construction and that which constitutes repair is often a very fine one, and either may be needed either inside or outside a building. Brickwork may become defective, window or door sills may require to be taken down and replaced by new ones, beams supporting ceilings may give way, plastering may fall away from walls, &c., in any part of a building—for most of such works, whether of construction or repair, a scaffold of some kind is necessary. Outside the house, if the work to be done was high up, it might be most convenient to use a tall substantial one; inside, in rooms, a much smaller one would be all that was required, and that might be constructed in a variety of ways, and of any material or combination of materials suitable for the purposes. The size, height, and mechanism of it would, as a matter of fact, of course, depend upon the position in the building of the place needing construction, reconstruction, or repair, and a variety of circumstances impossible to anticipate, and which, therefore, I will not attempt to describe. A reference to decided cases will give some idea of what might and what could not satisfy the term "scaffolding." I will merely mention the most recent of them: Wood v. Walsh; Maude v. Brook; Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co.

In my opinion the structure in the case now before us may well be described as a scaffold within the meaning of section 7. I know that Collins, L.J., expressed a different opinion both in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. and in Maude v. Brook. In the latter case that learned judge summarizes his opinion thus: "The word 'scaffolding' as used in this Act indicates that there must be one system of scaffolding for the whole building which is capable of being used for its construction or repair as a whole." I cannot agree in this, for, were it so, it would be impossible to introduce into an ordinary room undergoing repair and requiring the use of a scaffold one adapted for the construction or repair of the whole building. I think the meaning of the Legislature was that from time to time, when work of construction or repair required the aid of a scaffold, any scaffold suitable for that particular purpose would be within the meaning of section 7. The scaffold used in the construction of the building as a whole had no connection with the accident in this case; it had ceased to exist months before the work on which the deceased was employed was even contemplated, and even had it been in existence, it would have been useless as regarded that work. Had there been no scaffold used in the construction of the original building I should have thought it immaterial to the present case, though it might have protected the employer against compensation for accidents happening during the construction of the original building. This scaffolding pointed to in section 7 must and could only reasonably apply to one used for the particular work in the course of being carried out when the accident occurred. In construing this section it must be remembered that the Act was only passed in 1897 (about three years ago), when an indefinite number of buildings exceeding thirty feet in height were in existence—some unsafe and requiring demolition, others badly constructed at first and requiring work of reconstruction; others from one cause or another falling into a state of deterioration and needing repairs to make them fit for future occupation. All these conditions must have been in the contemplation of the Legislature in framing the Act. When I realize to myself that the necessity for such works of construction or repairs may occur in all or any parts or part of the building, whether high up near the top or low down even to the foundations, and that such defects will in course of time inevitably make their appearance in the now newest buildings, and that such works, reconstruction, or repair will, when the defects cannot be reached by a man standing on the ground, require the assistance of a scaffold, I feel driven to the conclusion that the Act, with all its faults, in using the word "scaffolding" meant scaffolding suitable for the occasion, and could not have intended to confine it to such a scaffold as was capable of being used for the construction or repair of the building as a whole, which in a large majority of cases would be so inconvenient and costly as to be absurd.

For the reasons I have given, I think that this appeal should be allowed with the usual costs.

Lord LINDLEY.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal against an award made under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The facts of the case are not in all respects so clear as might be desired; but admissions were made by counsel on both sides, both before the Court of Appeal and at your lordships' bar, and with the assistance of those admissions the facts may be stated as follows.

Some time before the accident which gave rise to the claim for compensation, the London General Omnibus Co. had employed some builders to erect some large stables for them in Putney. Those stables had been erected and completed, according to the original design and specification, some five or six months before the time of the accident, and had been taken over and used by the omnibus company for stabling their horses.

The stables were constructed partly of brickwork and partly of iron. The ironwork consisted of upright pillars carrying transverse girders. There were two storeys, and the horses were stabled both on the ground floor and on the first floor. The height of this erection was twenty-eight feet from the ground to the top of the walls, and thirty-six feet to the ridge of the roof. None of the scaffolding used in the erection of the stables was standing when the accident happened. The defendants, Newton, Chambers, & Co., had not been employed in the erection of these stables.

After they had thus been completed and had been in use for stables, it was thought desirable to put in some iron stays in order to prevent vibration, and the defendants Newton, Chambers, & Co., were employed by the omnibus company to do this work. The stays were T angle iron bars twelve or fourteen feet long and about one hundredweight in weight. These were to be fastened by one end to the upright pillars on the ground floor and to the transverse girders carrying the first floor. The stays were put diagonally across the angles made by the pillars and girders, and they met, or nearly met, at the top. They thus stiffened the ironwork and stopped the vibration. The extent of the vibration is not proved; the cause of it is not proved; why it was desirable to stop it was not proved. There is no evidence whatever to show that the building was unsafe. It was stated before the coroner that the stays were put in "to stay the building so that the wind might not vibrate it." The evidence before the coroner was used by consent before the judge of the county court, and also before the Court of Appeal. But this is all that can now be ascertained as to the reason for putting in the stays. The inquiry is only important with reference to the question whether the building was being constructed when the accident happened. To this question I will return presently.

The stays were put up in the daytime, when there were few, if any, horses in the stables. The stays had to be lifted up into their proper places and held there for a short time whilst the places at which rivet-holes were to be made were marked. To enable the workmen to raise the stays to their places and to hold them there, platforms had to be constructed about eight feet above the ground floor; and in order to stable the horses at night these platforms had to be daily constructed when the stables were empty, and to be removed before the horses came in for the night. These platforms were made by placing ordinary loose planks carried by trestles and by ledgers laid across poles lashed to the pillars. These platforms are called scaffolds by all the witnesses who speak of them, and by the county court judge and by the members of the Court of Appeal. I so regard them; I do not know how better to describe them. I will consider presently whether they came within the meaning of a scaffolding as used in the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The husband of the plaintiff was on one end of these scaffolds lifting one end of a stay, whilst another man was lifting the other end. The plaintiff's husband overbalanced himself, or was overbalanced, and he fell from the scaffold and died shortly afterwards.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendants on the ground of negligence and defect in the scaffold; but the county court judge decided that the scaffold was not insufficient, and that the accident was not caused by insufficient scaffold. Thereupon an application was made for compensation under section 1, clause 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the county court judge heard such application, and decided that the defendants were "undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair of the stables." He further decided that the building exceeded thirty feet in height, and he awarded the plaintiff compensation to the amount of £245 14s., from which, however, the defendants' costs of the action were to be deducted. From this award the defendants appealed, and the Court of Appeal set aside the decision of the county court judge. From this decision the plaintiff has obtained leave to appeal in formâ pauperis to this House, and the appeal has been fully argued at your lordships' bar.

The case turns on sections 1, 7, clauses 1, 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and on the language there used with reference to buildings. The putting in of the stays was not an engineering work as defined in section 7. This observation is important, because in the case of an engineering work undertakers are defined to mean "the person undertaking the construction, alteration, or repair"; whilst in the case of a building, undertakers are defined to mean "the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition," the word alteration being omitted.

Confining ourselves to buildings, and interpolating the definition of undertakers of buildings, section 7, clause 1, makes the Act applicable, but only applicable, to employment by persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition of any building, of any person on, in, or about any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and is being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished. Now, I cannot bring myself to say that the defendants were persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition of these stables. Demolition may be disregarded; nothing was being demolished. Repair may also be disregarded: nothing was out of repair. Construction alone remains; but can it be fairly said that the defendants, who had nothing whatever to do with the erection of the stables, undertook the "construction" of them when they undertook to stop or diminish the vibration of which their owners complained? It is true that the stays were additions to portions of the structure of the stables, and in that way were additions to the stables. But constructing a building is one thing; improving it after it is constructed, even by making additions to its structure, is quite a different thing. I quite admit it may be very difficult to draw the line sharply in all cases between constructing a building and adding to its structure; but in this particular case I see no difficulty at all in coming to the conclusion that the defendants in this case did not undertake to construct this building, and were not undertakers within the meaning of the Act. I cannot bring them within the words of the definition. The fact that the word "alteration," which enters into the definition of undertakers of engineering works, is omitted from the definition of undertakers of buildings, is not to be overlooked, and it supports the conclusion at which I have arrived. If the omission were designed, it would support such conclusion very strongly. But the Act is very badly drawn, and it is scarcely safe to rely on the contrast between the two definitions. It is safer to rely on the fact that in the definition of undertakers of buildings nothing is said about additions, improvements, or alterations: and unless they can fairly be regarded as works of construction, repair, or demolition, the persons who undertake them are not undertakers as defined in section 7

The learned county court judge evidently failed to appreciate the difficulty created by the definition clause; for he introduced the word "alteration," and found that the defendants were undertaking the "construction, alteration, or repair." This finding was clearly insufficent to make them liable under the Act.

I pass now from the builders to the building itself. The Act does not apply to all buildings, but only to those which exceed thirty feet in height and are being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished, or on which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is being used for the purpose of the construction, repair, or demolition thereof. The words relating to the use of machinery have no application to the present case, and I therefore say nothing about them. The provisions relating to height and to the use of scaffolding refer to the time of the accident, and not to any time before or afterwards. The use of the present tense "which exceeds thirty feet," and "is either being constructed or repaired," &c., shows this; and the Court of Appeal so decided in Billings v. Holloway. Why thirty feet should have been adopted as the minimum height is not apparent, but that limit is adopted, and the only question is how the measurement is to be made. The county court judge and the Court of Appeal have both held that the height of the roof must be reckoned, and be added to the height of the walls, and this appears to me obviously correct.

The reference to scaffolding creates great difficulty. Sections 1 and 7 of the Act clearly extend to accidents which are not caused by defective scaffolding, and which are not in any way attributable to the use of scaffolding. If a house is thirty feet high, and is being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, and any workman is injured to the extent mentioned in section 1, clause 2*a*, by any accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on, in, or about such building, he is entitled to compensation, whatever the cause of such accident may have been, unless it arose from his own serious and wilful misconduct: see section 1, clause 2*c*. This seems plain from the language of sections 1 and 7, and has also been decided by the Court of Appeal in Maude v. Brook. But the use of a scaffolding is essential to bring a building being constructed or repaired within the Act where no machinery is employed to construct or repair it. What is meant by a scaffolding? Is any scaffolding meant? Is there any difference material to the present question between a scaffolding and a scaffold? There is nothing in the Act which requires the scaffolding to be of any particular description or dimensions, or to be in any particular place or of any particular height. I cannot help thinking that to make any distinction between one scaffolding and another, or between a scaffolding and a scaffold, would be to introduce a subtlety not required by the Act, and one far too fine for practical work. In my opinion, anything which can fairly be called a scaffold is a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7 if used as mentioned in the Act. This I understand to be the view adopted by the present Master of the Rolls and by Rigby, L.J. But a more restricted meaning is put on the word scaffolding by Collins, L.J. He thinks that boards on trestles inside a room are not, in point of law, a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act, and he did not consider the platforms in this case to be such a scaffolding. He thinks that nothing can be a scaffolding within the Act except "one system of scaffolding for the whole building, which is capable of being used for its construction or repair as a whole." I cannot go so far. I cannot say that boards on trestles, even inside a room, may not be a scaffolding, and still less can I say that the platforms in question in this case could not be so regarded if used as mentioned in the Act. This question of scaffolding is one of such importance, and it was so much discussed at your lordships' bar, that I have thought it desirable to allude to it, and to express my own opinion upon it.

But although I think the platform in this case might have been a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7. and that the stables were a building more than thirty feet high, yet, for reasons already stated, I cannot come to the conclusion that such building was being constructed or repaired when the accident happened.

The Act, therefore, has no application to this case. It does not apply either to the defendants or to the building at the time of the accident.

The appeal ought, in my judgment, to be dismissed.

Order of the Court of Appeal reversed, and award of the county court judge restored. The respondent to pay the appellant her costs in the courts below and in this House, costs in this House to be taxed in the manner usual when the appellant sues in formâ pauperis. Case remitted to the county court.

SHUTTLEWORTH v. MURRAY. (a.)

Will—Construction—"Eldest son" entitled to possession.

A will limited successive estates to the sons of A. other than and except an eldest or only son for the time being entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the C. estate. A son became entitled as tenant in tail in remainder of the C. estate, and, before becoming entitled to possession, joined with his father, the tenant for life, in a sale, from which he derived a benefit.

Held, that the words of the exception must bear their natural meaning, and that the son, not coming within those words, was not excluded from taking under the will.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. ([1900] 1 Ch. 795, 48 W. R. Dig. 205), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., of the 29th of March, 1900.

By his will dated the 29th of January, 1855, Edmund Grimshaw devised his real estates in the county of Lancaster, after the death of his nephews, Richard Atkinson and F. F. Brandt, to whom he gave successive life estates, to the use of all and every the son and sons of the said F. F. Brandt who should be born in the testator's lifetime or in due time after, and all and every the son or sons of the said Richard Atkinson then living and who should be born in the testator's lifetime or in due time after (other than and except an eldest or only son for the time being entitled to the possession or to the receipt of the rents, issues, and profits of certain estates situate within the parish of Cockerham, in the said county of Lancaster, after the decease of the said Richard Atkinson as tenant for life or any greater estate or interest whatsoever) severally and successively in remainder one after another and as between each branch as they and every of them should be in seniority of age and priority of birth, but as between the two branches alternately and turn by turn and their assigns during their several and respective lives without impeachment of waste, the eldest or only one of such sons or son of the said F. F. Brandt taking the first turn, and the eldest or only one of such sons or son of the said R. Atkinson (other than and except as aforesaid) taking the next turn, and so successively changing from one branch to another. With limitations over, under which, in the events which happened, the remainder in fee became vested in Richard Atkinson.

The testator died in 1875. F. F. Brandt died in the lifetime of the testator without having married. Richard Atkinson had several children, the eldest of whom, Richard Norton Atkinson, was born in 1847.

At the date of the disentailing assurance mentioned below R. Atkinson was tenant for life, and R. N. Atkinson tenant in tail in remainder of the Cockerham estate.

By a disentailing deed dated the 16th of January, 1869, the Cockerham estate was limited to such uses as the said R. Atkinson and R. N. Atkinson should jointly appoint.

By a deed dated the 19th of January, 1869, the estate was jointly appointed by the father and the son to trustees upon trust for sale, and trusts were declared of the purchase-money under which the son took certain benefits.

The estate was subsequently sold by the trustees who received the purchase-money.

In 1870 R. N. Atkinson became bankrupt, and his interest in the purchase-money and his interest under the testator's will were acquired by his father R. Atkinson from the trustee in bankruptcy.

Richard Atkinson died recently, and this summons was taken out to determine whether R. N. Atkinson was excluded under the exception of an eldest son for the time being entitled to the possession of the Cockerham estate.

Cozens-Hardy, J., held that he was so excluded, and that his next surviving brother was entitled to the rents and profits of the devised estates

From this decision the persons entitled to the interest of R. N. Atkinson now appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Macnaghten, K.C., and Hon. T. H. Watson, for the persons entitled to the interest of R. N. Atkinson.

Swinfen Eady, K.C., Vernon Smith, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for the second son of Richard Atkinson.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—RIGBY, L.J., after reading the material parts of the will as set forth above said, before saying anything as to the construction of the will he would refer to some of the facts. The Cockerham estates in 1869 stood limited to R. Atkinson for life with remainder to his son R. N. Atkinson in tail. R. N. Atkinson was born in 1847 and soon after coming of age he concurred with his father in disentailing the property and appointing it to trustees upon trust for sale. The trustees sold the property, the sale taking place before the bankruptcy of R. N. Atkinson in 1870. The Cockerham estates were therefore held by strangers and had gone away completely from the Atkinson family. Looking at the reasonableness of R. N. Atkinson ever having been in possession there was not the slightest ground for saying that he was ever in enjoyment of the property. Of course he might have repurchased the estate and resettled it, but nothing of the sort took place. In 1870 R. N. Atkinson became bankrupt, and all he then had, which was an interest in the proceeds of sale of the property, was purchased by his father. The son therefore at that time had no interest in the property in any sense of the word and at that time the will of the testator had not then taken effect as an operating instrument. Referring again to the words "entitled to possession, &c.," his lordship thought that the words of exception should be read as if transposed and as if they followed the words "entitled to possession, &c," That would make a great distinction between this and the other cases cited. His lordship said he was quite unable to follow the reasoning of the learned judge in the court below, who seemed to have thought that the words of exception were technical words which had received an accepted construction for many years. His lordship differed, however, entirely from that view, and was of opinion that they were not technical words, but plain English words, and that they had never been construed as technical words by any court down to the present time. True it was that words in some respects resembling them had received an interpretation different from the natural and primâ facie meaning, but that was done under an overriding constraint of intention. But these words were never held to be technical words. With regard to the cases discussed by the learned judge: where there is a disposition of property by a parent and a gift of an estate to one child and a gift of portions to other children—in that class of cases it has always been held that the intention was that a child should not take both the estate and a portion. If there are exceptional cases which go beyond that proposition they did not apply here. In some cases liberty had been taken with the language used and a very wide interpretation placed upon it which was hardly justified by the rule as to the paramount intention of the parties The case of Collingwood v. Stanhope, 17 W. R. 537, L. R. 4 H. L. 43, was, it need hardly be said, a case of great authority, and must be followed in its real meaning, but it did not apply to the present case and had not the slightest tendency to support the judgment of the court below. The case of Fazakerly v. Ford, 4 Sim. 390, was one in which a use in favour of a certain person was sought to be displaced, and the learned judge there said you ought to give the words their strict, that is, their natural meaning. Now here there was not strictly the substitution of one use for another, but the present case came precisely within Fazakerly v. Ford, as explained in Collingwood v. Stanhope in the House of Lords. This was not the case of a person in loco parentis making provision that the eldest son should have the estate and the younger children portions. There was nothing of the sort here. In the present case there was no gift to a class and no period for distribution, and arguments based on a gift to class or on distribution were therefore unfounded. Another case referred to was the case of Domvile v. Winnington, 32 W. R. 699, 26 Ch. D. 382, in which Kay, J., made some observations upon which Cozens-Hardy, J., seems to have relied, but those observations were not necessary for the decision of that case and were mere obiter dicta. He merely said that if the case had arisen he might have decided in a certain way. The words of exception in the present case must bear their primary and natural meaning, and as the said R. N. Atkinson did not come within those words, he could not be deprived of his succession. The decision of the court below was therefore wrong and ought to be reversed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said he arrived at the same result, though not without some hesitation. He took it as fixed law that with regard to family settlements it was a rule that what had been called "a prodigious latitude of construction" was to be allowed. The rule, however, with regard to persons in loco parentis had no application at all to the present case. That rule had no application outside family cases as laid down in the case of Sandeman v. Mackenzie, 1 J. & H. 613, 628. He therefore approached this will minded to construe it as deduced from the words within the four corners of the document. The rule that there is to be equality among children was not an arbitrary rule, but an instance where the court would depart from the primary meaning of the words to give effect to an overriding intention. Although it was a stereotyped rule that you must deduce the intention of the testator from the words of the will itself, the general principle applies to all documents, unless from the document itself and the surrounding circumstances you come to the conclusion that the author of the document had an obvious intention to depart from the primary meaning. He looked about to see if the words of the exception would give effect to an intention which was so inherently probable, and to see whether the words were sufficiently ambiguous to give effect to the intention which his lordship was disposed to attribute to the testator. But having looked at the words, they were too strong for him, and they must be read in their natural sense. Reading them in that sense R. N. Atkinson did not come within them, and was not therefore excluded.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed.—The object in all these cases, as explained in Collingwood v. Stanhope, was that no one child should obtain a double portion. There was, however, a great body of authority showing that the rule only applied where the provision was made by a parent or person in loco parentis. That was shown by Scarisbrick v. Skelmersdale, 17 Sim. 187, Sandeman v. Mackenzie, 1 J. & H. 613 and other cases. In Scarisbrick v. Skelmersdale, 4 Y. & C. Ex. 117, it was said: "It is not every act done by a parent which is to be construed on principles different from those which would have been applied if the same thing had been done by a stranger, but only those acts which the parent does in fulfilment of some natural duty. Now, though it is a natural duty incumbent on a parent to provide for his children, and in doing so to use language which will secure some provision for all, it certainly is no natural duty to cause estates to shift in one course of succession rather than another." Accordingly, in the present case the ordinary meaning of the words must prevail. The testator did not stand in loco parentis to R. Atkinson or his children. Coming to the words of exception, the words "for the time being" ought to be read in connection with the son for the time being. The person excepted was to be not only an eldest son but entitled to possession. Those words point to a natural enjoyment of the estate. But at the time the eldest son had not the enjoyment, and did not therefore fall within the words of the exception. The testator simply considered that a son in possession did not require bounty. The decision must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

STACEY v. HILL. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Landlord and tenant—Rent guaranteed by third party—Bankruptcy of lessee—Disclaimer of lease by trustee—Liability of surety after date of disclaimer—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 55 (2).

Where a lessee for a term of years becomes bankrupt, and his trustee disclaims the lease under section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the term, as between the lessor and the lessee, is put an end to; and, therefore, a surety for the payment of the rent under the lease is released from his liability under the guarantee as and from the date of the disclaimer, there being no rent due from the lessee after that date.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Phillimore, J., who tried the action without a jury.

The action was brought under ord. 14, r. 8, by the plaintiff, a solicitor at Sheffield, against the defendant, a jewellery manufacturer, of Coventry, as surety for the payment to the plaintiff of rent from time to time due to the plaintiff from one Thomas Chapman for premises No. 34, High-street, Sheffield, under the guarantee in writing of the defendant dated the 15th of November, 1898, hereinafter set out.

The facts were as follow:

The plaintiff was the owner of the above-mentioned premises at Sheffield, and on the 15th of November, 1898, he let them on lease for a term of five years from the 25th of December, 1898, to Chapman at the yearly rent of £280.

At the time the lease was granted, and in consideration thereof, the defendant gave the plaintiff the following guarantee:

"15th of November, 1898.—In consideration of your granting the lease of the premises 34, High-street, Sheffield, to Mr. Thomas Chapman, of Hull, I hereby guarantee the payment of so much rent as may be from time to time in arrear for twenty-one days to a sum not exceeding £140. This guarantee to remain in force concurrently with the lease for a period of five years from the 25th day of December next."

On the 3rd of November, 1899, a receiving order was made against Chapman, who was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, and a trustee of his estate appointed.

On the 15th of February, 1900, the trustee disclaimed the lease. Beyond the fact that the clerk to the trustee in bankruptcy left the key of the premises at the office of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had advertised them to let, there was no evidence that the plaintiff had resumed possession of the premises, which had remained locked up.

The defendant paid the rent of the premises down to the 25th of December, 1899, and admitted his liability, and offered to pay £40 10s., the proportionate part of the rent from that date to the 15th of February, 1900, the date of the disclaimer, but denied liability to pay any rent accruing after that date.

The action was brought to recover £70, a quarter's rent due on the 25th of March, 1900, when the defendant paid £40 10s. into court, and pleaded section 55 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Phillimore, J., found as a fact that the plaintiff had not resumed possession of the premises. But he arrived at the conclusion that the effect of the disclaimer was to release the lessee from liability to pay rent, and that as the defendant's guarantee only extended to the payment of rent in arrear, there was no liability under the guarantee for any rent after the disclaimer. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Sylvain Mayer, for the plaintiff.—Under section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883,* the defendant is liable for the whole quarter's rent, as the disclaimer does not affect the rights or liabilities of any person except so far as is necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability. That is expressly provided by the last clause of sub-section 2. So far as regards the liability of the surety the lease must be deemed to be still in existence and the rent as still accruing. The object of the Act was not to put the surety in a better position than if the lessee had not become bankrupt. The liability of the defendant under his guarantee, therefore, still continues, and his remedy is to prove against the bankrupt's estate: Harding v. Preece, 9 Q. B. D. 281, 30 W. R. Dig. 23; Ex parte Walton. In re Levy, 17 Ch. D. 746, 29 W. R. Dig. 26; Hill v. East and West India Dock Co., 32 W. R. 925, 9 App. Cas. 448; In re Finley, Ex parte Clothworkers Co., 37 W. R. 6, 21 Q. B. D. 475.

Montague Lush, for the defendant.—By the disclaimer the term has come to an end and no rent can be said to be accruing after that date. By the guarantee the defendant has expressly limited the duration of his liability by the words "concurrently with the lease." In Hill v. East and West India Dock Co. the decision of the House of Lords turned upon the disclaimer section in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. In that section the words were that the property disclaimed should be deemed to have been surrendered, and therefore, as a matter of fact, the term was not put an end to by the statute. By the later Act, section 55 (2), the term as between the lessor and lessee is destroyed outright. If the surety remained liable then the bankrupt lessee would be liable too, by a roundabout process if you will, for the landlord would in fact get the rent after the disclaimer out of him first by getting it out of the surety, who, in his turn, would prove for it against the bankrupt's estate (see judgment of Watkin Williams, J., in Preece v. Harding, and that of Lord Lindley in In re

* By section 55 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "Where any part of the property of the bankrupt consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants, of shares or stock in companies, of unprofitable contracts, or of any other property that is unsaleable, or not readily saleable by reason of its binding the possessor thereof to the performance of any onerous act, or to the payment of any sum of money, the trustee . . . may, by writing signed by him, at any time within three months after the first appointment of a trustee disclaim the property. Provided that where any such property shall not have come to the knowledge of the trustee within one month after such appointment he may disclaim such property at any time within two months after he first became aware thereof."

By sub-section 2: "The disclaimer shall operate to determine, as from the date of disclaimer, the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt and his property in or in respect of the property disclaimed, and shall also discharge the trustee from all personal liability in respect of the property disclaimed as from the date when the property vested in him; but shall not, except so far as is necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability, affect the rights or liabilities of any other person."

Finley); a landlord they held could not after disclaimer prove for future rent. If the plaintiff's contention is correct he is entitled after the disclaimer to re-enter and let the premises and to collect the rent from the surety of the late lessee at one and the same time. The lease having gone, the liability of the surety has also gone.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case we have to decide what is the effect of the disclaimer upon the defendant's liability under his guarantee. My brother Phillimore held, and, I think, rightly held, that the effect of the disclaimer was to end the term as between the plaintiff and the lessee, and, therefore, as no rent after the date of the disclaimer could accrue, the surety was no longer bound. That being so, the learned judge held that the defendant could not be called upon under his guarantee for alleged arrears of rent after the date of the disclaimer. We have listened to a learned argument as to the difference between the Bankruptcy Acts of 1869 and 1883 from Mr. Montague Lush. I am not going into that question, and for this reason: The present case seems to me to be concluded by the decision of this court in In re Finley, Ex parte The Clothworkers' Co., where the judgment of the court, consisting of Lord Esher, the present Lord Lindley, and Lord Bowen, was delivered by Lord Lindley. In dealing with the effect of section 55 of the Act of 1883, Lord Lindley said the operation of those clauses in the simple case of a lease is not very difficult to ascertain. If there is nothing more than a lease, and the lessee becomes bankrupt, the disclaimer terminates his interest in the lease under sub-section 2. He gets rid of all his liabilities, and loses all his rights, by reason of the disclaimer. There is no need of any provision for vesting the property in the landlord, but the natural and legal effect of sub-section 2 is that the reversion will become accelerated." In other words, the meaning of the words "the disclaimer shall operate to determine as from the date of the disclaimer the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt" in sub-section 2 is that the term is put an end to altogether as between lessor and lessee. If the lease be therefore terminated by the disclaimer, how can any rent after the disclaimer is made become due from the lessee to the lessor? Clearly no rent can be due. The term having been terminated, the reversion is accelerated, and the lessor again enters into possession of the premises. This is also to the advantage of the lessor, for once in possession he is in a position to let to another tenant at any rent the land will command. Having thus ascertained the position of the lessor and the lessee after the date of the disclaimer, what is the position under the new set of circumstances of the surety? The liability of the lessee has ceased. Is the liability of the surety to the lessor kept alive? If it is, then he should be able to prove against the bankrupt's estate. If the surety is liable to pay to the lessor the rent due after the disclaimer, and is entitled to prove, and does prove, against the bankrupt's estate, how does the disclaimer release the bankrupt or his estate from the liability to pay rent? The guarantee was on the face of it a guarantee for the payment of so much rent as might be from time to time in arrear. In my opinion, for the reasons I have above stated, after the disclaimer there can be no rent demanded, and therefore no rent in arrear. There is also another ground upon which this case might be put. There was a special stipulation in the guarantee that the guarantee should remain in force "concurrently with the lease." The lease having been put an end to, it might well have been argued that under this stipulation the guarantee had also gone. I am content to rest my judgment on the same ground that my brother Phillimore did, and therefore it is unnecessary for me to do more than point out this alternative reason why, in my judgment, this appeal fails.

OLIVER v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Principal and agent—Power of attorney—Transfer of stock—Forged signature—Implied authority—Stockbroker—Liability—Indemnity.

A stockbroker who executes a transfer of stock as attorney under a power impliedly warrants that he is the duly authorized agent of the stockholder. If this is a misstatement of fact, even though honestly made in ignorance of the true state of facts—as, for instance, if a signature on the power has been forged without the knowledge of the stockbroker—he is nevertheless liable for any loss thereby occasioned.

This was an action claiming a declaration that transfers of a sum of £2,633 12s. 6d. Consols and a sum of £147 5s. 4d. Bank of England Stock, to which the plaintiff was entitled as surviving trustee, were void because the plaintiff's signature to the power of attorney under which the transfer was made was forged.

The plaintiff also claimed a declaration that the bank was bound to replace the stocks, and pay the back dividends, or pay the value and interest at 4 per cent., and an order to that effect.

In consequence of this the bank claimed by third-party notice from Messrs. Starkey, Levison, & Cooke, who or some of whom had claimed to act and had acted on the powers of attorney, to be indemnified by them and each of them against all loss which might accrue to the bank by reason of the transfers of stock, or any payment the bank might be ordered to make in the action and against all costs, and claiming judgment accordingly.

Prior to December 1897, the above-mentioned Consols and bank stock were standing in the books of the bank in the names of the plaintiff Edgar Oliver and his brother F. W. Oliver as trustees.

F. W. Oliver was a solicitor who had been acting for the trustees in these matters.

In December, 1897, Messrs. Starkey, Levison, & Cooke, stockbrokers, who usually acted for F. W. Oliver, received instructions from him to apply for a power of attorney for the sale of the Consols. This was obtained and forwarded for execution to F. W. Oliver. He returned the power, which purported to be signed and executed by himself and the plaintiff, and appointed William John Starkey and Edward John Levison attorneys for the purpose of selling and transferring the Consols. W. J. Starkey, however, alone demanded to act on the power, and did so act.

On the 23rd of December, 1897, the bank, acting under this power, transferred the Consols into the names of other persons. Before acting on this power the bank, following their usual plan, compared the signatures with other genuine ones of the trustees in their possession, and also wrote to the trustees informing them of the proposed sale.

The plaintiff Edgar Oliver had never signed the power; his name had been forged to it; a wrong address had been given so that the letter from the bank had never reached him, and he was ignorant of the whole transaction.

On the 8th of March, 1898, the bank transferred the Bank Stock to other persons under precisely similar circumstances.

On the 7th of July, 1899, F. W. Oliver died, and the plaintiff for the first time heard of these transactions. He thereupon brought this action against the bank, and they claimed by third-party notice to be indemnified by Messrs. Starkey, Levison, & Cooke on the representations made in the powers and the transfers that they were authorized by the trustees and on the implied warranty that the signatures were genuine.

The stockbrokers denied making any representations as to their authority, and claimed that the bank had relied on their own inquiries, having examined the signatures by experts and passed them as genuine, and by notifying the holders by letter that such a power had been lodged.

At the trial of the action the forgery of the plaintiff's name on the powers was proved and judgment given for him in the terms of the statement of claim.

The claim of the bank against the stockbrokers was then proceeded with.

Warrington, K.C., and R. M. Pattisson, for the plaintiff.

H. D. Greene, K.C., Latham, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the bank.—There was a breach of warranty and authority. The loss was occasioned by the brokers having dealt solely with one of the trustees, the solicitor, and doing nothing to ascertain that the plaintiff had in fact executed the power. They ignored him, and the loss was occasioned by this carelessness. The application for the power was a representation by the firm that they were authorized by the plaintiff. There was a breach of warranty by Starkey acting on behalf of his firm. The firm received and paid over the money to F. W. Oliver alone. All the partners of the firm are rightly added as defendants, and they are jointly and severally liable to the bank, which is entitled to be indemnified by them against the loss: Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 E. & B. 647; Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, 35 W. R. 92, 18 Q. B. D. 54.

Swinfen Eady, K.C., P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Stewart Smith, for the brokers.—The bank did not rely on any warranty by the brokers but tested the genuineness of the signatures themselves both by comparing them with others in their possession and by writing to the stockholders that a power had been lodged. It is only after the bank has satisfied itself by these tests that they act on the power. This custom is well known, and the bank cannot be heard to say that the brokers impliedly warrant when they really rely on their own tests: Halbot v. Lens, ante, p. 214, [1901] 1 Ch. 344. Where the fact is equally within the knowledge of both parties, the agent is not liable for an honest misrepresentation: Smout v. Ilbery, 10 M. & W. 1. In Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 114, the case of a forged power of attorney is mentioned as an instance where the agent would not be liable.

KEKEWICH, J.—I need not trouble you Mr. Greene. This is a case of considerable importance affecting a very large class of persons. It affects through the defendants the whole class of brokers, and it affects through the bank very large bodies as well as those who are concerned in transfers of stocks and shares, for instance, large railway companies, such as the London and North-Western Railway Co. by way of example. Therefore I repeat it is a case of considerable importance. But to my mind the whole question is a very simple one; it may be difficult, but it is a very simple one of law, and of law only. On the admitted facts—that is to say, the facts which are really common to both parties—there is no question of fact at all, and I, though others may think differently, think a great many of the facts which have been put in evidence, might without disadvantage have been wholly omitted. I will not say more. The law which I have to apply is laid down in many cases, but I think I need only refer to one or two. Take the statement from the judgment given by Willes, J., in Collen v. Wright, in 8 E. & B. 647, where he says at p. 657, "I am of opinion that a person who induces another to contract with him as the agent of a third party by an unqualified assertion of his being authorized to act as such agent, is answerable to the person who so contracts for any damages which he may sustain by reason of the assertion of authority being untrue." That is explained a little lower down on the same page thus: "The obligation arising in such a case is well expressed by saying that a person professing to contract as agent for another impliedly, if not expressly, undertakes or promises the person who enters into such contract, upon the faith of the professed agent being duly authorized, that the authority which he professes to have, does, in point of fact, exist." Now the same doctrine is enunciated in a much later case than that, certainly thirty years later, in Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys, in the Court of Appeal, where Lord Esher expresses the doctrine on p. 60. I will only read one passage: "The rule to be deduced is that where a person by asserting that he has the authority of the principal induces another person to enter into any transaction which he would not have entered into but for that assertion, and the assertion turns out to be untrue, to the injury of the person to whom it is made, it must be taken that the person making it undertook that it was true, and he is liable personally for the damage that has occurred." The present Lord Lindley, then a member of the Court of Appeal, expresses it on p. 62 tersely, if I may venture to say so, "Where an agent assumes an authority which he does not possess, and induces another to deal with him upon the faith that he has the authority which he assumes." But he says that is an exception to the rule that an action for damages will not lie against the person who honestly makes a misrepresentation which misleads another. Now that is the law which it seems to me I have to apply, and I have to apply it to the very short facts of this case. I propose to dispose of it entirely on one point, which, strictly speaking, is not pleaded, but which seems to me to be far more important than any of the other points which are put forward. On the 25th of December, 1897, and the 5th of March, 1898, respectively Mr. Starkey purported to transfer in the bank books two sums of Consols and Bank of England Stock, which could only be transferred by his signing in the books, as the attorney for the transferors, the transfers of course being made out in the ordinary form as transferred by the stockholders—that is to say, the persons who were the owners of the stock in the bank books. That, to my mind, is a complete representation by him that he transfers as the attorney of the two Olivers—in other words, that he is a person authorized to transfer in their name. One need not pause to consider whether that is a contract within the meaning of Collen v. Wright, which applies to contract only, though I myself have no doubt that the principle of Collen v. Wright could not be confined to cases of contract in the strict sense of the word; but the other case which I cited, and which I cited mainly for that purpose, of Firbank's Executors v. Humphreys shows that the principle of Collen v. Wright is applied to a transaction which may or may not be contracted, and the transaction in this case comes within the decision. Now, unless there is some answer to that in the arguments which I have heard on behalf of Mr. Starkey, it follows that Mr. Starkey is liable, on that principle, by an implied contract, to make good the loss which the bank have sustained by acting on those transfers and allowing the stock to pass into the name of other holders, and which at the suit of the plaintiff in the principal action they have been ordered to make good. The first objection is that Mr. Starkey behaved honestly—that is to say, he behaved honestly in the belief that he had the authority of those principals in whose name he purported to act. That he did honestly believe it nobody could possibly doubt, and he is acquitted of anything approaching improper intent, or really, according to the ordinary course of business, neglect of due precaution, though of course in the ordinary course of business precautions are neglected which might with advantage and with a view to perfect safety be taken. But he says he honestly believed it. Mr. Swinfen Eady cited me Smout v. Ilbery and Polhill v. Walter as authorities to show that that honest belief excuses him. I doubt whether either of those cases go to that length. There is certainly an expression in the judgment in Smout v. Ilbery which tends strongly in that direction, to say the least. Polhill v. Walter, I think, may possibly be explained by the peculiar character of the pleadings. I doubt whether the judgment means more than that the defendant would not be liable on the pleadings in that case. But those cases are old, in the sense that there are modern cases which have dealt with the principle, and which have made no such exception, and it is to be observed that Lord Lindley, in the passage which I have just quoted, says this: "Speaking generally, an action for damages will not lie against a person who honestly makes a misrepresentation which misleads another." And then he makes the exception which I read, and which I must read again, "Where an agent assumes an authority which he does not possess, and induces another to deal with him upon the faith that he has the authority which he assumes." He says that is an exception from the rule that the man is not liable who honestly makes the representation. It follows as a matter of course that the exception covers the whole of the rule, and that the person who honestly makes the representation, but so as to come within the exception that Lord Lindley lays down, is liable for that misrepresentation. But if that were not so I should have no difficulty in saying that these later cases, apart from any direct statement by any of the judges, go further and expound the law more fully than it is expounded in Smout v. Ilbery and Polhill v. Walter, and that the authority of those later cases must be upheld as against the others, and that may possibly be referable to improved forms of pleadings. There may have been (I do not profess to say there were) very great difficulties in such a form of action as I am now considering in the time of those two other cases. Then the other objection, and there is only one other, is that the bank knew as much as Mr. Starkey knew himself, or, at any rate, that they had the means of knowing. To a great extent that was true. It is possible, of course, that Mr. Starkey might have taken means to verify the signature of his principal, but the bank might have had the means, also, if they had chosen to follow it out. The answer to that is, that they are not bound to do anything of the kind. How far they are bound to verify the signature to the execution of a power of attorney I do not pause to consider, but they certainly are not bound as between themselves and the person who demands to act under the power of attorney, to see that that power of attorney has been properly executed. In discharge of their public duties they would probably think, as they always have thought, that it is not right to take the risk without all precautions that are possible, but they may throw the risk on the agent who comes, and leave it to him to justify his position if unfortunately it is necessary to do so. Then it is said that all this was known to these stockbrokers, and it is the practice of stockbrokers to rely on the bank, and they know that the bank take these precautions, and therefore the stockbrokers are content to leave the bank to take all the precautions which they always do, and which they did in this particular case. A great deal that the bank does in that way, as explained by the witnesses, is obviously work of supererogation, and they are not bound to do it, and they are certainly not bound to tell the stockbroker, and as a matter of fact they do not, because one witness particularly, the gentleman who was a member of the committee of the Stock Exchange, was very careful to say that he only knew of what was done externally. He does not know, the bank does not tell him, the bank would not be right in telling him, all that takes place within the walls of the bank itself. That is no excuse. According to the authorities Mr. Starkey has honestly misrepresented a fact, he has honestly misstated that he was the duly authorized agent of the two stockholders for the purpose of transferring those stocks. It is unfortunate for him that it turns out to be untrue, but according to the law of England, as settled by the cases to which I have referred, he is liable for that misrepresentation in point of fact But the bank have not been content to sue Mr. Starkey, who executed the transfer, but they endeavoured to make liable his two partners, and though it matters of course not a whit, because Mr. Starkey no doubt acted as one of the firm, and if he is liable no doubt that will set itself right as between himself and his partners, still I have to consider whether any relief can be granted against the others. To my mind the others were improperly made defendants. That fortunately has not added to the costs, and I do not think any relief can be granted against them. I am not proposing to go back to an exposition of the law. I shall take that for granted now. But let us apply it to what happened. The first thing that took place was that Mr. Starkey and his two partners together applied for a power of attorney, they all applied for it, and if it could be maintained that they were liable through a misrepresentation in doing that, they all three made a misrepresentation, and they all three would be liable. But what is the action which we are considering, because I am treating it as if it were an entirely independent action, as perhaps it strictly ought to have been, though we are conveniently disposing of it on what is called a third-party notice? It is in action on an implied warranty, and all the cases lay down without exception that the remedy against the agent—that is to say, the person who has purported to act as agent when he had no authority, is on that implied warranty which has injured the plaintiff, and in the action you can only recover those damages which have been suffered by reason of the breach of the implied warranty or implied contract—it is immaterial which. Even if you could maintain an action technically without alleging and proving the damages incurred, at any rate, you would get no relief. What they might do in the King's Bench Division beyond depriving the plaintiff of the costs I know not. I certainly should not hesitate if I had a case of that kind to make the plaintiff pay the defendant's costs of the action. It is impossible to suggest with any intelligence that this application alone did the bank any harm, or caused them any injury at all. It is not really put forward in that way. What has been attempted to be done is to link them together, and then to ground an action on each of them considered with respect to the other. But that, I think, is a fallacious way of treating an implied warranty. You must find your implied warranty in one document, or in one act, and sue upon that, or you can put the two together and say they are one. That may be, but you cannot take three or four together and say, "They make an implied warranty, and now I will sue on each of the three or four portions." That seems to me entirely wrong. Now nothing happened on this at all. The application was made for the power, and the power was issued. It might very well have stopped there. I venture to say, that if it had stopped there, not only, of course, would there have been no action, but that if any fanciful person had endeavoured to found an action on that, it might have been got rid of in a very speedy way. The next step is that the power is supplied, and the power is made out in the name of Mr. Starkey and Mr. Levison. The application was only for the two, so we have nothing to do with the other partner there. Then the power came, and then the demand to act on the power by Mr. Starkey alone. Here I have not to consider the question of the others, but going back to the power again, though it was part of the history of the case, and though it was necessary that it should be proved here undoubtedly, and we should know all about it, still it led to no action itself. The whole transaction might have stopped there. In fact part of the defendant's case is that it ought to have stopped there, and the bank ought to have found out the power was a bad one, and at any rate there was no warranty there which led to any damages, and no damages could possibly be recovered. But besides that we have what is called the transfer ticket, which is the mere form apparently, a step in the transaction, and that is signed in each case by Starkey and of his partners—that is to say, the other partner, who was the other attorney in the power. I will not at length repeat what I have said, but nothing came of it. It was a step in the whole transaction, and it is necessary to be borne in mind; but it is only a step in the whole transaction, and it is quite impossible to sue for damages on that. It appears to me that an action founded on this—and those are the only real cases of misrepresentation which are alleged in the statement of claim—must inevitably have failed. But the statement of claim points out, though it does not state, that the transfer was executed by this gentleman Mr. Starkey as attorney, and having executed as attorney, I think he is liable on that ground. Therefore, of course, the whole question is here whether Mr. Starkey is liable or not, and it matters not whether one member of the firm or the whole of the three members of the firm are liable. I do not think that making only one liable ought to make any difference in the costs of what I will call the action. Mr. Starkey must pay to the bank all that the bank are bound to pay to the plaintiff in the original action, including, of course, the costs of which they have been ordered to pay, and they must beyond that pay the costs of this third-party notice.

WALKER v. DUNCOMBE. (a.)

Infant — Accumulation — Maintenance—Mansion-house —Subscription to charities.

Where a testator directs payment of an annual sum for the maintenance and education of a tenant for life, or in tail, and directs accumulation of the residue for his benefit if he shall attain full age, and, in the event of his death, on specified trusts,

The court has jurisdiction to allow the expenditure of a larger annual sum if, on the true construction of the will, there is a paramount intention which authorizes it.

This was an originating summons in which Sir Robert James Milo Walker, an infant suing by his next friend, was plaintiff, and the trustees of the will of Sir James Walker were defendants, to have a sum of £4,000 a year paid to the mother of the plaintiff to enable an establishment to be kept up at Sand Hutton Hall, where the plaintiff and his three brothers might reside.

Davenport, for the trustees and the younger sons.

FARWELL, J.—The testator, Sir James Walker, was the great grandfather of the present plaintiff, who is an infant and tenant in tail in possession under the limitations contained in the will. His father and his grandfather died in 1899 and 1900 respectively. The testator died in 1883. This is an application asking that the trustees may be permitted to expend some £4,000 a year in keeping up Sand Hutton, the mansion-house on the property, and paying the mother of the infant plaintiff a sum of money to enable an establishment to be kept up at Sand Hutton, where the infant tenant in tail, who is now ten years old, and his three brothers may reside. The estate was a very large one, and I am told it appears in the evidence that it is about £11,000 or £12,000 a year in land, and some half a million or so in personalty, which is given by a codicil to be invested in the purchase of land to be settled to similar uses to those devised by the will. I should have mentioned that the will directs the settlement to be made, but inasmuch as it sets out very fully the provisions which are to be contained in the settlement, and the settlement is, I am told, practically a copy of the powers in the will. I am dealing only with the words as contained in the will. The testator directs that during the minority of every person entitled, either as a tenant for life or in tail by purchase to the possession of the freeholds the trustees may manage the hereditaments, and receive the rents and profits, and make any new or additional buildings, fences, plantations, or other improvements thereon as the trustees shall think proper and most advantageous for the same hereditaments, and the persons interested therein, and to apply for such purposes accordingly any part of the rents and profits of the hereditaments, and so on.

Then there is a provision for £500 a year for the maintenance, education, or benefit of the minor until he attains eighteen, and £600 a year after eighteen, and a direction to accumulate the residue for the benefit of such tenant for life or in tail as aforesaid, if he or she shall attain full age; but if he or she shall die under that age, then to hold all investments and accumulations of surplus rents during his or her minority, upon the trusts therein directed concerning the moneys to arise from any sale of the settled estates.

It is obvious that £500 a year is wholly inadequate to keep up Sand Hutton. There is a general power of leasing in the will which does not exclude the mansion-house; but there is one element of evidence to show that the testator regarded Sand Hutton as the family mansion-house, because there is a request in his will that his son would reside at Sand Hutton.

The question that I have to consider is whether I have any jurisdiction on the true construction of the will to authorize the trustees to make this expenditure, which is larger than that which is mentioned in the will. I decline to accept any suggestion that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to alter a man's will because it thinks it beneficial. It seems to me that is quite impossible; but on the true construction of the will it is open to the court to have regard to what has been called sometimes the paramount intention, and which I think is what is pointed at by Lord Hardwicke and Pearson, J., in the cases I have before me. The case of Revel v. Watkinson was a very strong one. Lord Hardwicke there had a tenant for life and a remainderman. There were charges upon the estate, the interest on which more than absorbed the whole of the income of the property, and of course, there being no express direction, I think, in the will, at law the tenant for life was bound to keep down the interest on the charges; but Lord Hardwicke said that there was in that case a paramount intention that the tenant for life should not starve, and he accordingly, notwithstanding that the income was not sufficient to keep down the interest on the incumbrances, directed maintenance of the tenant for life. That was extended by Pearson, J., in the case of Collins v. Collins, to the education and bringing up of the infant in a way suitable to the position which he was likely to fill in the world afterwards; and that appears to me to rest also on the same principle of paramount intention. So that a testator who settles his property on A. for life, with remainders over, and provides for infants being maintained, does not, when he mentions a sum for maintenance, and directs an accumulation of the rest, without negative words, necessarily exclude all intention that the estate should be kept up, and the infant should be brought up, in a way suitable to the position which he has pointed out for him by his will. There are, in fact, two intentions running side by side in the will; one is that the infant is to inherit the full enjoyment at twenty-one of that which he now has possession subject to the management clauses; the other is that he shall have an allowance of £500 a year.

I think I do no violence to the words of this will when I regard the £500 a year as a sort of allowance which a parent in the position of the testator here makes to a son who is under age; either allowing it to him personally, or regarding it as the amount which would be necessary to pay his school bills, and his clothing, and so on, his father providing and keeping up the home, the family estate, and the family mansion at which the boy lives with him. The direction as to management in this will to my mind points to that. The testator certainly did not contemplate that Sand Hutton Hall should be shut up. On the contrary, he leaves heirlooms to go with the estate and to be enjoyed in the mansion-house. He certainly did not contemplate that the family mansion should be let, because I think if he had, he would have expressed it in terms; and although the power is wide enough to include the letting of Sand Hutton in case it became necessary, I think probably the testator had no contemplation of the possibility of letting, nor would it be desirable or convenient that the house should be let as a furnished house with the heirlooms in it unless it was absolutely unavoidable. I therefore hold that on the true construction of this will I have authority to accede to the suggestion which is made to me. It seems to me that if any particular case is more in point than another as showing the jurisdiction to do such a thing as this, and as bearing out the view expressed in two cases I have already cited, it is the case of Griggs v. Gibson, before Lord Hatherley. No question is here raised by Mr. Davenport that the amount is insufficient, and it seems to me to be a very fair and proper amount; and as regards one item of charities, which Mr. Butcher specially called attention to, although I am not aware that cases are reported, certainly within my own recollection many times in cases of large estates judges have allowed a sum to be expended for charities on the footing, amongst other things, that it is within the principle that the son is to be brought up and to live on the property, keeping up the reputation of the family and the estate; and that he could not do if the ordinary subscriptions to charities which a country gentleman living in the country necessarily pays should not be paid on behalf of the infant. Therefore I will make an order as asked.

ELLEN v. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Negligence—Personal injuries—Acceptance of money in full discharge of claim for compensation—Subsequent development of injuries not before apparent—Claim for further damages—Right to bring action.

The plaintiff, who was injured in a railway collision, signed a receipt for a sum of money paid him by the railway company in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims. He returned to work, but his eyesight soon began to fail, and he became totally blind.

Having commenced an action to recover damages from the railway company, the defendants pleaded that the action was not maintainable, and the question was ordered to be tried first whether the plaintiff had by his conduct debarred himself from suing for damages.

Held, that the action was maintainable, it being a question for the jury.

Action to recover damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendants' servants.

On the 16th of March, 1899, in his capacity of postal sorter, the plaintiff was travelling on the Great Northern Railway from Retford towards Doncaster, and was injured in a collision that occurred near Babworth Crossing. He sustained injuries which caused concussion of the brain and general shock to the nervous system. He was examined by his own doctor and by doctors on behalf of the railway company, and it was admitted that he was not informed and that the doctors had themselves no idea, that he had sustained injuries other than those abovementioned, and that they were only temporary. In this belief he instructed his solicitor to accept from the Great Northern Railway Co. on his behalf £190, and sign the following receipt: "Sept. 26, 1899. Received of the Great Northern Railway Co., per W. B. Jones, Esq., the sum of £190 in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims, legal and medical charges included, in respect of injuries sustained by Mr. T. E. J. Ellen near Babworth Crossing, Retford, on the 16th of March, 1899."

He returned to his work, but, after an interval, found his eyesight was beginning to fail, and in February of last year he was dismissed from his employment in the Post Office. He had since become totally blind and destitute.

The plaintiff alleged in his statement of claim that the failure of his eyesight was caused by the injuries sustained in the collision, and he sought to recover compensation in addition to the sum he has already been paid.

The defendants pleaded there had been an accord and satisfaction, and that the action was accordingly one that could not be maintained.

It was ordered at chambers that this question of law should be tried by a judge alone, before the trial of the issues of fact.

The defendants admitted for the purposes of this defence that neither the plaintiff nor his doctor at the time of the settlement knew or had reasonable grounds for supposing that the plaintiff's eyesight was or would be affected; the plaintiff on his part admitting the receipt of the £190.

M'Call, K.C., and W. Clarke Hall appeared for the plaintiff.

Montague Lush, for the railway company.

BUCKNILL, J.—The question I have to decide in this case is whether the plaintiff who was injured in the collision near Retford on the 16th of March, 1899, and who afterwards signed a receipt for a sum of money paid by the railway company in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims he might otherwise make, bound himself by that contract not to sue for damages he now alleges he suffered by reason of that collision which have since developed themselves. Now I am not going to shut the plaintiff out from having that question tried by a jury, because I think it is a question for a jury to answer. If the acceptance of the money and the document signed by the plaintiff's solicitor amounts to an agreement as distinguished from a receipt, the plaintiff has made a binding bargain and he must stand by it. Attention has been drawn to the fact that the pleader has used the word agreement in the statement of claim, but I think the pleading is nevertheless capable of the following construction: The plaintiff said in it that he had concussion of the brain and general shock, and that he did not know that he had sustained any other injury, and that with that knowledge only he gave the defendants a receipt for £190 in full satisfaction of all claims in respect of the injuries of which he then had knowledge, but that if he had known that he was to be tied down on the development of something of which he had then no idea, he would not have accepted the £190, and therefore he was still entitled to go to a jury and ask them to give him damages in addition to those received for the development of the further injuries in respect of which he had never intended to give a receipt. During the argument, Prosser v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Co., 6 Times L. R. 285, was cited, in which Huddleston, B., on the authority of Rideal v. Great Western Railway Co., 1 F. & F. 706, proposed to leave to the jury the question whether the plaintiff intended at the time he signed the receipt and agreement to debar himself from claiming for any subsequent disablement arising out of the accident. I take that case as a guide, and although it is not on all fours with the present case because the jury there was discharged by consent, and on appeal the Court of Appeal held the plaintiff was, as the judge decided, entitled to succeed on the true construction of the agreement itself, yet it is a decision that shows the spirit in which the court has approached questions of this kind, and supports me in deciding that in this case it is not for me as a judge to say on the wording of their pleading whether there has or has not been a binding contract such as would debar the plaintiff from maintaining a further claim for compensation. My interlocutory judgment is for the plaintiff, with costs against the defendants, but I will grant leave to appeal.

HULL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis—Building—General line of buildings—"Projection"—Electric sign affixed to wall of house—Lapse of time between offence and information—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxiii.), s. 73. sub-section 8—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.

By an agreement in writing the appellant let to an advertiser's agent a position covering the first-floor window of a house in the Seven Sisters-road for the purpose of erecting an electric advertising sign. The sign consisted of a wooden case with a glass front, which was attached to the external wall of the house by iron brackets, a space of six inches intervening between the back of the case and the level of the front wall. The cornice of the shop-front, which was below the sign, projected twenty inches beyond the external wall of the premises so that the sign projected four inches less than the existing projection of the premises.

More than six months after the sign was completely erected, the respondents laid an information against the appellant for an offence under section 73, sub-section 8, of the London Building Act, 1894, in extending a projection beyond the general line of buildings, without the respondents' permission. The summons was heard by a metropilitan magistrate, and at the hearing a further point was raised by the appellant, whether the prosecution of the alleged offence was barred under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, by lapse of time, the sign having been erected on the 20*th of June*, 1899; notice to remove served on the 16*th of March*, 1900, and the information laid on the 17*th of May*, 1900, which information alleged that the offence was committed on or about the 19*th of December*, 1899, the date when the sign was first brought to the attention of the council. The magistrate decided in favour of the council, and convicted the appellant.

Held (allowing the appeal), that the erection of the sign was not an offence within section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894, which section only extended to such projections as were part of the architectural structure of the building itself.

Held, also, that, if this sign were a "projection," nevertheless the information was barred by lapse of time under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Held, further, that the tenancy would have been no answer to the charge.

This was an appeal, by case stated, from the decision of the metropolitan magistrate, James Bros, Esq., sitting at Clerkenwell, convicting the appellant under an information preferred by Mr. Thomas Chilvers, on behalf of the respondents, charging the appellant with unlawfully extending a projection at No. 209, Seven Sisters-road, Islington, beyond the general line of buildings of Seven Sisters-road and Campbell-road, Islington, without the permission of the council, contrary to section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxiii).

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved: No. 209, Seven Sisters-road is at the corner of Seven Sisters-road and Campbell-road, Islington.

By an agreement in writing made on the 9th of June, 1899, the apellant let to Mr. S H. Benson, an advertiser's agent, a position covering the first floor window at the corner of the premises for the purpose of erecting thereon an electric or other advertising sign.

The tenancy was to commence as soon as the sign was let, and in any case not later than the 24th of June, 1899, and was to be for the term of one year, with the option of renewal for a period of not less than two years at a yearly rental of £20

This agreement was entered into by Mr. Benson on behalf of his clients, Messrs. Frederick King & Co. (Limited), whose registered office is in London. They were the proprietors of an article known as Edwards' Desiccated Soup, which was the subject-matter of the advertisement.

Between the 13th and 20th of June, 1899, the Electric Sign and General Advertising Co. (Limited) put up for Messrs. Frederick King & Co. (Limited) an electric advertisement sign over the front of the appellant's premises in the position mentioned in the agreement. The sign was commenced to be put up on the 13th of June, 1899, and was completely affixed to the external wall of the premises on the 20th of June, 1899. It consisted of a wooden case with a glass front, the case being attached to the external wall of the premises by iron brackets, a space of 6in. intervening between the back of the case and the wall, and a portion of the apparatus working the sign being within the room on the first floor. The sign measures 10ft. 6in. in height by 7ft. in breadth, and when lighted by electricity shows an advertisement of Edwards' Desiccated Soup. The sign was placed immediately over the cornice of the shop-front and, including the iron brackets, projected only 16in. beyond the external wall of the premises. The cornice of the shop-front, which was below the sign, projected 20in. beyond the external wall of the premises, so that the sign projected 4in. less than the existing projection of the cornice. The sign did not project over the highway.

On the 16th of March, 1900, a notice was served on the appellant requiring him to comply with the law. The information, which was preferred on the 17th of May, 1900, charged that the offence was committed on or about the 19th of December, 1899, the date on which it was brought to the attention of the council.

On the 2nd of June, 1900, the superintending architect of metropolitan buildings gave his certificate defining the general line of buildings of the premises as being the main fronts of the buildings on the eastern side of Campbell-road and on the northern side of Seven Sisters-road respectively.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the information was invalid, inasmuch as it was not laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter arose, as required by section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43); that the offence, if any, was complete and the matter of the information arose on the 20th of June, 1899, the date on which the sign was completely affixed to the premises; that the alleged offence was not a continuing offence, and was wrongly stated in the information to have been committed on or about the 19th of December, 1899; that the sign was not a projection within the meaning of section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894, inasmuch as the sign did not extend beyond the existing projection of the shop cornice and did not extend over the highway; and that the appellant was not liable or a proper defendant to the information, inasmuch as by the agreement he had demised the part of the premises on which the sign was affixed and had no power to control or alter the position of the sign without trespassing on the property of his tenant or to remedy the alleged breach of the section. On behalf of the council it was contended that the offence was a continuing offence, that the sign was a projection, and that the appellant was liable notwithstanding the agreement. The learned magistrate found as a fact that the sign did project beyond the general line of buildings in the streets as defined by the superintending architect, and held that the offence was a continuing offence. The questions for the opinion of the court were—(1) Whether the prosecution of the alleged offence was barred under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, by lapse of time; (2) whether the sign constituted a projection within the meaning of section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894; (3) whether the appellant could, having regard to the agreement, under the circumstances be properly convicted of the alleged offence.

Macmorran, K.C., and G. M. B. Kenrick, for the appellant.—This sign is no part of the architectural structure of the building, and therefore the conviction under section 73 (8) of the London Building Act, 1894, must be quashed. That section enacts "that the following provisions shall (except with the consent of the council) apply to projections from buildings," and when these are looked into it is clear that such a "projection" as this sign is not intended to be included. This is clear even when sub-section 8, under which the prosecution was instituted, is considered alone, for that enacts that "except so far as is permitted in this section in the case of shop-fronts and projecting windows, and with the exception of water-pipes and their appurtenances, coping, string-courses, cornices, facias, window dressings, and other architectural decorations, no projection from any building shall extend, &c." The projections which are there specially exempted, but for this subsection, would, as forming part of the building, come within the general heading of the section as being projections from a building which were necessarily attached and formed part of the building itself. The reason is to be found in the fact that other projections—i.e., things merely added to the buildings and projecting therefrom—had been dealt with in earlier acts—for example, projections endangering or incommoding the passage of the public along the street are dealt with in section 119 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855. If the respondents are right in their contention this section would include shop lamps, reflectors, clocks, and other like projections. Moreover, we say the proceedings were commenced too late. This is not a continuing offence within the meaning of section 200, sub-section 3. And in the absence of express words a penal clause must be construed strictly: London County Council v. Cross, 66 L. T. Rep. 731, 40 W. R. Dig. 148; Marshall v. Smith, L. R. 8 C. P. 416, 21 W. R. Dig. 139; Metropolitan Board of Works v. Antony, 33 W. R. 166, 54 L. J. M. C. 39; Welsh v. West Ham Corporation, [1900] 1 Q. B. 324, 48 W. R. Dig. 102. Lastly, we say that, the appellant having leased the position to a third party, the information was laid against the wrong person.

Avory, K.C., for the respondents.—The summons was rightly taken out under section 73, for that section deals with things of a smaller character than section 22, and these two sections should be read together. I admit that by the earlier Acts such projections as a clock or a horizontal flagsteff are dealt with, but these signs are as much part and parcel of the house to which they are attached as a porch shelter which projects over the pavement without pillars to support it. The test is whether the projection is attached, is dovetailed into the fabric in such a substantial way that it reasonably ought to be regarded as part of the building itself and not a mere appurtenance thereto: Coburg Hotel v. London County Council. 16 Times L. R. 9, 63 J. P. 805, 48 W. R. Dig. 120. If the projection is part of the structure then the consent of the council is necessary; Ellis v. Plumstead Board of Works, 41 W. R. 496, 68 L. T. Rep. 291, and Venner v. M'Donell, 45 W. R. 267, 61 J. P. 181, throw light on this principle. I say that the erecting of a thing is the offence, the retaining it in position after notice is the continuing offence: London County Council v. Worley, 43 W. R. 11, [1894] 2 Q. B. 826. This sign is firmly affixed to the building just as a large flower box would require to be, and as the Act did not wish to interfere with ordinary window boxes, but did intend to prevent the attachment of large glass ferneries or covered flower stands, the consent of the local authority was made necessary by section 210 (16) of the Act. The whole object of the Legislature was to preserve the uniformity of the street. It is therefore unnecessary to show that the projection is an annoyance. These signs are so large now that it is quite time that the council interfered and stopped them being erected without consent.

Macmorran, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

BRUCE, J., read the following written judgment of the court: In this case we think that the sign does not constitute a projection within the meaning of section 73, sub-section 8, of the London Building Act, 1894. The section in question commences: "The following provisions shall (except with the consent of the council) apply to projections from buildings." In order to ascertain the meaning of the phrase "projections from buildings," used at the commencement of the section, and the meaning of the words "projection from any building," used in the last sub-section, the provisions of the whole section must be considered. The first sub-section provides in substance that every coping, cornice, string-course, facia, window dressing, and such like, and every architectural projection or decoration and also the eaves, barge boards, and cornices to any overhanging roof shall, except as therein mentioned, be of brick, tile, stone, or other fireproof material. We think it is clear that this sub-section refers only to projections from buildings in the nature of architectural projections or decorations and to the overhanging parts of buildings, and it relates to the material for the construction of the parts of buildings to which it refers. Sub-section 2 enacts that every balcony, cornice, or other projection shall be tailed into the wall of the building and weighted and tied down to the satisfaction of the district surveyor, and that no cornice shall exceed in projection 2ft. 6in. over the public way. This sub-section relates only to projections in the nature of architectural projections. Sub-section 3 lays down rules regulating the extent to which in a street a shop-front and a cornice to a shop-front may project beyond the external wall of the building to which the shop-front or cornice belongs. Sub-section 5 relates only to bay windows, and sub-section 6 lays down the rules under which projecting oriel windows or turrets may be constructed. Sub-section 7 provides that the roof, flat, or gutter of every building and every balcony, verandah, shop-front, or other similar projection or projecting window shall be so arranged and constructed and so applied with gutters and pipes as to prevent the water therefrom from dropping upon or running upon any public way. We now come to the 8th sub-section, upon the construction of which the main question in the case turns. That sub-section is in these terms: "Except in so far as is permitted by this section in the case of shop-fronts and projecting windows and with the exception of water-pipes and their appurtenances, copings, string-courses, cornices, facias, window dressings, and other like architectural decorations, no projection from any building shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in any street except with the permission of the council, after consulting the local authority." The whole of the preceding part of the section relates to the construction of buildings, to projections from buildings, in the nature of architectural projection or decoration, or to the overhanging parts of buildings, and therefore it is plain that the projections from buildings to which the main provisions of the section apply are projections forming part of the buildings from which they project. The question we have to determine is whether the words in the 8th sub-section "no projection from any building" are used in a different sense and apply to a different class of projection; whether they include such things as poles, blinds, sign-boards, or other structures hung out from or attached to the outside wall of a house. Giving the best consideration we can to the words of the 8th sub-section we think that the words "projection from any building" are there used in the same sense as in the earlier part of the section. It would be strange to find in the last sub-section of a long section containing a code of minute provisions relating to a particular class of projections a sudden departure from the subject to which all the preceding provisions of the section are devoted. The meaning of the two branches of the 8th sub-section, we think, is that, with the exception of architectural decorations of the character specified, and for an obvious reason water-pipes, no part of the structure of a building, no architectural projection not being a shop-front or projecting window falling within the first branch of the sub-section, shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in any street. But it is contended by the counsel for the respondents that, although the words apply to such projections as we have mentioned, yet that they are wide enough to extend to everything attached to a building and extending beyond the general line of buildings, and that they apply to a structure such as the wooden box attached to the external wall of a house by brackets as described in the case. We do not think that the words, even apart from the context, have so extended a meaning. A projection from a building means a part of a building projecting or jutting out; it means a prominence extending from the building in the sense of coming out from the building as part of the building. If the words are taken in this sense they fall in with the scope of the section. It is quite clear that the object of the section is to preserve the width of the street and the general line of building frontage, in order to maintain architectural uniformity. But to extend the meaning of the words in the 8th sub-section to include structures not being part of the building and not joining any part of the architectural structure of the building would be to give an effect to the enactments altogether beyond the object to which the section seems to be directed. Further, we feel strengthened in the conclusion at which we have arrived by the circumstance that the 73rd section is in Part VI. of the Act, which is headed "Construction of Buildings." In another part of the same Act, where power is given to the council to deal with dangerous structures, the word structure is said to include anything affixed to or projecting from any building, wall, or other structure (see section 102). Had the Legislature intended the 73rd section to apply to a structure affixed to a building it may fairly be assumed that it would have used in that section words similar to the words used in the 102nd section. The 203rd section and the 73rd section were not, we think, intended to overlap. In each case the Legislature uses apt words to describe the particular kind of structure to which the several provisions apply. We may add that no inconvenience seems to be likely to arise from the construction we have placed on the sub-section in question, because the council has power under the 164th section of the same Act to make bye-laws for the regulation of lamps, signs, or other structures overhanging the public way not being within the city. And by the 7th sub-section of section 60 of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 a penalty is imposed upon any person who shall set up or continue inter alia any pole, blind, awning, or any other projection from any window, parapet, or other part of any house, shop, or other building so as to cause any annoyance or obstruction in any thoroughfare. And by the 119th section of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, provision is made for the removal of any lamps, iron sign-post, showboard, window shutter, gate, fence, or any other projection or obstruction placed or made against or in front of any house or building which shall be an annoyance in consequence of the same projecting into or being made in or endangering or rendering less commodious the passage along any street. Further, as to the point raised by the case whether the prosecution of the alleged defence is barred under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, by lapse of time, we think it is. If any offence was committed it was, we think, complete on the 20th of June, 1899, the date on which the said sign was completely affixed to the premises. The case of London County Council v. Cross is, we think, in point. As to the third point, we think that, if the sign had been a projection within the meaning of section 73 of the London Building Act, 1894, and the proceedings had been taken in due time, the appellant could not have escaped liability on the alleged ground that he had no power to control or alter the position of the sign without trespass. The result of our judgment is that the conviction, determination, and order must be reversed, and we think the appellant is entitled to the costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

R. v. BISHOP OF SALISBURY. (a.)

Churchwarden—Election—Right of minister to vote—89th Canon—Sturges Bourne's Act, 1818 (58 Geo. 3, c. 69).

The minister of a parish has no right to vote in the election of the people's churchwarden.

Semble, he may have a right to give a casting vote.

Cause shown by the Bishop of Salisbury against a rule nisi ordering him to admit and administer the declaration to Mr. S. Vine as churchwarden of the parish of Winterborne Came.

At a meeting of the vestry of the parish of Winterborne Came held on the 23rd of April, 1900, two persons, Mr. Vine and Mr. Passemore, were nominated as people's churchwardens.

On the 7th of May, 1900, a poll was held, and the voting showed 29 votes given by 19 persons for Passemore, and 23 votes given by 8 persons for Vine.

The rector claimed the right to vote and gave six votes in favour of Vine, and he then gave a casting vote in favour of Vine, Vine thus obtaining 30 votes to Passemore's 29 votes.

Both claimed admission from the ordinary, and the matter was referred to the bishop, who was then on visitation.

On the 21st of June the bishop gave a considered judgment, and declared that Passemore was elected.

Passemore was subsequently admitted.

It was contended by the bishop that the rector had no right to vote in an election of the people's churchwardens.

Dibdin, K.C., and Bailey, for the bishop, showed cause.—The common law as to the election of churchwardens is contained in the 89th canon. That canon provides as follows: "All churchwardens or quest men in every parish shall be chosen by the joint consent of the minister and the parishioners if it may be. But if they cannot agree upon such a choice, then the minister shall choose one and the parishioners another." The canon embodies the common law and declares that if the minister and the parishioners cannot make a joint choice, each is to choose one: Stoughton v. Reynolds, 2 Str. 1044. The minister, therefore, is to have no choice in the election by the parishioners of their churchwarden: Wilson v.

(a.) Reported by J. A. GREENE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

McMath, 3 Phillimore 67, at p. 84; Anderton on Churchwardens, p. 173. The common law is not altered by Sturges Bourne's Act. Section 3 of that Act does not specially allude to election of churchwardens, and so does not alter common law: Reg. v. Scott, 4 W. R. 777, 25 L. J. M. C. 128; Reg. v. Morris, 15 W. R. 999, 1 C. C. R. 90. "Parishioners" in the canon is not the same as "vestry" in the Act. If the Act takes away right of parishioners to sole choice of their churchwarden, then it takes away sole choice of incumbent to appoint his churchwarden.

Edwardes Jones, in support of the rule.—The minister as an inhabitant or parishioner is entitled to vote. R. v. D'Oyly, 12 A. & E. 139, per Lord Denman, p. 159: "Under section 3 of Sturges Bourne's Act the minister is an inhabitant and entitled to vote in respect of his assessment." The whole policy of the Act is to allow voting in the vestry on the basis of rateable value. Here the minister was entitled to six votes. The minister comes within the wording of section 3 of the Act, and there is nothing in the Act exempting the case of election of churchwardens.

He also cited Green v. Reg., 1 App. Cas. 533, 24 W. R. Dig. 92; Ranson and Knott v. Campkin, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 370; Reg. v. Kirby, 10 W. R. 13, 31 L. J. Q. B. 3.

WILLS, J.—This case is not free from difficulties, but I think the rule must be discharged. I find myself unable to believe that Bourne's Act was intended to affect the manner of electing churchwardens. There is no doubt that the common law is correctly expressed in the 89th canon. There is nothing that can be cited to the contrary, in fact it has been held to be a correct statement of the common law. According to the canon the minister, when he has once exercised his right of appointing his churchwarden, is ousted from taking any part in the election of the people's churchwarden. It is said that "parishioner" includes "minister," but to hold that would be doing great violence to language. In the canon "parishioner" certainly excludes "minister." Therefore at common law the minister was under a legal incapacity of voting in election of the people's churchwarden. I cannot think that by a mere side wind, so to speak, Parliament should have intended to alter so fundamental a principle. In construing a statute such as Bourne's Act where two contrary meanings may be put upon it, we ought to incline to that construction which is in agreement with the common law. It is said that section 3 of Bourne's Act enacts that in every case a minister who is rated is entitled to vote, but this is not an election by a vestry. It is true that it is an election in a vestry, but it is not an election by a vestry. I do not think that the general words referring to the general business of the vestry have removed the personal incapacity under which at common law the minister lies; as to section 8 of the Act it refers, I think, only to customs applying to a particular parish and has nothing to do with the point we are deciding.

CHANNELL, J.—In the words of the canon, one churchwarden is to be chosen by the minister, the other by the parishioners exclusive of him. The canon expresses the common law rule in authoritative language, and it has never been questioned except by a dictum of Lord Denman, which I will treat of presently. In Wilson v. McMath Sir John Nicholl says, in speaking of the minister: "And to be sure, if there was any case in which he ought to have retired from the chair it was at the election of a second churchwarden, with which he had nothing at all to do" There is nothing to the contrary except the dictum of Lord Denman, and that is only an adoption by him of a statement put forward in argument by counsel, and his decision that even if the statement is true, yet the argument should not prevail. If before Bourne's Act the minister was entitled to vote for his own churchwarden and then to vote for the other, then I think the applicants here should prevail, but in my opinion it was not so. I do not think Bourne's Act has altered the common law. We must not alter the common law in a special case by a general Act. The only doubt I have is whether on equal votes being given for the second churchwarden Bourne's Act applies as to the minister giving a casting vote. On the whole I think under the Act the minister in such a case has a casting vote, since he would be chairman, but this is not necessary for our decision here.

I think, however, the minister had no right to vote for the election of Vine, and that Vine was not properly elected.

Rule discharged.

CHAMBERS v. GOLDTHORPE.
RESTELL v. NYE. (a.)

Contract — Building contract — Architect — Certificate — Liability for negligence in making certificate — Position of arbitrator — Duty to exercise impartial judgment.

A building contract provided that the builder should be paid on the certificates of the architect who was employed by the building owner to superintend the work and measure it up when completed, and that the final certificate should be conclusive evidence that the builder was entitled to receive payment of the final balance. The contract contained a clause providing that, in case any dispute under the contract should arise between the building owner, or the architect on his behalf, and the builder, such dispute should be referred to the arbitration of a person other than the architect.

Held, by A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins, L.J. (Romer, L.J., dissenting), that the architect occupied the position of an arbitrator in making certificates, and therefore that the building owner could not maintain an action against the architect for negligence in making his final certificate.

Appeals from the Queen's Bench Division.

The first case was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) on an appeal from the Holmfirth County Court.

The second case was an appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

In the first case, the plaintiff Chambers, who was an architect, sued the defendant Goldthorpe, a building owner, for fees, and the defendant counterclaimed for negligence, under the following circumstances: The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to prepare plans for houses which the defendant was about to have built, to superintend the work, and to measure it up when completed.

The defendant entered into a contract with a contractor, whereby the latter was to build the houses.

The building contract was in the printed form approved and issued by the National Association of Master Builders of Great Britain.

Clause 1 provided that, in the construction of the contract, the term "architect" was to mean the plaintiff or the architect for the time being employed by the defendant to superintend the erection and completion of the works.

Clause 8 provided that "any authority given by the architect for any alteration or addition in or to the works is not to vitiate the contract, but all additions, omissions, or variations made in carrying out the works, for which a price may not have been previously agreed upon, are to be measured and valued and certified for by the architect, and added to or deducted from the amount of the contract as the case may be, according to the schedule of prices annexed, or where the same may not apply at fair measure and value."

By clause 16 the contractor was to complete the whole of the works within five months after their commencement, unless the works were delayed from certain causes, for which due allowance was to be made by the architect, and then the contractor was to complete the works within such time as the architect should consider reasonable, and in case of default the contractor was to pay a certain sum per week by way of liquidated damages until the works were completed, provided that the architect certified in writing that the works could have been reasonably completed within the time appointed.

Clause 19 provided that the architect was to give interim certificates as the works progressed, and that when the works were completed, or possession of the buildings given up to the defendant, the contractor was to be entitled to receive the moiety of the amount remaining due, and the architect was to give his certificate accordingly, and the contractor was to receive the balance of all moneys payable under the contract within three months from the completion of the works or from the date of giving up possession, whichever first happened.

By clause 20, "a certificate of the architect, or an award of the referee hereinafter referred to, as the case may be, showing the final balance due or payable to the contractor is to be conclusive evidence of the works having been duly completed, and that the contractor is entitled to receive payment of the final balance."

Clause 22 provided that "in case any question, dispute, or difference shall arise between the proprietor"—that is, the defendant—"or the architect on his behalf, and the contractor as to what additions, if any, ought in fairness to be made to the amount of the contract by reason of the works being delayed through no fault of the contractor, or by reason or on account of any directions or requisitions of the architect, involving increased cost to the contractor beyond the cost properly attending the carrying out the contract according to the true intent and meaning of the signed drawings and specification, or as to the works having been duly completed, or as to the construction of these presents, or as to any other matter or thing arising under or out of this contract, except as to matters left during the progress of the works to the sole decision or requisition of the architect under clauses Nos. 2, 10, and 11, or in case the contractor shall be dissatisfied with any certificate of the architect under clause No. 8, or under the proviso in clause No. 16, or in case he shall withhold or not give any certificate to which the contractor may be entitled, then such question, dispute, or difference, or such certificate, or the value or matter which should be certified, as the case may be, is to be from time to time referred to the arbitration and final decision of an architect, being a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects, to be appointed at the request of either party by the president for the time being of such institute, and the award of such referee is to be equivalent to a certificate of the architect, and the contractor is to be paid accordingly." Such award or certificate might be made a rule of court.

After the houses were completed the plaintiff measured up to the work done, and gave his final certificate, the total amount of the cost of work coming out at £622.

The plaintiff, having sued the defendant in the county court for the amount of his fees—namely, 4 per cent. upon £622, the defendant admitted the claim and counterclaimed for negligence by reason of the plaintiff having incorrectly measured up certain of the work done, whereby the final certificate was for a larger amount than it ought to have been.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim for damages to be assessed.

The Divisional Court on appeal held that the architect was, under clause 20 of the contract, placed in a judicial position between the building owner and the contractor with reference to giving his certificate, and therefore was not liable for negligence. They accordingly entered judgment for the plaintiff on the counterclaim.

The defendant appealed.

Lowenthal, for the defendant.—The plaintiff was acting as agent for the defendant, and he is therefore liable to an action for negligence in the performance of his duty. The plaintiff was not in the position of an arbitrator or in any judicial position whatever as between the defendant and the builder. His duty was to his employer, the defendant, and he had power under the building contract to bind the defendant. But he could not bind the builder. It is clear from clause 22 that the builder was not bound by any certificate given by the plaintiff under clause 8 or under clause 16, nor by his final certificate. If there had been any dispute between the defendant and the builder, the plaintiff could not have given a certificate at all: Lloyd Brothers v. Milward, 2 Hudson's Building Contracts, 454. A person who is not permitted to settle a dispute cannot be an arbitrator: see Clemence v. Clarke, 2 Hudson's Building Contracts, 207. Secondly, the defendant is counterclaiming under the original contract by which he employed the plaintiff as his architect, and it is immaterial to show that the plaintiff is an arbitrator under some other contract: Rogers v. James, 2 Hudson's Building Contracts, 113.

He also referred to Pappa v. Rose, 20 W. R. 784, L. R. 7 C. P. 525; and Stevenson v. Watson, 27 W. R. 682, 4 C. P. D. 148.

Scott Fox, K.C., and R. W. Harper, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was bound, so far as regards his final certificate, to exercise his judgment impartially between the building owner and the builder; and that, according to the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Pappa v. Rose, is sufficient to exempt him from liability for negligence. This case is governed by Stevenson v. Watson; see also Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co, (Limited) v. Loftus, 21 W. R. 109, L. R. 8 C. P. 1. Secondly, the defendant is counterclaiming for negligence in giving a certificate, and the giving of certificates was not provided for in the original contract, but only in the building contract.

In the second case, the plaintiff Restell, a building owner, sued the defendant Nye, an architect, for negligence under the following circumstances:

The defendant was employed by the plaintiff as architect in connection with the building of a bungalow. The terms of the employment of the defendant were contained in certain letters which passed between the parties, from which it appeared that the defendant was to be paid by the plaintiff for "plans, specifications, and supervision of works" 5 per cent. upon the amount of the expenditure, travelling and out-of-pocket expenses to be charged extra.

The defendant prepared a specification, and a tender submitted by a firm of builders for the erection of the bungalow for £1,790 was accepted.

The plaintiff signed a building contract which was similar in its terms to the building contract in the case of Chambers v. Goldthorpe, and provided that the price should be paid by instalments upon the defendant's certificates, and that his final certificate should be conclusive evidence that the builders were entitled to receive payment of the final balance.

The arbitration clause was as follows: "Provided always that in case of any question, dispute, or difference arising between the employer or the architect on his behalf and the contractors attending the carrying out of the contract according to the true intent and meaning of the signed plans and specifications, or as to the works having been duly completed, or as to the construction of these presents, or the said specifications, or as to any other matter or thing arising out of this contract or the execution of the works hereby contracted for (except as to matters hereinbefore left during the progress of the works to the sole decision of or requisition of the architect), then such question, dispute, or difference is to be from time to time referred to the arbitration and final decision of Mr. Samuel Denman, or, him failing, Mr. Hunt, and the said referee's charges and costs of and incidental to the reference shall be paid by such parties as the referee shall direct, and the said reference shall be considered a reference to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, 1888, or any statutory modification thereof, and no proceedings whatsoever shall be taken by the contractors against the employer until the contractors shall have obtained, and save upon, the award of the said referee, whose appointment shall be irrevocable."

The work was completed, and the plaintiff paid the contract price together with the cost of certain extras on the defendant's certificates.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had been guilty of negligence in measuring up the work executed and in checking the builders' accounts, and had negligently passed as extras, works included in the contract and certified for sums improperly passed.

Mathew, J., gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that he was in the position of an arbitrator, and that an action would not lie against him for negligence.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Morten, for the plaintiff.

L. Horton-Smith, for the defendant.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I will first deal with the case of Chambers v. Goldthorpe. The plaintiff, an architect, sued the defendant, a building owner, for payment of fees—viz., 4 per cent. on the total cost of work done under a building contract. The building owner counterclaimed for damages for negligence on the part of the architect in bringing out his final certificate. The county court judge held as a matter of law that the counterclaim against the architect for negligence could be maintained, the question whether in fact there had been negligence being left in abeyance. The Divisional Court reversed his decision, holding that the counterclaim could not be maintained. The question we have to decide is whether the plaintiff was placed in the position of an arbitrator, or whether he was merely in the position of a person acting as agent for the building owner. If he was an arbitrator, then the building owner cannot sue him for negligence; he can only sue him for fraud or collusion; and there is no suggestion in this case of anything of that kind. Looking at the building contract it is plain that under many of the clauses of the contract Chambers was only to act as agent for Goldthorpe. With regard to the matters dealt with in those clauses his duty was simply to look after the interests of Goldthorpe, and in respect of those matters no doubt he would be liable to an action of negligence. But when we come to clause 20, the question arises, Does the architect still remain merely the agent of the building owner, or is he not an arbitrator? It seems to me to be impossible to say with regard to clause 20 that the architect's sole duty was to look after the interests of the building owner. The architect undertook the duty of bringing out a final certificate. With respect to that he owed a duty to the builder as well as to the building owner, his duty being to hold the balance fairly between the one and the other. It is suggested that the architect cannot have been in the position of an arbitrator because the building owner was absolutely bound by his certificates, whereas the builder was not, but I do not see why under the terms of clause 22 the building owner might not go to the referee. We were referred to the cases of Clemence v. Clarke and Lloyd Brothers v. Milward, and it was argued that in this case there was no dispute, and that there could be no arbitration unless there was a dispute. In my opinion there may be an arbitration to settle what otherwise might be the matter of a dispute. The present case seems to me to be exactly like Stevenson v. Watson. Chambers, like the defendant in that case, had not merely to make an arithmetical calculation, but to use professional knowledge and skill. Tharsis Sulphur Co. v. Loftus, which was the case of an average adjuster, has also, in my opinion, a strong bearing on the case before us. I therefore think that Chambers was in the position of an arbitrator. With regard to Rogers v. James, that case seems to me to have nothing to do with this. There the architect was sued for not supervising the building, which was a matter in which it was not his duty to act in the interest of the builder, but rather to act adversely to the builder. I think that the counterclaim cannot be maintained, and that the appeal must be dismissed. For the same reasons I think that the claim in the other case, Restell v. Nye, cannot be maintained, and that the appeal in that case should also be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is the same in both cases—viz., whether the architect was in the position of a quasi-arbitrator. If he was, then the case against him in each instance must fail. The question depends on this, whether he was in such a position that he was bound to exercise his judgment impartially between the two parties. It was suggested that he was only the agent of the building owner, and owed no duty to the builder. But in my opinion, when the building contract is read, it is clear that he was in the position of a quasi-arbitrator. It was held in Lloyd Brothers v. Milward that where a dispute has arisen, i.e., has been formulated, between the parties to a building contract before the architect has given his certificate, the architect's jurisdiction is ousted, and the jurisdiction of the referee is let in; but if there is no formal dispute before the certificate is given, then the referee's jurisdiction is not let in, and the architect's certificate is final. But an architect who has to give a final certificate which shall be binding not only on his employer, but on the other party, cannot be said to be free from duty to the other party; he is under a duty to exercise his judgment impartially between the two contracting parties. And where a person is bound to exercise judgment between others involving professional skill he is entitled to the immunities of an arbitrator. I am of opinion that these cases come within the principle of Pappa v. Rose, Tharsis Sulphur Co. v. Loftus, and Stevenson v. Watson, and that the architect in each case was in the position of a quasi-arbitrator.

ROMER, L.J.—I regret to have to differ from my learned brethren. I will state my views on what seem to me to be a question of principle. In my opinion, if a person undertakes for reward to value or estimate for another, work about to be done for his principal by a third person, he does not, so far as his principal is concerned, become placed in the position of an arbitrator in regard to his valuation or estimate, merely because he knows that his principal and the third person have by contract between them agreed that, in default of dispute previously arising with regard to the matter, his valuation or estimate is to be taken as conclusive and as determining the price to be paid by his principal for the work to be done by the third person. In such a case, in giving his valuation or estimate he would still be acting for his principal, and, so long as he acted without fraud, he would be under no obligation or liability to the third person. And acting, as he would do, for his principal, if he was guilty of negligence causing damage, he would be liable to his principal in an action brought by him. I cannot bring myself to think that that view is wrong. And yet, undoubtedly, the contrary view must be maintained by the architect in the present case to enable him to succeed on this appeal. For on the facts it appears to be clear that by the terms of his employment by the defendant the architect undertook to measure up from time to time the work to be done for his principal by the contractor, and to certify the amount in money the work represented, and in particular, on completion of the work, to certify the balance payable. For this work he was to be paid by his principal. It would follow that, if in doing that work, for which he was to be paid by his principal, he was guilty of negligence from which damage ensued to his principal, he would be primâ facie liable. To enable him to escape from that liability, the onus would be on him to show that by the terms of the contract between his principal and the contractor he was freed from that primâ facie liability. No doubt he might do so if he could show that by those terms he was undoubtedly placed in the position of an arbitrator with regard to his certificates, and that the principal's complaint against him in regard to the certificates was for something done in his capacity of arbitrator. But, in my opinion, the architect would not succeed in showing this merely by reason of the fact that his principal and the contractor had by the contract agreed that in the case of no prior dispute arising with reference thereto his certificates should be treated as conclusive between them. In the contract in the present case not only is there nothing going beyond what I have just mentioned, or indicating that in measuring up the work and certifying the architect was regarded or treated as an arbitrator, but the provisions of the contract appear to me to negative the idea that under that contract he was regarded as, or placed in the position of, an arbitrator. I need not go through the whole of those provisions, but I may point out that there is an arbitration clause (clause 22) which does provide for the settlement of disputes by an arbitrator who is not the architect; and in that clause the architect is clearly recognized as the agent of the building owner, as a person who in reference to what he has to do is considered as acting for his principal and as one opposed to the contractor. And clause 8 is not without significance. If there were any matters in respect to which one would expect to find the architect placed in the position of an arbitrator, if he was ever intended to occupy that position, it would be in reference to the matters dealt with by that clause. And yet we find that though the architect's principal would be bound under clause 20 by the architect's certificate in reference to these matters, yet under clause 22 the contractor might challenge the certificate and go to arbitration upon it. In fact, on this contract, far from it enabling the architect to discharge the onus which I have mentioned, in my opinion it is strongly against him. To hold the opposite view appears to me to put a construction on the contract not necessary or right, and one which would work injustice as between the building owner and the architect guilty of negligence. I do not think I am prevented by the authorities from taking the view which I take of this case. The cases of Wadsworth v. Smith, 19 W. R. 797, L. R. 6 Q. B. 332, and Jenkins v. Betham, 3 W. R. 283, 15 C. B. 168, support my view strongly, and the balance of all the authorities seem to be in favour of my view rather than of the contrary view, and also to be more in consonance with natural justice. The only case which causes me any difficulty is Stevenson v. Watson. But there the parties expressly agreed that they should be bound to leave all questions to the architect, whose decision should be final. I am not surprised that the court held him to be an arbitrator. If that case is opposed to Wadsworth v. Smith, then I prefer Wadsworth v. Smith. I am therefore of opinion that the appeals ought to be allowed.

COLLINGHAM v. SLOPER. (a.)

Practice—Compromise—Power to bind absent parties—R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 9a.

A scheme for compromise of an action provided for setting aside a fund to make payments to bondholders of a certain company. This scheme was sanctioned by the Court of Appeal, and, under ord. 16, r. 9a, made binding on all the bondholders of the company. A certain number of bondholders failed to claim their rights within six years from the sanctioning of the compromise. On a motion to fix a time within which such bondholders must come in,

Held (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), that, there being nothing in the original scheme to determine the period within which claims under it must be made, the court had no jurisdiction to vary the order by introducing such a term.

This action was originally brought for the administration of the trusts of a sum of money amounting to upwards of £200,000 in the hands of three persons called the London Commissioners, as trustees for the Saragossa and Mediterranean Railway Co., and for the bondholders of the company.

The funds in question were raised by bonds for the sum of £20 each, payable to bearer, which formed a first charge on the company's undertaking, and were handed over to the commissioners to be applied by them in constructing the railway, subject to payment of interest and of the bonds, which were redeemable by yearly drawings.

The plaintiffs in this action, who represented a majority of the bondholders, claimed the enforcement of the trusts under which the moneys subscribed in respect of the bonds were held by the commissioners.

A second action was brought with a similar object by certain other bondholders; and a third action was brought by the plaintiffs in the second action claiming a declaration that the objects for which the moneys had been subscribed were no longer capable of being performed.

On the 9th of August, 1894, the Court of Appeal, under ord. 16, r. 9*a*, sanctioned a scheme for the compromise of the three actions, and being of opinion that the scheme would be for the benefit of all the holders of obligations, ordered that it should be carried into effect so as to be binding on the holders of all obligations, other than three dissentients named in the order, whose claims were to be provided for by the commissioners setting aside £600 out of the moneys in their hands. All further proceedings in the actions were to be stayed. By the scheme it was provided that out of the funds in the hands of the commissioners there should be set aside for distribution in respect of all obligations then outstanding, "when and as soon as the holders thereof shall be duly ascertained within fourteen days after presentation of the same for payment, upon such obligations being delivered up to be cancelled," a sum sufficient to pay £2 10s. in respect of each obligation. Most of the holders had surrendered their obligations on these terms, and there now remained only 1,700 obligations outstanding. Every effort had been made to find the holders of these obligations, but without success. There was in court a fund more than sufficient to pay £2 10s. in respect of each obligation still outstanding. The company now applied by original motion in the three actions, that a period of three months, or such other time as the court might think fit, might be limited within which the holder of the obligations must come in under the scheme and accept the £2 10s. per obligation, and that the holders who should not come within the time limited should be deemed to have elected not to take the benefit of the scheme, but to rely on the charge on the railway works created by the obligations, and that such holders might be excluded from the benefit of the scheme and of the order sanctioning it.

Butcher, K.C., and Peterson, contra.

Upjohn, K.C., replied.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case an application is made by a railway company to alter the form of an order for compromise made by the Court of Appeal under order 16, which gives the court the extraordinary power—I grant it may be a very useful power indeed—to bind absent persons who have no sort of opportunity of seeing the terms of the compromise, or of bringing forward their own views on the subject, or indeed of even so much as knowing that a compromise has been suggested. I say it is an extraordinary power without venturing for a moment to say that it is not a power which may very usefully be exercised by a court of law, and it may be very desirable to have such a power vested in the court, especially of course in those cases, in which alone I expect it would be put into force, where a great majority of the persons who are in the same position as the absent persons who are sought to be bound, are of opinion that the compromise is a beneficial one for themselves and therefore for persons who, though absent, have similar interests.

Now I do not think it necessary to go in detail into the matter, but, roughly speaking, I have gathered that in this case a certain railway company, with a considerable scheme for carrying out the construction of railway lines, borrowed money on debentures, the security proposed to be given by them being a security on the whole line so intended to be made. I do not know why or how—and it is not necessary that we should know—but that railway company failed absolutely, so much so that a sum of money which had found its way into the hands of certain commissioners here in London was practically the only source for the repayment of the bondholders. The debenture-holders looked, in fact, to this money to get partial repayment of the moneys which they had advanced.

Under those circumstances the matter came before North, J., in the case of Collingham v. Sloper, Sloper being one of the commissioners in whom the funds were vested, and the other defendants being, I suppose, the other persons in the same position. North, J., made an order, and an order which is said to have been without precedent. It may have been right for all that—I do not know, and I have not heard sufficiently to form an opinion. But whilst that order was under appeal a scheme of compromise was brought forward, and an application was made to North, J., for his sanction, I suppose under order 16, to that scheme of compromise. He declined to give it, for reasons we do not at present know, and it is not important to inquire into. But that refusal of his to sanction this scheme also came before the Court of Appeal, and on consideration of all the facts they came to the conclusion that the scheme of compromise was one that could be properly sanctioned, and they made an order to sanction the scheme of compromise. Of course, then the original order of North, J., no longer had to be considered the subject of an appeal, and, in fact, that order was stayed. There could be no resort to rights given to the debenture-holders present or absent under that order, because the scheme of compromise settled the rights altogether. Now, as I said before, it is a very strong jurisdiction to give any court power to bind people who have not had an opportunity of laying their views before the court, and are not parties in any way; but still that scheme of compromise sanctioned by the court became binding on all the debenture-holders present or absent. Since that time a very great number of debenture-holders, knowing of and sanctioning the compromise so far as their individual rights were concerned, have come in and been paid under it. A great number have come in, and there have been debenture-holders who are strangers who have also come in; they have come in slowly—probably as they happen to learn for the first time of the compromise, or it may be to make up their minds with regard to it—but they have come in slowly, and they have not yet ceased to come in, for I understand that about the 8th of the present month holders of between 2,000 and 3,000 bonds have come in, and they are now asking for payment under the compromise. Therefore, although the operation of the order is slow, it cannot be said to be entirely terminated, and we do not know what may take place. It is said that at the present time there is a fund of about £5,000 left in court, and there are a considerable number of bondholders outstanding.

Now the important clause that we have to consider is the clause of the scheme that appropriates a fund for distribution "in respect of the 61,000 obligations issued by the railway company, when and as soon as the holders thereof shall be duly ascertained, being at the rate of £2 10s. per obligation within fourteen days after presentation of the same for payment. Upon such obligations being delivered up to be cancelled there shall be set aside a sum," and then the sum is mentioned. Now I look upon that as the sum which is to be set aside to be distributed as, when, and so soon as the holders thereof shall be duly ascertained. The holders of 1,700 bonds have not been ascertained. What right has anyone to say "We will do away with that condition, which is a condition precedent to payment, and we will set the fund free before ever they are ascertained at all." Then there are the words "within fourteen days after presentation." It may be that when the bondholder was ascertained, when it was known who he was and where he was, and when an intimation of his rights had been given to him, there might have been a right to come to the court—I do not say that on the mere construction of the agreement there would be—but there may have been a right to call upon him either to present a bond for payment and to deliver it up in return for payment of £2 10s., the amount fixed for payment on each bond, or the court might in the exercise of a reasonable jurisdiction have said "You must come within a reasonable time." But I cannot imagine with what force the railway company now says, "Fix a reasonable time." How can a reasonable time be fixed in the case of a man who is not ascertained, and of whom we know nothing. We only know that there is a bond distinguished by a certain number, and we cannot tell who is the owner of that bond. How it is possible to say that we can fix a reasonable time for the holder of that bond to come in? I have examined that, and I do not think that really anything beyond that is necessary for the decision of this case as I am deciding it. Obviously the responsibility of framing an order sanctioning the compromise is in itself very considerable, but it is a mere nothing as it appears to me compared to the responsibility of a court, which on an argument, necessarily in many respects less exhaustive than that which might have been presented to the court of first instance, undertakes to alter the whole scheme. The court has chosen to say, "This is a proper scheme by which we should bind debenture-holders." Can we now insert something that the Court of Appeal in sanctioning the order did not express? Shall a construction we cannot find in the words of the language be deemed to be there—or indeed which can be shown conclusively not to be there, for the whole scheme is to take place only when and so soon as the holders of the bonds are ascertained. For my part I decline to acquiesce in such a responsibility. I daresay it may happen that a few thousands of pounds—somewhere about £4,000 it would appear to be—will be locked up. Why should it not be, even on the merest possible chance that a bondholder will come in. What sort of right or equity has this defaulting railway company to insist upon such a term being for the first time introduced into the scheme? I say they have absolutely no right, and if indeed it happens that for a very considerable time the £4,000 is locked up I cannot see any injustice. They seem to me to have got out of the effect of their default in a very easy manner, all things considered, and I am not at all disposed—even if I felt myself justified—to make any order simply because it is convenient to them and would be pecuniarily profitable to them to make the order. In my judgment, therefore, no order can be made in the matter.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am sorry to say that I do not quite agree. Having regard to the view of the other members of the court, it is not necessary, nor would it be convenient, that I should consider what should be the order and the terms of the order which we might make if the court were going to make any order. Neither is it necessary or convenient that I should consider what would be a reasonable time in respect of these absent persons who by the order of the court were to be bound by the compromise, because, as I understand the view that has been expressed by Rigby, L.J., the court here really has no power to make an order at all. I shall also not trouble myself with the question whether it is to the interests of the community that sums of money should remain for an indefinite time tied up in court because of a difficulty in ascertaining who are the people entitled to certain interests in it. I have no right to deal with such a difficulty. There the difficulty is, and there it must remain until the Legislature has removed it. To my mind, what I have got to do here is to construe this order, and, taking the view that I do, that is only another mode of saying that what I have to do is to construe this agreement to compromise, because the scheme of arrangement here is sanctioned by the court, and it is a scheme which should be carried out. One has to look at this scheme, and to see whether, according to its proper construction, these people who had the option of coming in and of receiving out of this fund £2 10s. are entitled to wait as long as ever they choose before exercising that option. According to my view of the construction of this order, they have not got that right. If they have got that right under the order, it does not seem to me that the court would have any right to modify it or alter it at all.

Now the compromise is the same both for the people who did assent, people who were present and being present were bound, as it is for the people who not being present were bound by the order the court made under the power of ord. 16, r. 9*a*.

Now these absent people have been bound by that order and that compromise which is sanctioned by the order. The question is, what that compromise means. Now first I will speak of what the meaning of the compromise is to those people who have been absent, or I will take those who being present have not elected to come in. Have they got an unlimited time to make up their minds; if notice were given to one of them that it was proposed if they did not come in in a further time to apply to the court to take this money out, is the agreement such that the person in question would be entitled to come to the court and say, "No; under the terms of this compromise there is no time limited whatsoever. I have got the right to say I have not made up my mind yet; there is no expression of any fixed time within which I am to come in, and there is nothing said about my coming in within a reasonable time, and I insist upon my rights." I cannot conceive that as against such a person a reasonable time might not be limited, and that the court might not say under this contract, as indeed of necessity under every contract where time is not expressed, that the law implies a reasonable time. If my memory does not deceive me — I have not the authority before me — the expression "of necessity," I think, is Lord Coleridge's expression. It is of necessity that you read in "a reasonable time," and it seems to me that if you have got people who were absent, but who are now here in the country and ascertained, the same thing could be said as against them—You must come in under this within a reasonable time. It seems to me that if you take the people who are absent and unascertained, in this case also they must come in within a reasonable time. The only thing, to my mind, which casts any doubt upon the propriety of reading into this agreement, if it be an agreement, the implied provision as to reasonable time is, first, that it may be said, "This is not a mere agreement, this is an order of the court," and that that rule does not apply to an order. I have very great doubt about it, because the rest of the court do not agree as to this. I think when the court sanctions a compromise you ought to read into the compromise "reasonable time." Then the other thing which is said against reading in "reasonable time" here is that there is another condition expressed in terms here, "As soon as the holders thereof shall be duly ascertained," and then it is said, however much one may read "reasonable time" into an ordinary contract, the reasonable time cannot here begin to run as against people who have not been ascertained, and that in each individual case the obligation and the right do not arise until the individual has been ascertained. I do not feel constrained to exclude what I call the necessary term of reasonable time by these words, because it seems to me that the words which follow, "within fourteen days after presentation," get over the difficulty because they import that presentation must be made within a reasonable time. If I am asked what is a reasonable time for an unascertained person my answer is that it is not to the interests of the community that these bondholders or anybody that should sleep upon their rights and do nothing for an indefinite time, but that people must act reasonably in these matters, and that if people for a long time do not choose to come forward and take advantage of an order which has been advertised throughout the length and breadth of the civilized world, the law will presume that those notices reached them, and make the time run from the reasonable presumption of the date when it must be taken that the notices reached the people. But I will say nothing further as to what those terms should be because the majority of the court think that there is no power to make the order.

STIRLING, L.J. — I regret to find myself in difference with my brother Vaughan Williams, L.J., but I do not think that in this case we have any right to make an order against persons who are unascertained to be the holders of outstanding bonds. It is quite true that in certain cases the Legislature has deprived persons who do not assert their rights of those rights by Statutes of Limitation and otherwise, but here no Statute of Limitation applies. The scheme which we have to consider is one which was made with the sanction of the court, and I apprehend that the court in sanctioning such a scheme would be very careful in all cases to see that it did not, in dealing with the rights of absent parties, deprive any absent person of his property in a case in which the Legislature had not decreed that he should lose it. It is by no means true in this country that persons who sleep on their rights are in all cases deprived of their property. A very strong example of that is to be found in the tender regard which the Legislature has always paid to the rights of holders of Government stock who do not come forward to claim their dividends. That is familiar to all who practice in the Chancery Division, and I think it is rather to such an example than to the case of the Statutes of Limitation in sanctioning such a scheme as this, regard ought to be had. So much as regards the general policy of the court in dealing with such schemes.

But now let us look at, and construe the agreement before us. I find that over £60,000 is set apart for a particular purpose for distribution in respect of 61,000 obligations issued by the company when and as soon as the holders thereof shall be duly ascertained, being at a certain rate per obligation, within fourteen days after presentation of the same for payment. That seems to me to imply that that fund should be set apart and distributed amongst the holders of those obligations, and that each holder has a right first of all to be ascertained, and secondly to have an opportunity of presenting his obligation. I am not differing with the Lord Justice that when once you have ascertained a holder it cannot be that it is not in the power of the court to make him exercise his option. It may be that a holder when ascertained may be in this position. The company may apply here—they may serve him with notice and ask in default of his making application within a limited period that the fund should be paid out to the company. That I think may be justified on the footing that when a person has abstained from electing in a particular way which he has a right to, he shall be held to have adhered to the rights which he has under his bond, and to have chosen to stand upon his bond rather than take the benefit which is given by the scheme. But I cannot think it is right that that should be applied until the holder has been ascertained, and has had an opportunity of ascertaining his rights for payment. It seems to me on the true construction of the compromise that we have no right to take away from any holder who has not been ascertained the fund which is provided for him. On that ground I agree with Rigby, L.J., and think that no order ought to be made.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY v. WHITE. (a.)

Pharmacy Act — Sale of poison — "Seller" — Orders transmitted by shopkeeper to duly registered vendor— Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), ss. 1, 15, 17.

An action to recover a penalty under section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, was brought in the county court against the defendant, who was a florist, for having sold a certain weed-killer, which contained a large quantity of arsenic, and was admittedly a poison within that section, the defendant not being a duly registered chemist.

The judge found as a fact the defendant acted only as agent for the chemical company who manufactured the weed-killer, and was in the position merely of a canvasser for orders, with authority to receive money on account of the company, and that the defendant was not the "seller" of the poison within the Act.

Held, that, as the county court judge had found as a fact that there was no contract of sale as between the defendant and the purchaser, and as there was some evidence to support that finding, the court could not interfere to set it aside.

Decision of the Divisional Court (48 W. R. 335, [1900] 1 Q. B. 454) affirmed.

Appeal by the Pharmaceutical Society from a decision of a Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.), affirming a judgment of the judge of the County Court of Worcestershire.

The action was brought under section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, to recover a penalty from the defendant White for selling a two-gallon drum of a certain weed-killer which was admittedly a poison within that section, he not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemists or chemist and druggist.

The defendant was a florist and seedsman carrying on business at Worcester, and his practice with reference to the sale of the weed-killer, which was manufactured by the Boundary Chemical Co. (Limited), of Liverpool, was, when asked for it by customers, to inform them that he did not keep it in stock and that they could either write direct to the Boundary Co. enclosing a remittance or he would himself take the money, give them a receipt, and forward their order on to the company. He had an arrangement with the company whereby he received a commission of 25 per cent. of the price of the weed-killer sold through him as agent.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that he was not the seller within the meaning of section 15 of the Pharmacy Act; and he found as facts that the defendant acted as agent only, and that he was in the position merely of canvasser for orders for the Boundary Chemical Co. with authority to receive money on their account.

The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the county court judge.

The society appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C. (T. R. Grey with him), for the plaintiffs.—By section 1 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, the sale of poisons by an unqualified person is unlawful. In the case of certain poisons—for example, arsenic—the vendor is to ask the purchaser the purpose for which he requires the poison, and must enter the circumstances of the sale in a book. This "weed killer" contains arsenic in such large proportions that a teaspoonful would be enough to kill two or three persons, and therefore it is not on mere academical grounds that a conviction is pressed for, but in order to prevent, if possible, the sale of these two-gallon drums to any person that likes to order one from any unregistered and irresponsible agent. The Act was passed to stop the very mischief that this way of carrying on business opens up. The contract of sale was complete when the order was taken by White and the money paid for the goods and the receipt given. Even if the contract was not then completed, but required the acceptance of the offer by the Liverpool firm and the delivery by them of the goods, the "seller," for the purposes of the Act, was White. There is a distinction between the person who sells and the person who ultimately has to make delivery. Section 1 makes the "sale" an offence, and White, having sold, not being duly qualified, is liable to a penalty under section 15. So, too, the "seller," within the meaning of section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, is defined by section 17 as the person who shall make the contract, and therefore again, as White made the contract, he is liable. There are many analogous cases under the Licensing Acts where the acts of the agent are treated as those of the principal—for example, Stallard v. Marks 26 W. R. 694, 3 Q. B. D. 412. The facts in this case differ from any that have been before the courts on this part of the Act, and the arguments in Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association, 28 W. R. 957, 5 App. Cas. 857, applied to these facts, are conclusively in favour of the plaintiff's contention that White must be deemed to be the person who actually sold within the meaning of the Act of 1868 to the purchaser the poison; even assuming the contract of sale was not completed until the Liverpool company had made delivery. In Pharmaceutical Society v. Wheeldon, 24 Q. B. D. 683, 38 W. R. Dig. 148, an unregistered assistant of a qualified chemist who in the absence of his master sold poison was held liable to a penalty under section 15. The words are perfectly clear, "Any person who shall sell poisons not being duly registered" commits an offence under the Act, and the appeal should therefore be allowed.

Cavanagh and W. W. Orr, for the defendant, were not heard.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case the Pharmaceutical Society appeal against a decision of the Divisional Court in an action heard in the county court which they brought against one White for selling poison contrary to the statute, and they claimed a penalty of £15. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that he was not "the seller" within the meaning of section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868. He found as facts that the defendant acted as agent only, and that he was in the position merely of canvasser for orders, for the Boundary Chemical Co., with authority to receive money on their behalf. If there is any evidence to support that finding of fact, then we cannot disturb the judgment, even although it may be a finding which we ourselves should not have found. [His lordship then read the shorthand notes of the evidence of the defendants given at the trial, and continued:] In the case of the Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association the House of Lords deals with the meaning of "seller" in this Act, the question there being whether a limited company could be a "seller." The decision which their lordships came to was that the word "person" in sections 1 and 15 did not include an incorporated company so as to make the defendants in that case liable to the penalty. But they pointed out that the actual seller must be a qualified person. Lord Selbourne, L.C., in his judgment said: "I will add that regard to the mischief which beyond all controversy the Act was intended to prevent, leads necessarily to the same conclusion—namely, that he who sells, whether he be master or servant, whether he be the principal or a person to whom the conduct and management of sales is delegated, is struck at by the 15th section; because, otherwise, a very wide door would be opened to the evils which the Act was intended to guard against. If it were otherwise, nothing would be necessary, according to the appellants' own argument, than that the business should belong to a person who does not himself carry it on, but who is qualified under the Act; and he might be at liberty to employ in the management of his business persons not qualified, by whom the actual sales would be conducted; and then the public would be exposed to all the dangers which the Act was passed to prevent. The statute, therefore, in order to be effectual must strike at the particular acts of those who actually conduct the sales, who actually compound the medicines; and it does strike at those acts." Again towards the close of his judgment Lord Selborne said that everyone whom a corporation employed would be penally answerable if he sold or compounded poisons or other medicines without having the required qualification. It is clear from the judgments of the law lords in that case that the person struck at by the Acts was the person who actually sold the poison. That was what the county court judge, in my opinion, meant when he found the facts as we have them from him, and when he said that White was not the seller—that is to say, the actual seller—within the meaning of the Act. That finding of fact this court cannot interfere with, as there was evidence, and, indeed, ample evidence, to support it. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I agree. I am content to decide this case on the short ground that the county court judge has found as a fact that there was no contract of any kind as between White and the buyer. I think the facts in this case go very near the line, and very nice considerations of law might have arisen if the case had been necessarily decided on other grounds — for instance, on the question whether there was any contract between the defendant and the purchaser; and, then, if there was such a contract, whether the transaction itself, when it came to be analyzed, fell within the Act. The question whether there was a contract of sale was one for the jury, and therefore for the county court judge sitting alone, to try questions of fact as well as of law. He found as a fact that there was no sale at all as between the defendant and the purchaser, for he said: "I find White acted only as agent, and was in the position merely of a canvasser for orders." As I said before, the circumstances go in this case very near the line constituting a contract, but, unless this court can say that upon the facts there is an irresistible inference of law that there was a contract, we cannot interfere with the conclusion to the contrary arrived at by the county court judge. It is clear, moreover, that had the case been tried by a jury, the judge would not have been justified in directing the jury that upon the facts they must find that there was a contract. Therefore, as the county court judge found as a fact no contract, I desire to express no opinion upon the question whether, if there had been such a contract of sale found, the case would come within the mischief aimed at by the Act so far as to render the defendant liable to the penalty.

ROMER, L.J.—I concur. I am not satisfied that the defendant entered into a contract with the purchaser that would bind the company—that would render them liable in damages if they refused to execute the order, which was forwarded on by White. That proposition is not established and the county court judge who had all the necessary evidence before him finds merely that White transmitted the orders he got to the Liverpool firm for them to deal with. I think he contemplated that the Liverpool firm was bound by the acts of White as their authorized agent, but he does not so find it.

Chan. Div. Cozens-Hardy, J. } Jan. 28-31; Feb. 1, 4-6, 21.

MARTTENS v. HILL. (a.)

Manor—Tenure of ancient demesne—Tenants—Freehold—Custom of manor—Fine on alienation—Quia Emptores (18 Edw. 1, c. 1)—Act of 8 Edw. 2 (Parliament Roll, vol. 1, p. 298).

A lord of the manor claimed a fine in respect of the alienation to, or purchase by, a defendant of a piece of land held to be within the ambit of the manor. The manor originally belonged to the Crown, and lands in it were held by the tenure of ancient demesne.

Held, that the freehold was in the tenants, and not in the lord.

Held, that the alleged custom, even if it could be proved, was bad in law, as it was inconsistent with the statute 18 Edw. 1, c. 1, Quia Emptores, and a statute of 8 Edw. 2 (Parliament Roll, vol. 1, p. 298).

This was an action brought to try the right of the plaintiff as lord of the manor and soke of Rothley, in the county of Leicester, to a fine of 1s. in the pound on the purchase-money paid by the defendant for certain property situate at Grimston known as The Wongs.

The plaintiff claimed (1) That the plaintiff is lord of the ancient Manor of Rothley.

(2) That The Wongs is within the ambit of the manor.

(3) That the Grimston tenants of the manor are only privileged copyholders, and that the freehold is in the plaintiff as lord.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(4) That by the custom of the manor all such tenants are bound to pay a fine of 1s. in the pound on alienation by way of sale to a "foreigner," or alternatively that the "foreigner" is bound to pay such a fine on entry.

(5) That the defendant is a "foreigner" within the meaning of the custom.

(6) That the custom is good in law.

It appeared from Domesday Book that William the Conqueror then held the Manor of Rothley and that King Edward the Confessor had held it.

To the manor pertained twenty members, of which Grimston was one.

"In Grimestone are three carucates of land, less one bovate and a half."

In these members there were stated to be "204 sockmanni, with 157 villani and 94 borderise, having four score and two ploughs, and they render among them all £31 8s. 1d."

The manor was therefore "ancient demesne," and the tenants had certain rights and privileges peculiar to that tenure.

The manor was granted by the Crown to the Templars, who had also the adjacent Manor of Dalby. Both manors continued in their hands until 1540, when they were vested by statute in the Crown.

In 1543 Henry VIII. granted to Henry Cartwright (inter alia) "all that the site of one Manor of Rothley." The grant included, not all the demesne lands of the manor, but only such as were then or late in the tenure or occupation of Humphrey Babington or his assigns under a twenty-nine years' lease from the Templars in 1530 reserving a rent of £6 13s. 4d. The grant to Cartwright was to hold in chief by the service of the thirtieth part of one knight's fee and rendering a yearly rent of 13s. 4d. in respect of the site of the manor.

In 1544 Henry VIII. granted the Manor of Dalby to Andrew Nowell to hold in chief. The Manor of Dalby included part of Grimston.

In 1553 Edward VI. granted certain lands in Grimston, part of the possession of the late monastery of Kyrkbybellers, to Wright and Holmes as of the Manor of East Greenwich in free socage and not in chief.

In 1561 Queen Elizabeth granted to Cave and Williams all her remaining lands in the vill of Rothley, and certain rents reserved on prior grants out of other lands in the vill, in free socage and not in chief.

In 1564 and 1576 certain lands in Grimston formerly belonging to the dissolved monastery of Launde and to the dissolved monastery of Kyrkbybellers were granted by Queen Elizabeth to persons through whom the plaintiff did not show title.

In 1590 Queen Elizabeth granted to Forcett and West certain land and rents in Grimston to hold in free and common socage.

In 1609 James I. granted to Sewall and others, through whom the plaintiff claimed, all the perquisites of courts of the lordship or preceptory of Rothley.

In 1670 Charles II. granted to Lord Hawley and others certain rents arising from that part of Grimston which was within the Manor of Dalby.

It appeared that manor courts had been held by the plaintiff's predecessors in title since 1576, if not earlier, without interruption except during a period from 1604 to 1675, when no court rolls were forthcoming.

It was recited in the Grimston Inclosure Act of 1765 that Thomas Babington, through whom the plaintiff claimed, was lord of the manor and soke of Rothley, and a good paper title was shown from the beginning of the last century.

Under the Inclosure Act of 1765 The Wongs (except a small portion) was allotted to a predecessor in title of the defendant, but there was no entry on the rolls of the court relating to The Wongs until 1825.

Micklem, K.C., E. A. Wurtzburg, and H. J. H. Mackay, for defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, J., found on the facts that the grant to Henry Cartwright in 1543 did not pass the manor, nor, on the other hand, did it extinguish the manor. But the lands granted were severed from the manor. Whatever passed to Cartwright was apparently vested in the plaintiff. The grant in 1561 to Cave and Williams did not pass the manor, but whatever was passed by that grant was apparently vested in the plaintiff. Neither was there anything in any of the other Crown grants which sufficed to pass the Manor of Rothley. On the other hand, it appeared that manor courts had been held by the plaintiff's predecessors in title since 1576, if not earlier, without interruption, except during a period from 1604 to 1675, when no court rolls were forthcoming. It was recited in the Grimston Inclosure Act of 1765 that Thomas Babington, through whom the plaintiff claimed, was lord of the manor and soke of Rothley, and a good paper title was shown from the beginning of the century. Under these circumstances he thought that the plaintiff had sufficiently established his title as lord of the ancient Manor of Rothley, notwithstanding the gaps above referred to. If necessary, a lost grant from the Crown must be presumed.

As to the second point, whether The Wongs was within the ambit of the Manor of Rothley, he thought he must hold that as against the defendant, and in the absence of any proof as to the boundaries of the manor, The Wongs was within the ambit of the manor.

Thirdly, what was the legal position of the tenants of the manor? The tenure in ancient demesne was in many ways peculiar, and it was not possible to reconcile all the authorities. The clearest and best description was contained in the third report of the Real Property Commissioners, pp. 12-14, of which the following was an extract: "There is great confusion in the law books respecting the tenure. All agree that it exists in those manors, and in those only, which belonged to the Crown in the reign of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror and in Domesday Book are denominated Terrae Regis. But the copyholders of those manors are sometimes considered tenants in ancient demesne, and land held in ancient demesne is said to pass by surrender and admittance. This appears to be inaccurate. It is only the freeholders of the manor who are truly tenants in ancient demesne, and land held in ancient demesne passes by common law conveyance without the instrumentality of the lord. The copyholders in an ancient demesne manor, like other copyholders, are merely to be considered as occupying a part of the lord's demesne, and do not not hold of the manor. They form the customary court. The court of ancient demesne, which is analogous to the court baron, is constituted by those who hold in socage of the lord of the manor. The tenants in ancient demesne, properly so-called, were made subject to certain restraints and entitled to certain immunities. They were forbidden to bring or defend any real action touching their tenements, except in the lord's court. In ancient demesne there are no subdivided or conflicting interests in the soil. The timber and minerals belong to the tenant, and the rents, fines, and services due to the lord are certain."

Applying this passage, his lordship thought the freehold was in the tenants, and not in the lord. But apart from that high authority, he arrived at the same conclusion for several reasons: (a) They are called "free tenants" in very early documents. (b) Their tenements ordinarily passed by feoffment, with livery of seisin, and not by surrender. (c) They used the writ of right close, which seems to have been only available for freeholders (Fitzherbert Natura Brevium, 11F). (d) They disposed of their tenement by will, without any surrender to the use of the will. (e) There is no trace of any claim by the lord, until quite modern times, to either timber or minerals; and, on the other hand, there are express dealings by the tenants with minerals. (f) The Inclosure Act of 1765 speaks of them as owners and proprietors who are seised in their land, and recognizes their right to trees growing on the land.

As to the fourth point, his lordship held that it was not proved that by the custom of the manor all the Grimston tenants were bound to pay a fine of 1s. in the pound on alienation by way of sale to a "foreigner," or that the "foreigner" was bound to pay such a fine on entry. It was also not proved that the defendant was a "foreigner" within the meaning of the alleged custom.

The last point was whether the alleged custom of paying a fine on alienation was good in law.

Now, if the freehold was in the tenants and not in the lords, as he thought it was, his lordship thought it was bad as inconsistent with the nature of the estate, and as a restraint upon alienation. The plaintiff was driven to rely, not on the comparatively modern 1s. in the pound composition, but upon an absolute right to prohibit alienation except to a person who was not a "foreigner," and to exact a fine as the price of the lord's assent to an alienation to a "foreigner." This was inconsistent with the statute 18 Edw. 1, Quia Emptores, which enacted that from thenceforth it should be lawful to every freeman to sell of his own pleasure his lands and tenements or part of them, so that the feoffee should hold the same lands or tenements of the same chief lords by the same services and customs as his feoffor held before. It was also inconsistent with an Act of Parliament of 8 Edw. 2, which was found in the Parliament Roll, vol. 1, p. 298, though not printed in the statute book, and which counsel for the plaintiff admitted to be or to have the effect of a statute. it enacted "that from henceforth none should demand or take any fine from freemen for entering upon the lands and tenements which are of their fee, so always that by such feoffment they be not losers of their services, nor that their services be denied." It was fairly urged that, by custom, a fine may be payable on the alienation of a freehold, but the only authority in support of this contention was a dictum in Damerell v. Prothero, 10 Q. B. 20, at p. 25. No such custom could, in his opinion, hold good against the express language of the statutes referred to. He did not pause to consider whether this custom was bad also for uncertainty. Thus far he had drawn no distinction between Rothley proper and Grimston, which was one of the members, but the defendant laid great stress upon the distinction. It seemed that in 1245 a composition and agreement was made between the Master of the Templars and the Reeve of Grimston for himself and for the men of the same vill (as also for the men of certain other members) in the following terms: "That they ought to increase their farm beyond the farm which they were wont to render to the Master of the Knights of the Temple in England, to wit, for every carucate of land which they hold in the aforesaid vills three shillings by the year for all works, tillages, and other villein customs which the said master exacted from them, and that they ought to come to the view of frank-pledge; and do suit at the court of the aforesaid Master of Rothley when any should be impleaded there by writ of the king of right, and when a robber is to be there indicted by afforcement of the court, and all those who are of the body (de corpore) of the Manor of Rothley ought to do suits and all other villein customs which before they were accustomed to do, to the same master, &c." This composition was entered on the rolls of the King's Court. Its validity was expressly acknowledged in 1285. In that year a writ was issued in the King's Court claiming a moiety of some land in Wantneby, one of the members, like Grimston, affected by the composition. The then Master of the Templars took proceedings before the justices in Eyre, at Leicester, to enforce his claim to exclusive jurisdiction. The court held that the composition had not "changed any estate of the same men in respect of the aforesaid custom of impleading, nor to them remitted or quit claimed the aforesaid custom." It was considered that the plaintiff should take nothing by his writ but be in mercy for false claim, and that he should sue by another writ of right close according to the custom of the manor if it seemed expedient to him. His lordship thought this decision did not have the effect which the plaintiff attributed to it. It only decided that the land being within the manor, the writ of right close must still be used. This was not a villein custom touched by the composition. It decided nothing beyond that. The defendant asserted (a) that any such custom as was alleged by the plaintiff was a "villein custom," which was expressly released by the composition, and that even if it were still in force in Rothley proper it was gone so far as Grimston was concerned. With this contention he agreed. The defendant also asserted (b) that the effect of the composition was to extinguish the ancient demesne tenure and to turn it into free and common socage. The case of Griffith v. Clarke, Moore 143, which was approved by Lord Ellenborough in Doe d. Reay v. Huntington, 4 East 271, at p. 290, tended to support this contention. But it was doubtful whether the decision of 1285 was consistent with the view that the land at Grimston was made frank free by the composition of 1245. It was remarkable that there was no entry of any alienation fine in Grimston prior to 1528, and that there were but few in Grimston until comparatively modern times, the great majority being in Rothley proper. Upon the whole he thought that even if the conclusion at which he had arrived was wrong as to Rothley proper, it was right as to Grimston, having regard to the composition of 1245. The result was that, in his opinion, the action failed, and judgment would be given for the defendant with costs.

In re SPINDLER AND MEARS' CONTRACT. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—"Notwithstanding intermediate or pending litigation"—Power to rescind—Notice to rescind pending proceedings—Costs.

(a) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The conditions of sale of certain property gave the vendors power to rescind the contract "if the purchaser shall insist on any objection or requisition which the vendors shall be unable or unwilling to comply with, and shall not withdraw the same after being required so to do, the vendors shall (notwithstanding any attempt to remove the same, or that there shall have been any intermediate or pending negotiation, proceeding, or litigation, and although they may have insisted that all or any of the objections and requisitions are or is untenable) be at liberty, by notice in writing signed by their solicitors, to rescind the contract, and shall thereupon return to the purchaser his deposit, but without any interest, costs of investigating the title, or other compensation or payment whatsoever." The vendors allowed a summons, taken out under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, by the purchaser for a declaration that his objections to the title had not been answered and that the title was defective, to be proceeded with after filing evidence and up to the moment of hearing, and then gave notice to rescind.

Held, that the vendors must pay the costs incurred up to the date of the notice to rescind.

On the 21st of May, 1900, the property, consisting of house and grounds, which was the subject of this action, was put up for sale by auction under conditions, one of which was as follows: "If the purchaser shall insist on any objection or requisition which the vendors shall be unable or unwilling to comply with and shall not withdraw the same after being required so to do, the vendors shall (notwithstanding any attempt to remove the same or that there shall have been any intermediate or pending negotiation, proceeding, or litigation, and although they may have insisted that all or any of the objections and requisitions are or is untenable) be at liberty, by notice in writing signed by their solicitors, to rescind the contract, and shall thereupon return to the purchaser his deposit, but without any interest, costs of investigating the title, or other compensation or payment whatsoever."

The property was not sold at the auction, but on the 19th of June, 1900, the plaintiff entered into a contract to purchase it subject to the particulars and conditions so far as they applied to a sale by private contract.

The abstract of title having been delivered, the plaintiff sent in voluminous requisitions, to which the vendors delivered answers, and the plaintiff, on the 20th of July, delivered replies to the answers.

On the 24th of July, the plaintiff took out this summons under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that the plaintiff's objections to the title had not been sufficiently answered and in particular that the title was defective on certain specified grounds, and for a return of his deposit moneys and costs.

The defendants were the vendors, who were trustees.

Both parties filed evidence, and the summons now came on for hearing, when counsel for the defendants stated that they had on that day required the purchaser to withdraw his requisitions and given him notice to rescind the contract.

J. G. Butcher, K.C., and W. F. Philpotts, for the purchaser.—The vendors must pay the costs of the summons up to the date of the notice to rescind: Duddell v. Simpson, 15 W. R. 115, L. R. 2 Ch. 102. The condition for rescission does not deprive the court of jurisdiction over costs, there being no express words: Isaacs v. Towell, [1898] 2 Ch. 285, 46 W. R. Dig. 170. The purchaser does not, of course, oppose rescission.

W. H. Upjohn, K.C., and E. Beaumont, for the vendors.—Duddell v. Simpson was different, for in that case there were two separate contracts as to different houses, and the purchaser's action succeeded as to one: see the report in the court below in 14 W. R. 418, L. R. 1 Eq. 578. The question of costs was neither argued nor mentioned in the judgments in the court below. In Isaacs v. Towell, Byrne, J., commented upon the absence of the words "notwithstanding any intermediate litigation," which are found here. The court here has no materials for going into the merits of the case, without which it cannot make an order as to costs. The power to rescind cannot be exercised after judgment: In re Arbib & Class's Contract, 39 W. R. 305, [1891] 1 Ch. 601.

J. G. Butcher, K.C., in reply, referred to Best v. Hamand, 27 W. R. 742, 12 Ch. D. 1.

FARWELL, J.—In this case the purchaser took out a summons under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, on the 24th of July last. The parties went into evidence. The summons came on for hearing yesterday, and counsel then stated that the vendors had that afternoon served the purchaser with a notice to rescind the contract, and they asked for the dismissal of the summons without costs. The question turns upon the wording of one of the conditions of sale. [Here his lordship read the condition as above.] That makes a case practically indistinguishable from that of Duddell v. Simpson. I cannot suppose that the two Lords Justices, in ordering the vendor to pay the costs in that case, overlooked the point arising on the construction of the condition. They decided that the vendor must pay the costs up to the time when he gave notice to rescind. I am bound by that decision. And upon the construction of this condition I think that, as the costs of investigating the title are specifically mentioned, the parties probably intended to exclude costs which are only payable under an order of the court. But, however that may be, I cannot refuse to follow a decision of the Court of Appeal merely because the Lords Justices did not fully state the grounds of their decision. Counsel for the vendors urged that there is nothing before me upon which I can decide the question of costs upon the merits. I cannot agree with him. I think it was very unreasonable on the vendors' part to let things go on until the summons was ready for hearing, and very hard upon the purchaser that the vendors should let him go on incurring all the costs and not make up their mind to rescind until the very last moment. These are quite sufficient grounds for making them pay the costs.

VIGERS v. SANDERSON. (a.)

Sale of goods—Rejection—Shipment—Passing of property—Goods not within the specification.

A contract for the sale of goods, to be of "about the specification" mentioned in the contract, provided that the goods were to be shipped in vessels to be provided by the purchasers, that the property in the goods was to be deemed to pass on shipment, and that, if any dispute arose as to the stipulations of the contract, the purchasers were not to reject the goods, but that the dispute was to be referred to arbitration.

Goods were shipped under the contract, 33 per cent. of which were neither within nor "about" the specification, nor commercially within its meaning.

Held, that the clause as to non-rejection did not operate so as to prevent the purchasers from rejecting the goods; that the acceptance of the goods by the captain of the ship did not pass the property, the captain being only the purchasers' agent to receive the goods for the purpose of carriage.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed for the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendants; alternatively, for damages for the non-acceptance by the defendants of bills of exchange.

By a contract in writing dated the 23rd of November, 1899, the plaintiffs sold to the defendants "the undermentioned about 225 standards wood goods of about the specification stated below" to be shipped at Wasa to Hull.

The contract provided that shiproom was to be provided by the buyers, and that payment was to be by approved acceptances of sellers' or authorized agents' drafts payable in London at four months from date of bill of lading or cash less 2½ per cent. on receipt of and in exchange for shipping documents.

The contract contained the following clauses: "Property in goods to be deemed for all purposes, except retention of vendor's lien for unpaid price, to have passed to buyers when goods put on board."

"Should any dispute arise under the stipulations of this contract impossible to settle by friendly arrangement, buyers shall not reject any of the goods nor refuse acceptance of draft or drafts, but the dispute shall be referred to two arbitrators of whom one is to be elected by each party with power to choose an umpire whose award on all points shall be final, the expenses to follow allowed."

The specification provided that the goods were to be sawn laths from 2½ft. to 4½ft. in length.

By a contract dated the 16th of December, 1899, the plaintiffs sold to the defendants a further parcel of sawn laths. This contract was in the same terms as the previous one, with the exception that the specification provided that the laths were to be from 2ft. to 4½ft. in length, but not more than 3 per cent. of 2ft. laths.

Parcels of goods, purporting to be in fulfilment of the two contracts, were shipped on board the steamship Ella, provided by the defendants; the bills of lading, specifying the number of bundles of various lengths, were sent to the defendants duly indorsed; and the plaintiffs drew on the defendants for the price of the goods. The shipment under the November contract contained 33 per cent. of laths 5ft. long. The shipment under the December contract contained about 60 per cent. of laths 2ft. long.

The defendants rejected both parcels, and refused to accept the drafts.

The plaintiffs contended that the property in the goods had passed to the defendants, and that they were not entitled to reject them; they admitted that an allowance would have to be made to the defendants in respect of the number of 2ft. laths in excess of 3 per cent., which allowance would have to be settled by arbitration; but the plaintiffs contended that the defendants had suffered no damage through receiving the 5ft. laths.

Evidence was given on which the learned judge found that neither 2ft. laths nor 5ft. laths were worth the contract price; the former were practically worthless, and the latter were difficult to sell in large quantities.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 1.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This action is brought to recover £1,307, the price of a quantity of sawn laths, sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants, or, in the alternative, damages for non-acceptance of the same. By two contracts, dated respectively the 23rd of November, 1899, and the 16th of December, 1899, the plaintiffs sold to the defendants two parcels of sawn laths, to be shipped at Wasa for Hull, of "about the specification stated below." The contracts contained provisions to the following effect: Shiproom was to be provided by the buyers; payment was to be made by cash or bills against documents; and if the goods were not taken within a certain time, then acceptances were to be given for an approximate amount; the property in the goods was to be deemed, for all purposes except retention of vendor's lien for unpaid price, to have passed to the buyers when goods were put on board; and if any dispute arose under the stipulations of the contracts, buyers were not to reject any of the goods nor refuse acceptance of the drafts, but the dispute was to be referred to arbitrators, whose award was to be final. The specification in the first contract was for laths of lengths varying from 2½ft. to 4½ft., and the specification in the second contract was for laths of lengths varying from 2ft. to 4½ft., but not more than 3 per cent. of 2ft.

Under these contracts, and in pretended fulfilment of them, two parcels of laths were shipped by or on behalf of the plaintiffs in The Ella, a ship provided by the defendants. The shipment under the earlier contract contained 33 per cent. of laths 5ft. long (a length not mentioned in the specification); and the shipment under the later contract contained about 60 per cent. of laths 2ft. long, instead of not more than 3 per cent. The defendants rejected the goods and refused to accept the drafts. The question is whether the rejection was justifiable. On the one hand the plaintiffs say that the defendants must take the goods subject to an allowance for any loss due to the failure to comply with the specifications. On the other hand the defendants say that the goods are not what they bought, and, therefore, that they are not bound to accept them. I have heard evidence as to the value of laths 2ft. long, and as to the value of laths 5ft. long, and I find as a fact that neither length is worth the contract price; the former is practically worthless and the latter is very difficult to sell in large quantities, and requires more labour in handling than the shorter lengths. Neither shipment can, in my opinion, be regarded as in any sense a compliance with the contract, unless the clause as to non-rejection is sufficient to make it so. The plaintiffs say it is. They say that it is competent for them to disregard the specification altogether and to ship laths of any lengths, even of lengths wholly outside the specification, and to require the defendants to take and pay for such goods subject to an allowance. They rely on the words "should any dispute arise, buyers shall not reject any of the goods."

I am not disposed myself to give to these words the meaning contended for. It is not the meaning which the parties ever intended should be put upon them, and it is a meaning which might, and in the present case would, have the effect of forcing the buyer to take goods which did not in any sense represent what he wished to buy. The main object of these contracts was to effect a sale, and to secure a delivery of two parcels of goods commercially within the description in the specifications; the goods are to be "the undermentioned parcel of goods of about the specification stated below," and at the bottom of the contracts are set out the specifications. The clauses of the contracts must be read and interpreted consistently with this main object, and not so as to destroy it. What, then, is the meaning to be put on the clause as to non-rejection. It is in my view no more than this. In a business of this kind there is almost of necessity some departure from the strict figures of the specification, and the departure may be such as to make it doubtful whether the shipper has adhered sufficiently closely to the stipulation that the goods shall be of "about" the specification lengths. In such a case the clause as to non-rejection comes into operation. It does not operate so as to force the buyer to take goods which are neither within nor about the specification, nor commercially within its meaning. I am fortified in my construction of the contracts by the view which the plaintiffs themselves took of the matter when the shipments came forward. The plaintiffs had themselves bought the goods of other vendors, and, when the defendants in this action refused to accept, the plaintiffs wrote two letters to their vendors. In these letters the plaintiffs set up the right to reject the goods which are not in accordance with the specification on the ground that they are goods "which they did not buy." I think they were justified in taking up this position towards their vendors, and it follows that they cannot complain that their purchasers are doing the same. I may add in this connection that the defendants have always been ready and willing to take and pay for such part of the goods as came within the specification, but the plaintiffs have refused to allow this, insisting on the defendants accepting the whole of both lots.

Two other points were taken by the plaintiffs. It was said that by the terms of the contract the property in the goods had passed on shipment, or, in the alternative, that the property had passed by reason of the defendants having accepted the goods by receiving them on board their ship, and that, therefore, the defendants must keep the goods and be satisfied with an allowance in respect of their inferiority. I think there is nothing in either of these points. The provision in the contract as to the passing of the property only applies to a shipment of goods which come within the meaning of the contract; it cannot apply to any others; and the receipt of the goods by the captain is no acceptance at all of the goods as a delivery under the contract. The captain of the ship is merely an agent to receive the goods for the purpose of carriage; he knows nothing of the contract of purchase, and is not an agent to accept delivery under it.

LINAKER v. PILCHER, HEWLETT, AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Trade union — Newspaper carried on to further the interest of union—Ultra vires—Libel—Trustees sued as registered proprietors—Damages—Liability of funds of union to indemnify trustees for damages and costs—Trades Union Act,* 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), ss. 8, 9.

The trustees of a trade union were registered as the proprietors of a newspaper printed and published to further the interests of the members of the trade union. A libel upon the plaintiff appeared in the newspaper which the trustees had not authorized the publication of. The plaintiff sued the defendants as the trustees of the union, and recovered damages and costs.

Held, that, as the property in the newspaper was vested in the trustees, they were liable, and were entitled to be indemnified out of the funds of the society.

Held, also, that the carrying on of the newspaper was not ultra vires.

Further consideration.

This was an action brought by Henry Linaker, district superintendent of the North-eastern Manchester district of the London and North-Western Railway Co., against John Pilcher as representative proprietor, Hewlett and Alcock together sued as the trustees of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, and Mr. George J. Wardle, editor, to recover damages for libel.

The libel complained of was contained in an open letter to Lord Stalbridge, chairman of the London and North-Western Co., and imputed inter alia that the plaintiff was oppressive in his treatment of the men under his control, and that he was intoxicated on the occasion of the opening of the new Buxton and Ashbourne line on the 1st of August, 1899.

The defendants pleaded that the charges were true in substance and in fact. They further said they could not be sued so as to bind the property of the society.

The jury awarded the plaintiff £1,000.

Judgment was postponed for further consideration on the question whether the plaintiff could recover the damages awarded and costs out of the funds of the society.

The following facts were admitted or proved at the trial:

The Railway Review was registered in 1894 under the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881, in the names of the three trustees as proprietors, and in and since 1895 was registered in the name of the defendant Pilcher as representative proprietor. It was described as printed and published at 72, Acton-street, Gray's-inn-road, which was the head office of the Amalgamated Society.

On the question of whether the carrying on of the the newspaper by the society was ultra vires the following sections were cited of the Trades Union Act, 1872:

Section 2 of Schedule I. is as follows: "The whole of the objects for which the trade union is to be established, the purposes for which the funds thereof shall be applicable . . ." are "matters to be provided for by the rules of trades unions registered under this Act."

Section 14 provides that the rules of every trade union shall set forth these particulars.

Section 2 of the first rule of the society was as follows: "The objects of the society shall be to improve the condition and protect the interests of its members; to endeavour to obtain and maintain reasonable hours of duty and fair rates of wages; to promote a good understanding between employers and employed, the better regulation of their relations and the settlement of disputes between them by arbitration, or, failing arbitration, by other lawful means; to provide temporary assistance to members when out of employment through causes over which they have no control or through unjust treatment; to provide legal assistance when necessary in matters pertaining to the employment of members, or for securing compensation for members who suffer injury by accidents in their employment occasioned by the negligence of their employer or of those for whom their employer is liable; to aid the young orphan children of all members; and to use every effort to provide for the safety of railway works and railway travelling. Also to provide a grant of money in case of members permanently disabled or killed by accident, or when by reason of old age they cannot follow their regular employment. Also to enable such members as voluntarily desire it to provide funds for their relief in sickness or temporary disablement and for their respectable interment."

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C. (with him Joseph Walton, K.C., and L. Sanderson), for the plaintiff.—The Railway Review is a newspaper registered in the name of the defendants as the trustees of the society, and the ordinary regulations of the Trade Union Act, 1871, therefore apply. By section 8 the property of trade unions is to be vested in trustees, and section 9 gives such trustees power to bring or defend actions in any court of law "touching or concerning the property, right, or claim to property of the trade union." The society by its rules is made liable for the acts of its trustees. By section 2 of the first rule of the society (cited above) it is clear the trustees may carry on a newspaper provided its object is the furtherance of the interests of the society. There is no question here that the Review is run solely in the interest of the members of the union.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (Horridge, K.C., and Clem Edwards with him), for the trustees.—The funds of the society cannot be made liable for a tort committed by the trustees. [MATHEW, J.—The trustees acted in a representative capacity throughout. The society could not be registered as proprietor.] Dealing with the question on the footing that the newspaper is the property of the union, then I say it is ultra vires for a trades union to own a newspaper. The first rule (2) of this society (q.v.) is the only one that the plaintiff could find that in any possible way could be turned into giving a power to the trustees to carry on the newspaper. But it is stretching the simple words there indicating the objects of the society beyond a reasonable degree to say that this rule enables the trustees to do so. It not being one of the authorized objects of the society, the loss that the verdict would throw upon the members cannot be properly met out of the funds since the fund cannot be attached for an act of the trustees that has been ultra vires: see section 23 of the Act of 1871 as modified by section 16 of the Trades Union Act, 1876. It has recently been held that a trades union cannot be sued as such, and a fortiori its trustees cannot be entitled to be indemnified out of the funds when condemned in damages. It is a straining of language to speak of a libel action against a man as an action "touching his property," and to hold so would be virtually to sweep away the statutory restrictions and practically to overrule the decision of the Court of appeal in The Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, ante, p. 101, [1901] 1 Q. B. 170. Assuming that the newspaper is the property of the trustees, and that the trustees could properly be the proprietors of it, the funds of the union are not answerable for a tort committed by the trustees, for the officials of a union are not servants of the union so as to make the members liable for a tort in which they take no part: Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 321. [1893] 1 Q. B. 435; Flood v. Jackson, 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 2 Q. B. 21.

Joseph Walton, K.C., in reply.—As trustees the defendants treated the Railway Review as the property of the society, and it so appeared in the balance-sheet.

Robson, K.C., Montague Lush, and E. Browne represented other defendants.

His lordship reserved judgment.

Feb. 11.—MATHEW, J.—The action was brought to recover damages for libel, three of the defendants being the trustees of a trade union. The sole point of law which I have now to deal with is whether there was a liability—for which it was assumed for the purposes of this case that these defendants as proprietors of the newspaper in question were responsible—on the funds of the society to indemnify these defendants. By their pleadings the defendants had taken the point that as a matter of law they could not in this action be sued in their capacity as trustees of the interests of the union, nor in any way so as to bind the property of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. The Railway Review was started about the year 1894, and an endeavour was made in the first instance to register it as the property of the society. But the Board of Trade objected to the inconvenience of that course, because of the very large number of persons who belonged to the society; and it was ultimately arranged that the newspaper should be only registered in the names of the trustees of the society. In that way the names of the defendants appear on the record. Under the 8th and 16th sections of the Trades Union Act, 1871, the property of the society became vested in trustees, and they were bound to publish annual reports showing the position of the affairs of the society. In these returns the newspaper was treated as an asset of the society, and the profit and loss account shows that it was carried on at a slight loss. It was said by the plaintiff that the defendants were in the ordinary position of those who had a liability cast upon them within the limits of their trust by reason of their position as trustees. In reply, it was submitted that this was an action of tort; that the persons who appeared in the action were alone responsible; and that there was no right of recourse to the property of the cestuis que trustent, and no right to claim any indemnity from the society. There was no evidence that the trustees had anything to do with the conduct of the paper. It was said that if the Trade Union Act, 1871, was carefully examined there would appear to be clear indications that it was never intended to make the trade union responsible in respect of a cause of action against their trustees unless it came within the limits of the trust. Section 9 of the Act gave the trustees power to bring and defend actions "touching or concerning the property, right, or claim to property of the trade union." It was said that this was for the protection of trade unions, and, if so, it would follow that for any breach of contract or tort for which the trustees were liable the union would enjoy complete immunity. It was said that it was noticeable that all that the trustees were empowered to do under this section was to bring or defend an action respecting the property, right, or claim to property of the trade union. It was said that this meant specific property—e.g., goods or land, and that as this was not an action in respect of specific property the liability would rest where it fell, and could not be transferred to the trade union. This seems to me to be an extremely narrow construction of the section. There seems to me to be no reason why this disability should be imposed on the trustees in respect of any but specific property, and I am satisfied that there could be no such intention on the part of the Legislature. Reference has been made to certain dicta in the Court of Appeal in the case of the Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, where it was suggested by a learned judge during the course of the argument that "property" meant "specific property," but my attention has also been called to another part of the argument where the same learned judge had expressed the opposite view. [His lordship, having deprecated the practice of referring to the remarks made by judges during the course of an argument, as they merely expressed what was passing in their minds at the moment, continuing, said:] I myself think that "property" means property generally, and that an action for a breach of contract entered into on behalf of the society would be an action touching their property, and likewise an action for damages for tort would be an action touching the property of the society. It follows that the construction put on the section by the defendants is not the correct one. The last point, which was a curious one in view of the character of these associations, was that to start a newspaper was ultra vires. No doubt there may be an analogy in this respect between the society and a company, but if one looks at the rules and objects of the society it falls within them, for the second section of the first rule says that the object of the society shall be to improve the condition and protect the interests of its members. It was said that section 23 of the Act of 1871 and section 16 of the Trades Union Act, 1876, cut down the rights of the society. The sections have no such operation as was suggested. This paper was started to protect the interests of members of the society. It was only necessary to look at the paper to see how thoroughly it devoted itself to this purpose, and that its main object was that indicated by the rule in question. The case of Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants only shows that one could not treat a trade union as a corporate body, and it throws no light on the present question. My judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff for £1,000 and costs, and I hold that the defendants in their position as trustees are entitled to be indemnified out of the funds of the society. The judgment will be against the trustees and Wardle, the editor.

Execution stayed with a view to an appeal.

VESTRY OF FULHAM v. MINTER. (a.)

Metropolis—New street—Paving expenses—Open space—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 105, 250—Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 35), s. 1—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), s. 5—Open Spaces Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32), s. 6—London Open Spaces Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. lxxi.), s 25.

By virtue of section 1 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1877, and section 6 of the Open Spaces Act, 1887, metropolitan vestries have power to acquire open spaces of land within their parishes, and to hold the same "in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation."

By section 5 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, metropolitan vestries have power to acquire open spaces of land "in trust to allow, and with a view to, the enjoyment by the public of such open space . . . in an open condition, free from buildings . . . and for no other purpose."

By the London Open Spaces Act, 1893, the vestry may "erect and maintain on any of the open spaces belonging to them or under their control buildings for the accommodation of keepers, constables, and other persons employed by them in connection with the maintenance and management of such open spaces and also such other convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they may think requisite for the purposes of exercise and recreation and for refreshment-rooms, band-stands, conveniences, and for other like purposes."

An open space of land was conveyed to a metropolitan vestry in 1894 "to the end and intent that it should at all times be kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation." In pursuance of the powers given by the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1893, the vestry erected on the land a band-stand, a cloak-room, and a refreshment stall. They let the refreshment stall to a caterer and the seats near the band-stand to a contractor.

Held, that the land must be deemed to have been acquired under the more beneficial Acts of 1877 and 1887, and not under that of 1881, and that the vestry were "owners" of the land within the meaning of the Metropolis Local Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, and were liable to contribute to the expenses of paving a new street on which the land abutted.

Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

The respondent was summoned for refusing or neglecting to pay the sum of £228, the sum charged upon him as the owner of certain houses or lands abutting upon a new street known as Bishop's Park-road, Section 1, under an apportionment of the expenses of paving works to be carried on in the said new street under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and the other Acts of Parliament amending the same.

Upon the hearing of the summons the following facts were proved or admitted:

Bishop's Park-road, Section 1, was a new street within the parish of Fulham. On the north-west side thereof it was bounded by a row of houses, on the south-east by an open space called Bishop's Park.

This land was bought on the 15th of November, 1894, by the appellants under a conveyance wherein the land was conveyed to them in fee simple "to the end and intent that it should at all times thereafter be kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise or recreation." Part of the land thereby conveyed abutted on the south-eastern side of the new street. The land was acquired by the appellants under the powers conferred upon them by the Open Spaces Acts.

The appellants had erected on the land in pursuance of the powers given by the London Open Spaces Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. lxxii), a band-stand, a cloak-room, and a refreshment stall. The appellants let the refreshment stall at a rent of £25 per annum to a caterer. The band-stand was not let, but seats for the public were let by the vestry to a contractor at a rental.

On the 17th of January, 1900, the appellants resolved to pave the new street in question, and to apportion the estimated cost of so doing upon the owners of the houses and lands abutting thereon. The respondent was the owner of Nos. 1, 3, and 6, Bishop's Park-road, which abutted upon the new street, and by this apportionment £228 was charged upon him. This sum was duly demanded, and the respondent refused to pay. The apportionment proceeded upon the basis that the cost of paving the new street should be defrayed by the owners of the houses and land on the north-west side thereof, and not in any part by the owners of the land on the south-east side thereof.

It was contended on the part of the respondent that the apportionment was invalid for that a part of the cost of paving ought to have been apportioned upon the appellants as owners of the open space abutting upon the south-east side of the new street.

It was contended upon the part of the appellants that the apportionment was valid, and that the open space being extra commercium, or subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprived the appellants of the beneficial use of it, was not liable to contribute.

The magistrate dismissed the summons, holding that the appellants were the owners of the land on the south-east side of the new street, and that the apportionment was therefore bad, inasmuch as the appellants were not included as contributories to the expense of paving the new street.

Macaskie, for the appellants.—By section 105 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, it is provided that the owners of the houses forming a new street which the vestry has deemed it expedient to pave shall pay to the vestry the estimated expenses of such paving. By section 250 the word "owner" is defined to mean "the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the land or premises in connection with which the word is used . . . or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent." Section 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Act, 1862, extends the liability for the expenses to the owner of land "bounding or abutting on" the new street. The land in respect of which it is sought to make the appellants liable to contribute to the expenses of paving the new street was acquired under the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, and the buildings were erected thereon under the provisions of the London Open Spaces Act, 1893. Under the circumstances the land is within the class of cases in which such land has been held to be extra commercium, and the authority in whom it was vested has been held not to be "owners" so as to be liable to contribute towards the expense of paving a new street on which it abutted. This rule has been held to apply to a church and the land on which it is built: see Angell v. Vestry of Paddington, 16 W. R. 1167, L. R. 3 Q. B. 714; Plumstead Board of Works v. Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 39 W. R. 700, [1891] 2 Q. B. 361; Wright v. Ingle, 34 W. R. 220, 16 Q. B. Dig. 114, it was held that the London County Council were not rateable in respect of a public park acquired by them under circumstances similar to those under which the appellants acquired the land in question.

Bray, Q.C. (B. A. Cohen with him), for the respondent.—The appellants are "owners" of the land in question within the very words of section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855. They have not only power to let the land and buildings erected thereon, but they actually do let them. There is nothing to prevent them making a profit out of the land in other ways, such as selling the turf or putting up advertisements. The land is not, therefore, extra commercium.

Counsel referred to Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. The London Cemetery Co., 42 W. R. 446, [1894] 1 Q. B. 699.

BRUCE, J.—In this case I think that the decision of the learned magistrate was right. I think that the principle of the cases which have been cited is this: Where there exists land or houses abutting upon a new street, the person who receives the rent, or who if rent were payable would receive it, and who is the owner within the meaning of the definition of owner given in the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, is liable to contribute to the expenses of paving the new street. To that proposition the following exception has been established, that where the premises, whether land or houses, are of such a character that they are struck with a legal incapacity of ever being used or let at a rack-rent, that incapacity being of a permanent character and of such a kind as to affect the nature of the property, then the property is not property of which there can be an owner within the meaning of the statute. That is the substance of the definition in Wright v. Ingle. I refer also to the definition given by Lord Watson in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, where he says, "The person vested with the property of heritable subjects which have been placed extra commercium, or are subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprives him of their beneficial use, is not an owner of land within the meaning of section 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment Act, 1862." Unless the land or houses are brought within one of these definitions—unless, that is, they are struck with an incapacity to let, or, I should say, an incapacity to be used beneficially—they are liable to contribute to the expenses of the new street. I do not think that the land in question is struck with any such incapacity. It is conveyed to be kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation, and for no other purpose. But it seems to me that that is not a burden which deprives the vestry of the beneficial use of the property. They possess power to erect and maintain on the open space buildings for the accommodation of keepers, constables, and other persons employed by them in connection with the maintenance of the open space; also such convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they may think requisite for the purpose of exercise and recreation and for refreshment-rooms, band-stands and conveniences, and other like purposes, provided that the consent of the county council be first obtained. So that they have power to do many things which are not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the place as an open space for the public. They may build a gardener's cottage, and the gardener who is attending to the open space may live there. It may be said that they are not entitled to charge a rent for his living there. I do not know whether that is so or not, but the occupation of the cottage would be a beneficial occupation, because it would be taken into account in fixing the amount of his wages. Again, with regard to the band-stand, although no charge could be made to the public for listening to the band or for entering the ground, it is possible that a beneficial occupation should arise by the bandmaster paying for the privilege of soliciting contributions from the public. So with regard to the refreshment-room; that room is let, and the vestry do derive a sum of £25 a year for the use of it. There, again, is a beneficial occupation. And so, I think, in many ways the vestry might derive, consistently with the terms on which they hold this land, a beneficial occupation, and it cannot be said that the land is extra commercium, or that, although it is dedicated to the use of the public, the vestry are prohibited from obtaining any profit from it.

Then it was said by Mr. Macaskie that the vestry could not let it at a rack-rent. Letting at a rack-rent, I think, merely means that the land is let for the best return that can be obtained for it. But I shall adopt the dictum of Collins, J., in Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. London Cemetery Co. In considering the question of a rack-rent he says: "But where the owners are entitled by statute to use it beneficially, receiving as profit a lump sum which is equivalent to a rack-rent, the land is not extra commercium. It would be too narrow a conclusion that because the reditus is not received in the shape of rack-rent, the land is placed extra commercium, and the owners are not owners within the meaning of the statute. Therefore I think here there is a beneficial occupation, and, there being a beneficial occupation, I think the vestry are the owners of the land within the meaning of the definition given of owners, and that they are liable to contribute to the expenses of making up the new street.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. By the joint effect of the two Metropolis Management Acts the owners of houses and lands bounding or abutting upon a new street are bound to pay to the vestry expenses of paving and the other expenses of making up the new street; and the owner means the person who is for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or houses in connection with which the words are used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if the lands or premises were let at a rack-rent. The very large and general words of that section have been limited by decisions to this extent, and this extent only, that if the lands or premises are for all time incapable of being beneficially used, they are not to be treated as lands which are or could be let at a rack-rent. At one time I thought perhaps the right thing was to say, "If the lands could never be let at a rack-rent," but the decision in Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. The London Cemetery Co., and I think the language of Lord Watson in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, point to the fact that that is too narrow a view. They must be, as Bowen, L.J., points out with regard to buildings (the same would be true of land), physically capable of beneficial enjoyment—profitable enjoyment. They must be also legally capable of profitable enjoyment. If those two conditions are satisfied then the lands fall into the ordinary category and are lands abutting on the new street which have an owner; and if there is an owner in this case there is no question it must be the vestry.

Now the question is, is this land capable of any profitable or beneficial enjoyment? I agree that it is not capable of much, and that some of the suggestions, possibly some I made myself, are rather strained and fanciful; but the fact remains, first of all, that actually at this moment a portion of the land is beneficially enjoyed; and secondly, that beneficial and profitable enjoyment can to some extent be got possibly out of every particle of the land. I quite agree that primarily the use for which the land is destined is for the recreation and enjoyment of the public. Nothing must interfere with that, but consistently with that, sometimes really assisting that, there may be uses out of which profit can be derived.

Mr. Macaskie in his argument, for which we are much indebted to him, has contended that the vestry is restricted by the express provisions of section 5 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881. It is not necessary to consider whether if the section did apply it would have all the restrictive force which he contends for, because this land is, in my opinion, and in the opinion of my learned brother, as I understand, not to be deemed to be acquired under that Act, but under the more beneficial Acts of 1877 and 1887, and I repeat again what I said in the course of the argument, that there is, in my opinion, excellent good sense, as there always was in every expression of the late Sir George Jessel, when in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, he says, "If a public body was enabled to exercise public powers under either of the two statutes it was to be deemed, if there was any difference in respect of the two, to take it under the statute under which they took most beneficially." Therefore I am of opinion that this vestry must be taken to have acquired this land under the Acts of 1877 and 1887. It is possible that the Act of 1881 and the powers acquired under it remain for the purpose of acquiring churchyard cemeteries and burial grounds, and it is very possible that under no other Act can the vestry take such open spaces. It may very well be that when they take such open spaces sentiment, apart from other reasons, may make it desirable that they should make no money out of those particular open spaces, and therefore with regard to those particular spaces they may be specially restricted. We have not to consider that here, because they take under the general powers, and taking under the general powers they have the powers which all owners have except so far as they are restricted. They are restricted by the trust, and that is the only restriction we ought to look at. No doubt they are also restricted by the fact that the vestry being a public body can only spend its money upon certain definite objects, and would be proceeding ultra vires if it embarked in trade or similar enterprizes. But I do not think we ought to take that into consideration. The question we have to consider is whether the land can be beneficially used, and not whether the particular owner at the moment can beneficially use it. It may be that the vestry could beneficially use it in many ways besides those which my learned brother has pointed out. Certainly they do use it in some ways at present. Any hardship which might follow from this land being deemed to be liable to contribute to the expenses of making up the new street can be got over. The vestry may themselves, acting fairly and reasonably—and not acting unfairly—make a separate minor assessment upon the land to that which they make upon the houses. It is clear that the land of the park is by no means so profitable as the opposite land of the houses, but it does bring in, within the view of the Act, some profit to its owners, the vestry, and therefore to some extent it ought to contribute, in my opinion, to the paving of the new street. Therefore the assessment which was made upon the respondent in this case, which did not take into consideration any contribution by the vestry as the owners of the park, was a bad assessment, and the learned magistrate was right in dismissing the information.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — March 1, 4, 5; April 1.

MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL CO. v. MANCHESTER RACECOURSE CO. AND TRAFFORD PARK ESTATES CO. (a.)

Contract—Illegality—Statutory confirmation—Vendor and purchaser—Agreement to give "first refusal" of land—Purchaser with notice—Injunction.

Where an agreement is confirmed by Act of Parliament, the effect is to give it statutory validity, so that no question as to remoteness or uncertainty can arise.

Where a contract so confirmed stipulates that B. shall have the first refusal of A.'s land, A. cannot sell the land without first informing B. of the actual cash price offered by an intending purchaser, and offering it to B. at that price.

Such a stipulation does not create an interest in the land, but it involves a negative contract not to part with the land to any other person without giving that first refusal, and can be enforced, not only against the vendor, but against an intending purchaser with notice.

Decision of Farwell, J. ([1900] 2 Ch. 352), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported [1900] 2 Ch. 352, 48 W. R. Dig. 49), by which the learned judge held that the defendant Racecourse Co. were not entitled to enter into any contract for the sale and purchase of the Manchester racecourse with any person or corporation other than the plaintiffs without first complying with the provisions of an agreement made between the plaintiffs and the Manchester Racecourse Co, and granted an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying out any contract for the sale and purchase of the racecourse in violation of that agreement.

The plaintiff company was incorporated by the Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1885, for the purpose of making a canal between the Mersey at Eastham and Manchester, and for the construction of docks, railways, and subsidiary works.

At the Manchester end the canal and docks lie in part between the racecourse belonging to the Manchester Racecourse Co. and the land of the Trafford Co., who purchased the Trafford Park Estate for development purposes in 1897.

Before 1893 there had been various disputes and differences between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Co., and in order to settle and determine those disputes an agreement, dated the 7th of March, 1893, was entered into between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Co.

By section 10 of the Manchester Ship Canal (Surplus Lands) Act, 1893, that agreement, which was set forth in the schedule to the Act, was confirmed and declared to be valid and binding on the parties thereto.

By clause 3 of the agreement it was provided: "If and whenever the lands and hereditaments belonging to the Racecourse Co. and now used as a racecourse shall cease to be used as a racecourse, or should the aforesaid lands and hereditaments be at any time proposed to be used for dock purposes, then and in either of such cases the Racecourse Co. shall give to the Canal Co. the first refusal of the aforesaid lands and hereditaments en bloc."

The plaintiffs alleged that on the 10th of August, 1899, the Racecourse Co. were expressly notified of the intention of the plaintiffs to apply to Parliament for power to acquire the racecourse for dock purposes, and that before that date the Racecourse Co., had not negotiated with any other person or corporation with a view to the sale of the racecourse.

Negotiations then followed between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Co., which need not be set out in detail, and on the 20th of October, 1899, the chairman wrote the following letter on behalf of the Racecourse Co. to the plaintiffs: "Referring to the overtures lately made by you through your agent, Mr. Wallis, for the purchase of our property at New Barns, Salford, at present used as the Manchester Racecourse, and to the interviews which have recently taken place between Mr. Wallis and myself as the chairman of the Racecourse Co., in which your desire to purchase the property subject to certain conditions expressed by Mr. Wallis, my company think it well to repeat in writing the terms already stated by me to Mr. Wallis on which we are willing to sell to you the property. The conditions which I understood Mr. Wallis to accept as the basis of negotiations are (1) that we should have reasonable time within which to prepare for the continuance of our racing business on the site belonging to us at Castle Irwell, and (2) that the sale should be subject to the necessary licence being obtained for that purpose from the Jockey Club. Subject to the above two conditions we are prepared to sell to you the fee simple of our property at New Barns, containing a little over ninety-nine acres, for the sum of £350,000. I shall be obliged by your informing me within one week from this date whether or not the offer is accepted, and if not accepted, by your stating what is the highest sum you are prepared to give for the property subject to the above-mentioned conditions."

The plaintiffs alleged that when this offer was made the Racecourse Co. were in negotiation for the sale of the property to the Trafford Park Co. on other terms than those mentioned.

On the 27th of October, 1899, the plaintiffs replied to the following effect: "You have been informed of the intention of this company to apply to Parliament forthwith for compulsory powers to acquire your company's property at New Barns, Salford, at present used as a racecourse; but, in view of your suggesting that the negotiations for the purchase of the property should be continued, we venture to hope that a satisfactory price will be arrived at in a friendly spirit, and that there will be no need to have recourse to compulsory process in arranging terms between the parties."

This letter was answered on the 30th of October by the chairman of the Racecourse Co. in these terms: "My letter was written not with a view that the negotiations should be continued, but that they should result in an agreement or come to an end, as my company have other applications for the property. As, therefore, you have not accepted our offer or made any counter proposal, I now write to say that my company feel at liberty to deal with their property as they may think fit."

On the 8th of November, 1899, the plaintiffs issued a formal notice of their intention to take the racecourse for dock purposes.

The defendants, the Racecourse Co., admitted that on the 22nd of December, 1899, they had entered into an agreement by which they were to sell the racecourse to the Trafford Park Co. for £280,000 cash, but that agreement was expressed to be subject to the rights of the plaintiff company under the agreement of the 7th of March, 1893, and it was provided that the vendors should have the right to continue in occupation of the racecourse, free of rent, until the 31st of December, 1909, and also that the Racecourse Co. should have the option of acquiring a racecourse on the property of the Trafford Park Co., an option which the defendants alleged to be of great value.

Farwell, J., held that, as the agreement of the 7th of March, 1893, had been confirmed by section 10 of the Act of 1893, and declared to be valid and binding on the parties thereto, it was made valid in toto, and therefore clause 3 was not open to the objection (to which it would otherwise have been open) that it violated the rule against perpetuities. His lordship also held that clause 3 had come into operation, because the plaintiff company had proposed to use the racecourse for dock purposes. Consequently, the Racecourse Co. were bound to give the plaintiffs the first refusal of their land en bloc. His lordship further held that "refusal" implied an offer, and that the offer contemplated by the agreement was an offer at a cash price which someone else was willing to give. In his lordship's opinion no such offer had ever been made to the plaintiff company. It would have been impossible for the plaintiffs to accept the terms offered by the Trafford Co. to the Racecourse Co. The plaintiffs had under their agreement an interest in the land, and the court had jurisdiction to interfere. His lordship accordingly granted an injunction restraining the Racecourse Co. from selling the racecourse to any person or company without first offering it to the plaintiffs at the same cash price as the intending purchaser was willing to give, and restraining both the defendants from carrying out the agreement of the 22nd of December, 1899, until this had been done.

Both the defendant companies appealed.

Warrington, K.C., Hughes, K.C., and A. L. Ellis, for the Racecourse Co., contended that the effect of the Act of 1893 was merely to remove any question of ultra vires and did not give validity to every clause of the agreement. Clause 3 was therefore void for remoteness and uncertainty. If valid neither of the events bringing it into play had happened. The Canal Co. had in fact been given the first refusal, since the option given by the Trafford Park Co. was worth more than £100,000, so that the actual consideration for their purchase was over £350,000.

Upjohn, K.C., and Stewart Smith, for the Trafford Park Co., contended that the Canal Co. had no remedy against them, whatever their rights against the Racecourse Co. personally might be: Heathcote v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 2 Mac. & G. 100.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the judgment of the court, and after stating the nature of the case continued: The main question in this action is whether, according to the true construction of the scheduled agreement, the defendant Racecourse Co. did give a "first refusal" of the racecourse land to the Canal Co. There appear to be two possible meanings of the words "first refusal." One is that they mean the opportunity of refusing a "fair and reasonable offer" by the Racecourse Co. to sell the lands en bloc to the Canal Co.; the other is that they mean the opportunity of refusing the land at a price acceptable to the Racecourse Co. offered by some person other than the Canal Co., which is what I understand by the term "right of pre-emption." Now, the obligation to give a first refusal arises in either of two events—viz., (1) if and whenever the lands shall cease to be used as a racecourse; and (2) should the lands be proposed to be used for dock purposes. Clause 5 of the agreement appears to me to show that it was in the contemplation of the parties that the lands might be used for dock purposes while remaining in the hands of the Racecourse Co., and consequently without that company having determined to sell or part with the ownership of the lands. The object of clause 3, read in connection with clauses 5 and 6, appears to be to protect the Canal Co. as dock owners against competition, and the risk intended to be guarded against is the same whether the Racecourse Co. or some third party is owner of the docks. The agreement does not provide that the first refusal shall be given at any particular price or on any particular terms; nor that the price and other terms shall be ascertained by arbitration, or in any other way. Looking at these circumstances, I think there is at least fair ground for the contention that the clause only imports that the Racecourse Co. shall, in either of the prescribed events, make a fair and reasonable offer to sell the lands to the Canal Co., and I wish to consider the case from this point of view, which is the view most favourable to the defendants. We start with this, that the directors of the Racecourse Co. were on the 10th of August, 1899, approached by the Canal Co. with a view to the purchase of the lands by the latter company, and expressed themselves willing to discuss terms, and that negotiations between the two companies went on down to the beginning of October. About the 18th of September the Racecourse Co. appear to have consulted their solicitor as to their obligation under clause 3. He advised them, and the minutes record, that "it was thought that no harm could come from our naming a figure, say, £350,000." Negotiations with the Trafford Park Co. began on the 29th of September, and on the 4th of October a verbal offer was made by the Trafford Co. to the Racecourse Co. to become the purchasers at the price of £250,000, with the benefit of certain stipulations in favour of the Racecourse Co. [After referring to the further negotiations and correspondence, and to the offer of £200,000 made on behalf of the Canal Co., his lordship continued:] The Racecourse Co. thereupon refused the offer of £200,000, and, without making any further offer to the Canal Co., immediately offered the land to the Trafford Co. at £300,000, and ultimately entered into a contract with the Trafford Co. for the sale of the property at the price of £280,000, with the benefit of certain stipulations in favour of the Racecourse Co., the value of which Farwell, J., finds to be nothing like £70,000. I think that the price of £350,000 was one which the Racecourse Co. did not really expect to get, and that the offer made by the letter of the 20th of October, 1899, was not a fair and reasonable one. I also think that it was not the duty of the Canal Co. to make a counter-proposal. That company was entitled to a "refusal," which, I agree with Farwell, J., in thinking, imports an offer on the part of the Racecourse Co. In my judgment the evidence shows that at the very moment when the Racecourse Co. were offering the land to the Canal Co. at £350,000 the Racecourse Co. had determined to sell to the Trafford Park Co. for a less sum, and that in this sense the offer made by the letter of October, 1899, was not a fair and reasonable one. The contrast of figures is not so violent as in the supposed case where the Racecourse Co., for the purpose of freeing themselves entirely from the obligations of clause 3, offer at £1,000,000, and, having got their freedom by the continued refusal of that offer, subsequently sell at £100,000; but, taking the consecution of events here and the range of prices discussed at the previous negotiation between Davis for the Racecourse Co. and Wallis for the Canal Co., I have no more doubt than I should have had in the supposed case but that £350,000 was an offer made at a figure which was above the price which the Racecourse Co. were willing to take from the Trafford Park Co., and I do not think such an offer is an offer within the meaning of clause 3, whatever construction is put upon it. I think that the very words "first refusal" in clause 3 import that the price at which the Racecourse Co. give the Canal Co. the "first refusal" is a price at which the Racecourse Co. will offer the land to other would-be buyers in the event of the refusal of the Canal Co. to buy at that price. If there is no person negotiating a purchase it may not be easy to prove that the price offered to the Canal Co. is above the price which the Racecourse Co. are willing to take from persons other than the Canal Co.; but whenever this can be proved, it seems to me that there is a clear infraction of the right of pre-emption given to the Canal Co. by clause 3. In the present case, however, there is no difficulty of proof.

Having thus disposed in the negative of the question whether the Racecourse Co. did give the Canal Co. a "first refusal" within the meaning of clause 3, I will now deal with the question whether either of the alternative conditions accrued giving rise to the right of refusal. The lands do not seem to have ceased to be used as a racecourse, and therefore one must consider the second alternative condition—viz., whether the lands were proposed to be used for dock purposes. I do not agree with Farwell, J., that the words "should the aforesaid lands and hereditaments be at any time proposed to be used for dock purposes," include a proposal so to use the lands by the Ship Canal Co. I think that the proposal must be by the Racecourse Co., their successors, or assigns—in other words, by a possible competitor in the dock business. But this is not very important, except as bearing on the construction of the clause, because I agree with Farwell, J., that within the meaning of this clause the Trafford Park Co. proposed before and at the time of the contract of sale entered into between themselves and the Racecourse Co. to use the land for dock purposes. The Trafford Park Co., who were negotiating the purchase of the land, proposed to use it, and the Racecourse Co. proposed to sell it for that purpose. This being so, the Canal Co. became entitled to a "first refusal"; and whatever those words may mean the Canal Co. in my opinion have not had a "first refusal"; for if one takes, as I have done in this judgment, the construction of clause 3 most favourable to the defendants, the Racecourse Co. on the happening of either of the alternative conditions came under the obligation to make a fair and reasonable offer to sell the lands to the Canal Co., and this, in my opinion, for reasons which I have already given, the Racecourse Co. have never done. If, on the other hand, clause 3 means that the right of "first refusal" is not to arise until some person or company other than the Ship Canal Co. makes an offer acceptable to the Racecourse Co. and that the Racecourse Co. will then come under an obligation to offer the land at the same price to the Canal Co., it seems clear that the Racecourse Co. have not done so. In either case the fact that the Racecourse Co. offered and sold the lands to the Trafford Park Co. at a less price than that at which they offered the lands to the Canal Co. seems conclusive. The offer to the Ship Canal Co. was not fair and reasonable, because the Racecourse Co. were willing at the very time of the offer to take a less price from the Trafford Park Co., and alternatively the Ship Canal Co. never had the refusal of the offer made by the Racecourse Co. to the Trafford Park Co. I agree with Farwell, J., that the value of the option to the Racecourse Co. to take land of the Trafford Park Co. for a racecourse is not sufficient to account for the £70,000, the difference between the cash price at which the Racecourse Co. offered the land to the Ship Canal Co. and the cash price at which they actually sold to the Trafford Park Co. I agree with Farwell, J., that there is no evidence that the option was anything like the value alleged. I do not decide that the Racecourse Co. could only negotiate with the Trafford Park Co. for an exclusively cash price; but I do decide that, even if the Racecourse Co. could negotiate for a mixed price, yet the cash price at which they offer the land to the Ship Canal Co. for acceptance or refusal must not exceed the total of the cash price at which they have offered the land to the third person plus the reasonable cash value of the option which they take as part of purchase price.

It only remains now to deal with a few objections urged to Farwell, J.'s, judgment. First, it was urged before us that the agreement in clause 3 was void for remoteness or uncertainty. I think, for the reasons given by Farwell, J., that every clause of the agreement has statutory validity, and that no objection can be taken on that score. Then it was objected that clause 3 could not be enforced against the Trafford Park Co., who are only alienees of the land. Farwell, J., thought that clause 3 created an interest in land, and that this objection could be thus answered. I do not think that clause 3 does create an interest in land, nor do I think that there is anything in the decisions in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, or in London and County Banking Co v. Lewis, 31 W. R. 233, 21 Ch. D. 490, which gets over the objection. It seems, however, from the decision in Willmott v. Barber, 28 W. R. 911, 15 Ch. D. 96, that the Trafford Park Co. could not obtain specific performance of a contract for sale and purchase of land if that sale would be a breach of a prior contract with a third person; and it seems to me to follow that one ought to treat this case on the basis of an action to restrain a breach of a contract threatened to be carried out in pursuance of a subsequent contract by the defendant with a third person having full knowledge of the first contract. This seems to bring the case within the principle of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. The contract here to give the Ship Canal Co. the "first refusal" involves a negative contract not to part with the land to any other person without giving that first refusal. If the action had been brought against the Racecourse Co., the party to the contract, alone, the injunction asked for could not have been granted without affecting the rights and interests of the Trafford Park Co. They are necessary parties to the action, just as Mr. Gye was a necessary party to the action of Lumley v. Wagner, for to grant the injunction in that case was to prevent Miss Wagner from carrying out her contract to sing at Mr. Gye's opera house; and, if the defendant, thus brought in, comes and insists on his right to have the second contract carried out, I do not see why the injunction should not be granted against him. Heathcote v. North Staffordshire Railway was cited to us to show that no injunction could be granted against the third person in such a case, but so it was cited in Lumley v. Wagner with the same object, but Lord St. Leonards, nevertheless, granted the injunction against Mr Gye. There are only two more objections to mention; one is that it is said that, if the agreement for the sale of the racecourse to the Trafford Park Co. is carried out, the plaintiffs will not be hurt, because the contract of sale is expressly subject to their rights. But the answer to this is, on the question of the amount of compensation to be paid on compulsory purchase, it may make a great difference to the Ship Canal Co., who are the claimants. Then it is said that the plaintiffs could not insist on the first refusal, because they could not buy without taking fresh statutory powers. It seems to me that the answer to this is that all the parties to the contract were perfectly well aware of this at the time when the contract was made. For the reasons which I have given I think the judgment of Farwell, J., ought to be affirmed.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Dec. 17, 18; March 25.

GARDNER v. HODGSON'S KINGSTON BREWERY CO. (a.)

Easement—Right of way—Annual payment—Uninterrupted enjoyment for over forty years—Parol licence—Lost grant—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 5.

Where an easement is claimed under the Prescription Act, s. 2, a payment within the period of forty years may so negative the enjoyment "as of right" as to prevent the claim being established.

Where a licence to use a way was given by parol more than forty years before action brought, and such licence was subject to a small annual payment,

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), on the facts, that the proper inference was that each payment was made for permission to use the way for the preceding year, and that the way had not therefore been enjoyed as of right within the meaning of the Prescription Act.

Held, also, that no lost grant could be inferred.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (48 W. R. 469), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (48 W. R. 469.)

The action was brought for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way through a gateway at the back of certain freehold hereditaments known as No. 203, High-street, Sutton, of which the plaintiff was owner in fee, to and from a pump in a yard in the rear of the Red Lion Inn, of which the defendants were the owners, and also a right of way for carts and horses through the said gateway across the said yard to and from the High-street, and for an injunction.

The facts were as follows:

The plaintiff and her predecessors in title had for upwards of sixty years occupied No. 203, High-street, for the purposes of a saddler's business, with a yard and stables at the back, used partly as a knacker's yard and partly as livery stables. The only access to the yard and stables had been through a gateway from the plaintiff's yard, opening into the Red Lion yard, and thence across that yard into the High-street. This way had been openly enjoyed during the whole period. It was also proved that ever since the year 1855 15s. a year had been paid by the plaintiff and her predecessors for the user of this way.

On the 31st of March, 1898, the defendants served notice in writing upon the plaintiff requiring her to give up the access to the yard of the Red Lion and to close the gate, and added that "the right of going through the said yard of the Red Lion Inn, Sutton, for which you have paid us an annual rent of 15s. shall therefore be abolished as and from the 1st day of May next."

On the 19th of April, 1898, the plaintiff wrote the following reply: "Referring to your letter of the 31st of March, we are quite unable to agree to your proposal to close the gate, as, independent of the right of way, for which we pay 15s. per annum, we have a right of access to and use of the pump, which has existed for a great number of years, and we do not see how this right could be given up without our interest being affected. There is no other outlet whatever from our premises excepting through the yard. We also wish to point out that, as regards your notice to give up the right of way, we are, as you are aware, yearly tenants, and therefore one year's notice should be given as from September next."

On the 23rd of January, 1899, the plaintiff sent a cheque for 15s. for right of way through yard to September, 1898.

On the 16th of February, 1899, the defendants served a notice "to quit and discontinue the user of the yard on the expiration of the year of your tenancy, which shall expire next after the end of one half-year from service of this notice."

The defendants by their pleadings admitted the plaintiff's right of access to the pump, but denied the plaintiff's right of way across their yard to and from High-street.

Cozens-Hardy, J., drew the inference from these facts that a licence or permission to use this way across the yard was given by parol more than forty years before action brought, but was subject to the payment of 15s. a year, and he held that the plaintiff had acquired a right of way under section 2 of the Prescription Act. He was further of opinion that if necessary a lost grant ought to be presumed. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Macnaghten, K.C., and G. Cave, for the defendants, contended that the annual payment of 15s. was in respect of rent, and that the user of the way was not therefore as of right.

Micklem, K.C., and E. S. Ford, for the plaintiff, argued that claiming under a licence or agreement was claiming as of right, and that under the circumstances a lost grant ought to be presumed.

Macnaghten, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 25.—RIGBY, L.J., said: In order to justify the conclusion that the existing state of facts is inconsistent with the acquisition under the Prescription Act by forty years' user of an absolute and indefeasible right of way, it is absolutely necessary to assume that each annual payment of the 15s. has to do at most with the right of way for one year only, so that the successive payments may be taken to involve successive permissions for one year at most. To me it appears that such an assumption, so far from being necessary, is altogether arbitrary and unwarranted. This will be shown by an examination of the probabilities of the case. Independently of the Prescription Act, the question to be solved is, how did it come about that a business should be carried on in a yard surrounded with buildings on all sides but one, and on that one side making necessary use of a cart and horse way through the adjoining property, and also use of a well of water on such adjoining property? Probably the most natural hypothesis would be that the properties at some remote former time were in one ownership, that the buildings were erected before the severance of ownership, and that on the severance, by conveyance the right of road and right to use the well were annexed to the separated property. This does not account for the annual payment of the 15s., but that might have been reserved expressly, and, if so reserved, would in all probability be reserved either in perpetuity or until the owner of the servient tenement ceased to require it. Putting aside the hypothesis of common ownership, it is highly improbable and almost inconceivable that the owner of the now dominant tenement would have built all round his yard where he had no right of exit, and gone to the expense of preparing for a business requiring a supply of water and access by carriages and horses without securing both rights beforehand. Some such arrangement as the following would be probable: That he, helping to provide and maintain the well and pump, should have in perpetuity, or at least so long as he required it, the right of the water supply and the right of way for his business. The consideration of 15s. a year might at the remote period that we are postulating be a not insufficient consideration for the right of road. The arrangement might be carried out by deed which has been lost or no deed may have been executed. In the latter case there would be no legal easement either for water or roads, but, as Lord Denman pointed out in his judgment in Tickle v. Brown, 4 A. & E. 369, the want of such a legal right would in no way prevent the person claiming the easement from claiming as of right. Of course I do not say that such an arrangement as I have indicated can be taken as proved. It is, however, more likely to have taken place than a mere bargain for a right of way for a year. The hypothesis of a mere licence revocable at any time seems the most unlikely of all. There is no way of accounting for the incongruity of bargaining for a perpetual right of water, which is admitted, and neglecting to bargain for the at least equally necessary right of way not determinable at the will of the grantor. That the mere payment of an annual rent is not to be interpreted as involving an interruption of a user as of right is shown by the case of The Plasterers' Co. v. The Parish Clerks' Co., 6 Exch. 630, where, as is pointed out by Cresswell, J., the user of light must necessarily have been as of right. Lord Campbell's judgment makes it clear that the decision that the payment did not cause an interruption in the user was founded on the construction of section 4 and applicable equally to cases within section 2 and section 3.

[The Lord Justice then dealt with the contention of the defendants that there had been an admission by the plaintiff of a yearly tenancy as to the right of road and overruled it; and he came to the conclusion that the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., was correct, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. (after stating the facts as above set out), said: It is contended by the defendants that the inference drawn by Cozens-Hardy, J., is not the right inference, but that the true inference is simply that the enjoyment was by reason of permissions granted during the period of forty years, and not as of right. Now there can be no doubt but that the fact of the payment in each year is evidence, primâ facie, that enjoyment was not as of right; it is, to use the words of section 5 of the Prescription Act, evidence of a fact inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment as of right. The evidence is not offered by the defendants as evidence of an agreement. The defendants are not confessing the enjoyment as of right and avoiding the effect of such enjoyment by setting up the agreement under which the enjoyment was had; on the contrary, it is the plaintiff, the party claiming the prescriptive right, who seeks to set up the agreement and then to say, "You, the defendants, cannot take advantage of this agreement to negative my claim to a prescriptive right because the agreement which I am setting up was not in writing." This agreement which the plaintiff asks the court to infer, and which Cozens-Hardy, J., does infer, is not dependent on the lapse of forty years, it is not a statutory inference, neither is it an inference based upon some recognized legal fiction arising after the lapse of twenty or some other number of years. It is a mere inference of fact based upon the payment of 15s. a year for a long period, the origin of which payment there is no evidence to explain. But it is to be observed that the annual payments are equally consistent, or, at all events, consistent, with a fresh permission in each year. Moreover, the probability that such was the true fact, and the improbability that there was one permission or agreement covering the whole period of forty years, is enhanced by the consideration that a parol licence creates no right or interest in the licensee over the land, but is revocable by the licensor at any moment. The second and fifth sections of the Prescription Act are difficult to construe; but I believe that the true meaning of the provision that where a way shall have been enjoyed as aforesaid (as of right) for the full period of forty years the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing, is that an enjoyment which appears to be as of right, otherwise than under a right conferred by the consent or agreement of the person owning the land in respect of which the way or other easement is alleged, shall not be defeated or lose its effect by evidence that the enjoyment was permissive, unless such permission, consent, or agreement was in writing. If this is the true view it will follow that, wherever the enjoyment does not appear to be of right, the proviso has no application, and that, therefore, if it appears that there were payments for the enjoyment during the forty years the proviso cannot apply, for, the enjoyment primâ facie not appearing to be as of right, the landowner over whose land the way is claimed has no need or occasion to set up a consent or agreement covering the whole period of forty years. It is sufficient for him that the payments made during the forty years primâ facie negative the enjoyment having been as of right. It may be it is open to the person claiming the easement to go on and prove that the payments were in fact made under a parol consent or agreement made before the forty years began, and it may be that this would give the claimant an indefeasible right to the easement, but there is no evidence of such consent or agreement in fact, and I think it would be wrong to infer from the annual payments of 15s. a parol agreement made before the beginning of the forty years and remaining in force for the whole period. The inference from a payment in one year is, I might almost say admittedly, that the enjoyment in that year was not of right, and I cannot see why the inference should be different because the payment is made for a number of years in succession. In each year it seems that the payment is compensation for the past user, and as such an acknowledgment that the past year's user has not been of right. The payment on the 23rd of January, 1899, is itself evidence that the plaintiff was not enjoying the easement as of right.

The cases of The Plasterers' Co. v. The Parish Clerks' Co., and Bewley v. Atkinson, 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283, to my mind, are not in point, because those cases, being light and air cases, were governed by section 3 of the Prescription Act, and, as under that section it is not necessary that the enjoyment should be of right, it was impossible to rely on the long-continued payments as admissible in evidence to negative the enjoyment having been as of right. Moreover, in the Plasterers' case payments were only relied on as admissible to prove an interruption within the meaning of section 4, and the court held that the payments were no evidence of an interruption, because an interruption of a right claimed under section 3 could only be by discontinuance of the enjoyment, and Lord Campbell says on p. 634: "We are not called upon to say whether the payment might not be made use of to show that this was not such an enjoyment as was contemplated by the statute as capable to confer the right"; and Maule, J., adds, "Your argument must go to the length that an enjoyment which is paid for is interrupted; but the third section shows that there may be an uninterrupted enjoyment granted by an instrument in writing." Thereupon both these learned judges, having refused to deal with any other question except that raised by the bill of exceptions—viz., whether the ruling of the Lord Chief Baron that the demand of the rent for the lights and payments made in compliance therewith was an interruption within the meaning of the statute was right—proceeded to hold that the interruption in the third section of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, must be an actual discontinuance of the enjoyment by reason of an obstruction submitted to or acquiesced in for a year. That case, to say the least of it, leaves untouched the proposition established by Tickle v. Brown that in a case of an easement claimed under section 2 a payment within the period of twenty or of forty years may so negative the enjoyment as of right as to prevent a claim under the statute for an easement.

This is all I have to say about Cozens-Hardy, J.'s, inference that a licence to use this way across the yard was given by parol more than forty years before action brought, excepting that I wish to point out that a succession of annual payments of so-called rent for the enjoyment of an easement for a number of years in succession will not constitute a continuous licence for the whole period. The case is very different from a tenancy of land, in which case the resulting tenancy from year to year would be continuous. Cozens-Hardy, J., also, though preferring to base his judgment on the Prescription Act, alternatively bases his judgment on presumption of lost grant. I think there is no room for any such presumption. The enjoyment can be accounted for as a lawful enjoyment without reference to any such grant on the theory of payments made under a licence renewed from year to year, the payments being acknowledgments that the enjoyment of the previous year had not been as of right and not payments of rents. Moreover, there is this difficulty about the suggested lost grant—that a perpetual lease of an easement subject to an annual payment is a legal impossibility—and I doubt whether there can be a grant of an incorporeal hereditament subject to a perpetual payment in the nature of a fee farm rent. In my opinion the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J., ought to be reversed and judgment entered for the defendants.

ROMER, L.J.—The question to be decided in this action is whether or not the plaintiff has enjoyed the way over the defendants' premises "as of right" within the meaning of sections 2 and 5 of the Prescription Act. The difficulty which arises is not one of law on the interpretation or meaning of the Act, but one depending on the inference to be drawn from the facts proved. The case of Tickle v. Brown, 4 A. & E. 369, defined "enjoyment as of right." The words of Lord Denman in delivering judgment in that case have been so often cited that I need not repeat them here. It is clear that if the enjoyment has been by permission granted by the owner of the servient tenement during the forty years, then the enjoyment is not of right. Lord Denman, besides speaking of "permission," used the phrase "by tacit sufferance." I do not quite know what he meant by tacit sufferance, but I think he was contemplating a case similar to that we have now to deal with. But it cannot now be doubted that if from the facts proved the inference be that the enjoyment during the forty years has been by permission granted during that time, then no right can be acquired under the Act in respect of that enjoyment. Of course, when I speak of the "facts proved" I exclude any attempt to establish by evidence any consent or agreement not in writing given or made prior to the forty years.

I now proceed to apply the above to the circumstances of this case. Undoubtedly the plaintiff and her predecessors have used the way claimed by her for more than the forty years in a manner which would enable her to claim the benefit of the statute had there been no yearly payment made. But she and her predecessors have at the end of each year during this period made a yearly payment to the defendants and their predecessors in respect of the user of the way during that past year. Now, it appears to me that if nothing were known of the circumstances under which, during one particular year of the forty, a certain payment had been made in respect of the user of a way for that year, the proper inference from the mere fact of payment would be that the payment was made for permission asked and granted to use the way for that year. And, indeed, I think that was one of the points decided in Tickle v. Brown, nor would it, in my opinion, make any difference that the payment was made at the end, and not at the beginning, of the year. But then comes the difficulty in the present case, about which I have felt great hesitation, especially having regard to the view taken by my brother Rigby. Is the inference that would be drawn, in the case of payment in a single isolated year, one that ought also to be drawn with regard to each payment in circumstances like the present, where the payments have been made for the whole period, and where no express application for permission during that period is shown, and the yearly payment is a small one? It is only with reluctance that I have come to the conclusion that, even in the circumstances of this case, the proper inference is that each payment was for permission to use the way for the preceding year. In the first place, the fact that the permission was not expressly asked for or given in each year is just what one would expect when the user was continued for several years. So long as the payment was made at the end of each year, and the parties did not wish that the user should cease, they would naturally proceed on the tacit understanding between them as to their relative positions shown by the payment made each year, and would not go each year through the form of expressly asking for or expressly granting permission for the user for each coming year. The application and grant would be tacitly assumed to have been made. And in the next place, I do not think much importance can be attached to the fact of the payment being small. However valuable the way may be to the plaintiff, I cannot say that the payment is so small as compared with the inconvenience caused by the user to the defendants or their predecessors that I ought to assume that they did not sooner withdraw their permission because they had no power to do so. Then, are there any other facts in the case which could prevent me drawing the inference I have? I think not. The form of the only receipt for the yearly payment which is forthcoming does not appear to me to materially assist either side, except that it shows that the payment was in respect of the right of way for the preceding year. The words "right of way" written across it may well be referred to the right obtained by the permission. Then the inconveniences which will result to the plaintiff in her business if she fail to establish her claim to a right of way, though they account for the reluctance I have felt as previously expressed, are not grounds upon which the court ought to act in determining this case. No doubt the plaintiff may have reasonably expected, and did expect, that the permission so long given would continue, but this expectation will not support a claim as of right. [After some observations upon the pleadings his lordship continued as follows:]

I am fortified in the conclusion I have come to by the following considerations: If the yearly sum was not paid for permission to use the way, on what footing was it paid? Suppose the plaintiff had wished to cease using the way and to stop payment of the yearly sum, and had given notice to the defendants of her intention, and in accordance with her notice had not used the way for a year. Could the defendants have succeeded in an action brought by them against her to compel payment of the yearly sum for that year? I think not. It appears to me that such an action must have failed, and I think it would have failed because the court would have held on the facts now before us that the user was by permission, and that the payment was only due when the permission was expressly or impliedly sought for and obtained. The court could not from the facts proved in this case have inferred in favour of the defendants a lost grant to secure the yearly sum. Indeed, it is difficult to see what lost grant they could have suggested. It would have been hopeless to suggest that the yearly sum was in the nature of a rent-charge issuing out of the plaintiff's tenement. And I cannot see what other legal supposition could have been enforced as against the owners or occupiers for the time being of the plaintiff's house and premises.

Lastly, I think the case against the plaintiff may be put in this way: The payment of the yearly sum by the occupiers of her house for the time being was evidence of user by permission. This throws upon her the onus of proving by facts outside and beyond the mere user that the user was "of right" under the statute. This onus she fails to discharge, at any rate she does not do so to my satisfaction. The view that I have taken, while it prevents the operation of the statute in favour of the plaintiff, also negatives the idea that a lost grant can be inferred to support her claim. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to succeed, and that the action should be dismissed so far as it seeks a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to the right of way claimed (not being that claimed in connection with the pump in the pleadings mentioned), and so far as it claims an injunction based on that declaration. The view I have taken renders it unnecessary for me to consider the further points taken by the defendants, which depend upon the contention at one time put forward by the plaintiff, that she was in the position of a yearly tenant in respect of the user of the way, and upon the payments made by her and received by the defendants before that contention was withdrawn.

A workman employed on a farm to drive a steam-engine for working a mill used to grind meal for the farm stock is not employed in a "factory" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, so as to come within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the St. Alban's County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman in the employment of a farmer. The employer had on his farm a movable steam-engine which was used for the purpose of working a mill for grinding meal intended for food for the stock on the farm, and not for sale. It was the duty of the applicant to drive the engine and attend to the mill. While performing this duty he was accidentally injured.

The question was whether the applicant was employed on a "factory" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, and was therefore brought within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant for a weekly payment of nine shillings.

The employer appealed.

Ellis Hill, for the employer.—The county court judge thought that the applicant was employed in a "non-textile factory" within the meaning of section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. But the facts of this case cannot be brought within that definition. The meal was not ground "by way of trade or for purposes of gain": Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co., 41 W. R. 580, [1893] 2 Q. B. 135. No "manufacturing process" at all was carried on in the farm. In Kent v. Astley, 18 W. R. 185, L. R. 5 Q. B. 19, it was held that a slate quarry was not a factory; and in Redgrave v. Lee, 22 W. R. 857, L. R. 9 Q. B. 363, it was held that cement works were not a factory. If this farm is a factory, the absurd result will follow that all the provisions of the Act, such as those contained in sections 13, 17, 22, 75, and 76, will apply to it.

C. E. Fitch, for the applicant, cited Rogers v. Manchester Packing Co., 46 W. R. 350, [1898] 1 Q. B. 344.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I cannot agree with the judgment of the learned county court judge. The question is whether a tenant-farmer carries on the business of a non-textile factory within the meaning of section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. Certainly no one ever supposed that he did until this case was heard. It is now said that since 1878 all tenant-farmers have been carrying on the business of non-textile factories, and we are asked to hold that these farmers are subject to the Workmen's Compensation Act. The argument is this: Section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act enacts that workmen employed in factories are within the Act, and that "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts; and, it is said, the workman in this case was, at the time when he was injured, working on a factory within the meaning of the last-mentioned Acts, and therefore his master is liable. What was the workman's employment? His master, the farmer, had in his farmyard a steam-engine which was connected by a band over a fly-wheel with a mill which was used for the purpose of grinding meal for the farm stock. The workman was employed to drive the engine. The question is whether in law this was employment in a factory. That brings us to section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, which defines "textile factory" and "non-textile factory." No one says that the farm on which this engine was is a textile factory. But a non-textile factory is defined as including "(3) any premises wherein, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for purposes of gain in or incidental to the following purposes, or any of them; that is to say—(a) in or incidental to the making of any article or part of any article, or (b) in or incidental to the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article, or (c) in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article, and wherein, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there." Can the present case be brought within those words? Turning grain into meal is not making any article, nor is it altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing any article; neither do I think it is adapting any article for sale. Again, the grinding of this meal was not done "by way of trade," it was done for the purpose of feeding the farmer's own cattle. Neither was it done "for purposes of gain," which, in my opinion, means direct gain and not indirect gain. I think it would require a great straining of the language of the section to hold that it was applicable to the case with which we are dealing.

Then further it must be noticed that, if a farmer is to be held to carry on the business of a non-textile factory, all the provisions of the Act of 1878 relating to non-textile factories would apply. Section 13 puts a limit on the number of hours during which young persons and women may be employed in a non-textile factory. Section 22 provides for certain holidays. It can never have been intended that these sections should apply to persons working on a farm. Then section 75 provides for notice with regard to a factory being given to an inspector. If the word "factory" included "farm," the section would have to be read thus: "Every person shall within one month after he begins to occupy a farm, serve on an inspector a written notice containing the name of the farm, the place where it is situate, the address to which he desires his letters to be addressed, the nature of the work, the nature and amount of the moving power therein, and the name of the firm under which the business of the farm is to be carried on, and in default shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds." Again, section 76 says that where an inspector by notice in writing names a public clock, or some other clock open to public view, for the purpose of regulating the period of employment in a factory, then the period of employment and the times allowed for meals shall be regulated by that clock. It is impossible to suppose that such a section could have been intended to apply to a farm. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

In re PITT-RIVERS.
SCOTT v. PITT-RIVERS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Secret trust.

A testator built a museum and laid out pleasure grounds on parts of his estate, to which he admitted the public free, reserving his private rights. By a codicil to his will he gave the museum and grounds, with £300 per annum for their maintenance, to his son and his heirs male, and also appointed two trustees for the purposes only of the museum and grounds. Evidence showed that the testator intended his son to maintain the grounds and museum as in his lifetime, but that he wished the public to acquire no rights therein, and that the son accepted the gifts on those terms.

Held, that the son took the gifts subject to a secret trust to maintain and use the museum and grounds as in the testator's lifetime, to be enforced for the benefit of the public; and that the two trustees took no estate and had no duties to perform.

The testator General Augustus H. L. F. Pitt-Rivers during his life built a museum at Farnham on a part of his estates, and also laid out another part which was called the Larmer grounds as pleasure grounds. To these he admitted the public free of charge, always carefully reserving his private rights as against the public.

The testator died on the 4th of May, 1900, and by his will dated the 12th of June, 1892, after appointing trustees and executors, devised his freehold property, including the museum and the Larmer grounds, subject to the rent-charges in favour of his wife and children, to his first and other sons successively for life and in tail male.

A codicil to his will dated the 20th of November, 1899, was as follows: (1) I bequeath my museum at Farnham, in the county of Dorset, together with its contents and the objects of curiosity in my house at Rushmore which are intended to be placed in the said museum to my eldest son A. E. L. F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male. (2) I bequeath my Larmer grounds, in the parishes of Farnham, &c., to my eldest son A. E. L. F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male. (3) I also bequeath unto my eldest son A. E. L. F. Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male the sum of £300 per annum, the said sum of £300 per annum is to be for the future maintenance of the said museum and Larmer grounds and the articles of interest therein and thereon. (4) I direct that the said museum and Larmer grounds, with the articles of interest, &c., shall be kept in a good state of preservation, and I further direct the said sum of £300 is to be a further charge upon my estates in the counties of Wilts and Dorset. (5) I appoint John Lubbock (since Lord Avebury), of, &c., and C. H. Read, of, &c., to be the trustees only for the purposes so far as necessary in connection with the future maintenance of the said museum and Larmer grounds and the objects of interest therein and thereon.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons by the executor of the will raising the questions whether the testator's eldest son took the gifts made to him by the codicil beneficially or subject to a secret trust to maintain and use the museum and Larmer grounds as in the lifetime of the testator for the benefit of the public; and as to what, if any, estate the trustees appointed by the codicil took in the museum and grounds and the £300 per annum.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28.—KEKEWICH, J.—By the codicil of the 20th of November, 1899, General Pitt-Rivers gave to his eldest son, the first defendant, whom I will for brevity's sake refer to as Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers (1) his museum at Farnham with its contents; (2) the objects of curiosity in his house at Rushmore, which were intended to be placed in the said museum; (3) his Larmer grounds; and (4) the sum of £300 per annum. All these gifts were made to Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers and his heirs male, so that he took what was real estate as tenant in tail and what was personal estate absolutely. I think that the gift of £300 per annum falls under the latter description. It is by the same codicil charged on the testator's estates in the counties of Wilts and Dorset; but that charge does not prevent the bequest from being one of an annuity which is personal estate. The result is that Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers can deal with the real and personal estate, thus given, as he pleases, and that, notwithstanding that the testator has directed on the face of the codicil that the museum and Larmer grounds, with the articles of interest therein and thereon, shall be kept in a good state of preservation, and has indicated his intention that the annuity of £300 shall be available and shall be used for that purpose, such direction and intention cannot interfere with the beneficial gifts of the construction of which there is no reasonable doubt. But it has been disclosed by the evidence that the testator communicated his wishes to his son, Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers, and that his son accepted the gifts with the knowledge that they were made to him for the purpose of effecting his father's wishes; and, further, that he assured his father that those wishes should be fulfilled. This constitutes a secret trust of the property given enforceable against the son in this court. There is no need to refer to authorities or to examine the doctrine of the court on the subject, because the facts just mentioned are undoubted and the doctrine of the court, that a secret trust is under such circumstances enforceable, is perfectly well settled. Nor is there any occasion narrowly to examine the evidence to ascertain what the communicated and accepted wishes of the father were. He had established the museum and had appropriated the Larmer grounds for purposes in connection with it, and he had maintained the museum and the grounds for the benefit and instruction of the public. He had done more than that, for he had expended money and trouble in providing entertainment for the public outside and beyond what would be derived from a mere visit to the museum and grounds. It may well be that, when he exacted a promise from his son that he would maintain the museum and grounds as heretofore, he did not bind him to provide the extra entertainment to which I have just referred; but he certainly did intend him to maintain the museum and grounds and to allow the public access thereto, and the son certainly accepted the gift of both with the assurance that this should be done. So far there is no substantial difficulty. Questions might arise in detail how the wishes of the father and the promise of the son should be effected; but they would be merely questions of detail, and none of principle would be possible.

Now comes the circumstance which raises a question of difficulty on which I reserved my judgment. While giving the property already mentioned to the son for the purpose of maintaining the museum and grounds as heretofore, the testator insisted that the public should have no rights. The public were to be allowed to use and enjoy the museum and grounds, but were to acquire no rights. This notion seems to have been strongly implanted in the testator's mind, and he referred to it frequently. He, being owner in fee, was able during his lifetime to do what was necessary to prevent the acquisition of rights by the public; and he occasionally closed the museum and grounds with the express intention of showing that he retained his paramount right as owner. Probably he thought that his son could do the same, and of course, if the son had succeeded to his father's position—that is, had taken the property absolutely unfettered by any trust—the son might have adopted the same lines as his father, and prevented the enjoyment of the public as a matter of right. This could only have been done by vesting the property absolutely in the son, and leaving it to his good faith and discretion to fulfil his father's wishes, though leaving him at the same time at liberty entirely to defeat these wishes if so minded. As it is, a trust has been established, and the question arises how far that trust can be enforced consistently with the denial of rights to the public. The Attorney-General appears to support the public character of the trust. He is altogether out of court unless he represents the public, and he cannot succeed in his contention that there is a secret trust to be enforced unless he further establishes that it is a trust for the benefit of the public. The court, therefore, finds itself in this embarassing position. If it accedes to the contention of the Attorney-General that there is a secret trust to be enforced for the benefit of the public, it must ignore or defeat the express intention of the testator that the public shall acquire no rights; and on the other hand, if that contention is rejected and the trust be not enforced, the only alternative can be that Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers will be left absolute owner of the property in question, at liberty, if he pleases, to disregard his father's wishes, and treat the property as equally at his disposal as if no trust had been communicated to and accepted by him. I have not forgotten that it may, and probably will, be possible so to provide for the management, use, and enjoyment of the grounds and museum that Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers will be left in possession, and that for all practical purposes he will have such privileges of ownership as were enjoyed by his father; but nevertheless, considering the legal position, one must face the two alternatives to which I have called attention, and from which, it seems to me, there is no possible escape. Whichever alternative is right, and is adopted, there will necessarily be some departure from the testator's intentions—that is, in some respects those intentions will remain unfulfilled. After full consideration I have arrived at the conclusion that the secret trust must be enforced at the suit of the Attorney-General, and for the benefit of the public. This will preserve the legal ownership of the son, which the father intended him to have; it will also fulfil his intention, as far as it can be fulfilled, that the museum and grounds shall be maintained as heretofore, and will avoid the possibility of the property being diverted from its intended purpose, which would be open if the son were declared beneficial as well as legal owner. I give credit to Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers for honest intention to do his very best to fulfil his father's wishes; but that creates at best only an imperfect obligation; and I must take it on the evidence that this would not have satisfied the father, who desired to secure the maintenance of the museum and grounds. On the other hand, there will be something less than the complete fulfilment of the father's expressed wishes. But, in giving effect to wishes and trusts declared in the language of laymen and not in that of technical lawyers, one must be prepared to find that in some respects there will be failure and imperfection in detail, and one must be content to secure the substance even on those terms. Here the wish not to give the public rights, though strongly entertained and insisted on, may properly be regarded as a minor matter in comparison with the more important provision that the museum and grounds should be maintained as hitherto.

I propose to declare the construction of the will on the points mentioned, and further to declare that it has been established to the satisfaction of the court that the gifts to the son were made to Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers, and were accepted by him, for the express purpose that the museum and grounds should be maintained and used as they had been in the lifetime of the testator, and so that he and those claiming through or under him will hold the property subject to a trust for such maintenance and user. If to these declarations be added liberty to Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers or any person claiming through or under him, or the Attorney-General, to apply touching any question respecting such maintenance and user, that will suffice for the present as regards what I have thus far discussed.

There are two further questions arising on the codicil. First, it remains to be determined what are "the objects of curiosity in my house at Rushmore, which are intended to be placed in the said museum." There has been some argument on this, and some discussion of questions of law which are likely to require solution when the facts have been ascertained. Indeed, I went so far as to express an opinion on some of these questions. I think, however, that it will be better to say no more about them, but merely to direct an inquiry following the language of the codicil. It is possible and even probable that in the course of prosecuting that inquiry some of the questions to which I have just referred will fall for decision; but, nevertheless, an effort to ascertain all the facts in this way seems to me the preferable course. The other question is what, if any, interest Lord Avebury and Mr. Charles Hercules Read take in any, and what, property disposed of by the codicil. It is obvious that the testator intended them to occupy some position of trust—that is, to have some duties and responsibilities—for he appoints them trustees for the purposes so far as necessary in connection with the future maintenance of the museum and grounds, and the objects of interest thereon and therein, but he directly gives them no property of any kind; and I do not think they can be held to take any interest in the annuity of £300, which is expressly given to Mr. Fox Pitt-Rivers. In coming to the conclusion that they took no estate or interest in anything, and have no duties to perform by virtue of the codicil, I am, of course, failing to give effect to what well may be supposed to have been the testator's intention; but I do not see my way to implying any estate, interest, or duty where none is expressed. If I were now settling a scheme, I should suggest for the consideration of the Attorney-General whether it would not be right and convenient to make those gentlemen trustees for the purposes of such scheme and to give them some definite position and duties under it; but this is not at present proposed, and I must leave the matter there.

KNIGHT v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Lease—Surrender—Possession of old lease and counterpart.

Where a lease is surrendered and a new lease for the same property is granted, the lessor cannot require the lessee to hand the old lease over to him, nor can the lessee demand possession of the counterpart of the old lease.

The plaintiff in this case was possessed of a messuage and premises at Little Sutton-street, Clerkenwell, for the residue of a term of sixty-one years from the 29th of September, 1859, subject as to part of the property to an underlease to the defendant for twenty-one years from the 29th of September, 1880, at the rent of £90.

In March, 1900, negotiations were entered into between plaintiff and defendant for the grant of a new lease, and in pursuance of a contract a draft lease was prepared, approved, and subsequently executed by both parties.

At an appointment on the 9th of July, 1900, for completing the transaction and exchanging the lease and counterpart, defendant's solicitors were asked to hand over the underlease to the plaintiff, but they refused to do so unless the plaintiff handed over the counterpart thereof.

The plaintiff then refused to complete unless the old underlease was given up to him, and he refused to deliver up the counterpart to defendant's solicitors.

Eve, Q.C., and A. St. John Clerke, for the plaintiff.

D. Stewart Smith, for defendant, said that plaintiff had no right to the lease as defendant might be sued on it.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—The plaintiff was, in March, 1900, the reversioner of some house property of which the defendant held a lease expiring at March, 1901, at a yearly rent of £90. In March, 1900, the plaintiff agreed to accept a surrender of the defendant's lease and to grant him a new lease for a term which would expire in

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1920 at a rent of £140. The lease and counterpart were prepared and engrossed and they were executed by the plaintiff and defendant respectively, but on the appointment for completion the plaintiff declined to deliver the new lease unless the defendant would hand over his present lease. The defendant said he would not object to do this if the plaintiff would hand over the counterpart of the present lease, but otherwise he refused. Upon this point alone the parties broke off, and an action was commenced for the purpose of deciding this sole question. It was stated by counsel that the new lease prepared and executed by the plaintiff was not expressed to be made in consideration (inter alia) of the surrender of the former lease, but, in the view which I take, the insertion or omission of these words would make no difference: Doe v. Courtenay, 11 Q. B. 702. The acceptance of a new lease operates as an implied surrender "by operation of law" of the old lease within the meaning of section 3 of the Statute of Frauds, but such surrender differs from an actual surrender by deed; it is not absolute, it is subject to an implied condition that the new lease is good, and if this is not so the old lease remains in force. The authorities on this point are clear: Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant (16th ed.), p 318. This being so I think the plaintiff is wrong in contending that he is in the position of an ordinary purchaser of a lease, and is at liberty to burn it if he thinks fit. The lessee, notwithstanding his surrender by operation of law, retains an interest in the lease. Moreover, when a lease is determined by re-entry, or has expired by lapse of time, the lessor is not entitled to recover the lease: Hall v. Ball, 3 Man. & Gr. 242, and Elworthy v. Sandford, 12 W. R. 338, 3 H. & C. 330. It would, I think, be wrong to put it out of the power of the defendant to take advantage of the old lease should the new lease prove to be invalid, and he is therefore entitled to retain the old lease. On the other hand the defendant cannot require the handing over of the counterpart lease, and he does not assert this as a right, though he was willing on completion to hand over the lease if he got the counterpart. The result is that, in my opinion, the defendant was not bound on completion to hand over the old lease, and I therefore make no order except that the plaintiff pay the costs of action.

Company — Shares — Underwriting — Application of shares in payment of commission—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 8, 10 (4), 31.

A company agreed with the underwriters of an issue of shares to be made to existing shareholders that the underwriters should have an option to the 30th of June, 1901, on 15,000 unissued shares of £1 each at the price of £2 10*s. a share. The shares in fact stood at a much higher price than* £2 10*s.*

Held, that this was not an offer to the public within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1900, section 8 (1). That such an allotment of shares would be an application direct or indirect of the shares in payment of commission, discount, or allowance in consideration of underwriting within the meaning of section 8 (2), and therefore not lawful.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant company from entering into or carrying into effect an agreement or agreements made or about to be made by the defendant company whereby in consideration of the guarantee of the issue of 60,000 shares of the company (part of an issue of 80,000 shares of £1 each now being offered by the company to its shareholders) the company agreed to give to the persons or person giving such guarantee an option to the 30th of June, 1901, on 15,000 unissued shares of £1 each of the company at the price of £2 10s. a share; or, in the alternative, an injunction to restrain the defendant company from applying or agreeing to apply any of its shares or capital money directly or indirectly in the payment of a commission or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe for all or any part of an issue of 80,000 shares of £1 each of the defendant company now being offered to its shareholders in accordance with the terms of a notice signed by the secretary of the defendant company, and dated the 1st of February, 1901.

The plaintiff, Thomas Hamilton Burrows, sued on behalf of himself and all other shareholders of the defendant company.

The Companies Act, 1900, s. 8, provides: (1) Upon any offer of shares to the public for subscription it shall be lawful for a company to pay a commission to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares in the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company, if the payment of the commission and the amount or rate per cent. of the commission paid or agreed to be paid are respectively authorized by the articles of association and disclosed in the prospectus, and the commission paid or agreed to be paid does not exceed the amount or rate so authorized.

(2) Save as aforesaid no company shall apply any of its shares or capital money either directly or indirectly in payment of any commission, discount, or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, for any shares of the company, or procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any shares in the company, whether the shares or money be so applied by being added to the purchase-money of any property acquired by the company, or to the contract price of any work to be executed for the company, or the money be paid out of the nominal purchase-money or contract price, or otherwise.

(3) But nothing in this section shall affect the power of any company to pay such brokerage as it has heretofore been lawful for a company to pay.

Upjohn, K.C., and Eustace Smith, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs do not rely on the words "capital money" but on the word "shares" in the Companies Act, 1900, s. 8 (2). [FARWELL, J., referred to Foster v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., ante, p. 119, [1901] 1 Ch. 208.]

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Kirby, for the defendants.—The Companies Act, 1900, s. 8 (2), does not apply to the issue by a company to its own shareholders.

Upjohn, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The defendant company was incorporated in March, 1899, with a capital of £500,000 in £1 shares, of which £387,030 have been issued.

In February, 1901, the directors determined to issue £80,000 of the unissued capital, and on the 1st of February, 1901, sent a circular to the existing shareholders of the company offering them an allotment of one share for every five held by them at the price of £2 10s. per share.

Prior to this the directors had entered into an agreement with certain persons to underwrite this issue to the extent of 60,000 shares, and in consideration thereof the underwriters were to have the right at any time up to the 30th of June, 1901, to subscribe for shares allotted to them at a similar price of £2 10s. per share, a portion of the unissued shares remaining after the said issue of £80,000 had been made. The fact that this option had been given is stated in the circular issued to the shareholders. The shares in fact stand at a much higher price than £2 10s., so much so that the underwriters have agreed to raise the option price to £3 15s. per share.

The plaintiff is a shareholder in the defendant company, and sues on behalf of himself and all other shareholders for an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying out this underwriting agreement on the ground that it contravenes section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, and for the purposes of the argument and decision of this motion I assume that the agreement has been made bonâ fide. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Sub-section 1 of this section is a conditionally enabling clause, and it is admitted that if the present case falls within it the necessary conditions have not been complied with. Sub-section 2 is a general prohibitive clause extending to every application of shares or capital, except in the case excepted by sub-section 1. It was argued for the defendants that sub-section 2 applied only to the case of an offer of shares to the public, and that the Act was intended to protect that portion of the public only who had not yet become members of a company, leaving actual members unprotected, and it was said that this is not an offer to the public (a point with which I will deal presently), and therefore is not within the Act at all. I am unable to accede to this contention. The Act applies to every company, whether formed before or after the commencement of the Act (see section 31), and I can find no ground for limiting general words of prohibition, in the limited nature of the exception from such general prohibition. Nor can I see any reason why existing shareholders should not be protected as well as prospective shareholders. It was suggested rather than argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the first sub-section applies, and that the circular of the 1st of February was an offer to the public. In my opinion, this is not so. I think that the clue to the meaning of the word "public" as used in this Act is to be found in section 10, sub-section 4: "This section shall not apply to a circular or notice inviting existing members or debenture-holders of a company to subscribe for further shares or debentures, but, subject as aforesaid, this section shall apply to any prospectus whether issued on or with reference to the formation of a company, or subsequently."

"Prospectus" is defined by the Companies Act, 1900, s. 30, to be "any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation, offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures of a company." An offer is not the less made to the public because it is sent to shareholders or debenture-holders as well as other persons, or because it is not advertised in the public newspapers. But if it is sent solely to the shareholders and (or) debenture-holders of the company, there is no offer to the public. The distinction is between persons who are members or debenture-holders of the company, on the one hand, and those who are not, on the other. I therefore hold that this circular is not an offer of shares to the public under sub-section 1.

But the plaintiff rested his main contention on the second sub-section, and argued that an allotment of shares under the underwriting agreement would be an application direct or indirect of shares in payment of commission, discount, or allowance to persons in consideration of underwriting. I am of opinion that this contention is sound. Suppose that the directors were indebted to A. B. in £1,000, and they allotted to him 400 shares at par when their market price was £2 10s. premium, in discharge of the debt; they would, in my opinion, clearly have applied those shares to the payment of that debt. They could in no other way justify their action in issuing shares at par instead of obtaining a proper premium. How, then, can the directors in the present case justify the issue of shares to a favoured individual at less than the market price except on the ground of a valuable consideration issuing from that individual to the company? And what other consideration is there than the underwriting agreement? It was said by the defendants that the company might have agreed to pay a sum equal to the difference between a price of £2 10s. and the market price on the 30th of June, but that is not the present transaction. Here the underwriters will get the shares and may retain them or deal with them as they please. The shares will, in fact, be applied in paying them, and the difference between the market price and the price of £2 10s. will merely afford the reason inducing the underwriters to exercise or refrain from exercising their option to have the shares applied in payment of the consideration for their underwriting agreement. It is said that the section was intended to prevent a vendor from giving part of his shares to underwriters, but, assuming this to be so, I can see no reason from this why the words of the Act should not be applied to other transactions which are fairly within the expressed intention of the Act and the mischief intended to be thereby prevented. It was urged that the premiums could not be capital and that the consideration might be paid out of premiums. But that is not the case before me. The Act distinguishes between capital and shares and forbids the application of either in payment of underwriting commission, and I have to consider only a dealing with shares, and not with the money produced by those shares. I therefore grant an injunction in the terms of the second sub-section of section 8 of the Act, limiting it to shares.

WHITE v. EDMOND. (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Presumption—Past child-bearing—Widow.

The practice of the court in the case of spinsters as to the presumption of a woman being past the age of child-bearing was adopted in the case of a widow who had had a son, but who had subsequently lived many years as a married woman without further children.

A widow, aged fifty-six and three months, who had a son thirty-four years ago, and had lived as a married woman twenty-three years subsequently without further children, was presumed past child-bearing.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Originating summons.

This summons raised the question as to the age at which the court will presume a widow lady, who has had a child, to be past child-bearing.

Under the will of William White, who died in 1885, the defendant, as sole trustee, held certain leasehold property upon trust to pay unto or permit the testator's daughter, Anna White (one of the two plaintiffs), to receive the rents and profits during her life for her separate use, and upon her decease upon trust for all her children who should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, and if more than one in equal shares.

Anna White was born in November, 1844, and, consequently, was fifty-six years and three months old at the hearing of the summons. In March, 1866, she married J. H. White, with whom she lived until his death in March, 1890. She did not marry again. She had one child only, a son, the co-plaintiff, J. W. G. White, who was born in the same year as the marriage. Consequently Mrs. White had lived as a married woman, subsequently to the birth of her son, more than twenty-four years without having any children.

She and her son took out this summons, under order 55, asking (among other things) that it might be declared that, in the events which had happened, she and her son were between them absolutely entitled to the leasehold premises, and that the defendant might be ordered and authorized to assign them to the plaintiffs, or as they might direct.

The cases cited and the arguments of counsel appear in the judgment.

BUCKLEY, J.—A number of cases have been cited where the presumption of a woman being past child-bearing has been made. The material ones are, in my opinion, the following: Haynes v. Haynes, 14 W. R. 361, 33 L. J. Ch. 303, where the presumption was made in the case of a spinster lady aged fifty-three years and two months, but where it was doubted by the learned judge whether the age was not too low; In re Widdow's Trusts, 19 W. R. 468, L. R. 11 Eq. 408, where Malins, V.C., made the presumption in the cases of a widow aged fifty-five years and four months who had never had children, and of a spinster aged fifty-three years and nine months; In re Millner's Estate, 20 W. R. 823, L. R. 14 Eq. 245, a case of a married woman aged forty-nine and nine months, who had lived twenty-six years with her husband but without issue; Davidson v. Kimpton, 29 W. R. 912, 18 Ch. D. 213, a case of a spinster aged fifty-four years; and Lyddon v. Ellison, 2 W. R. 690, 19 Beav. 565, a case of a spinster aged fifty-six years. In all these cases the presumption was made at ages less than that in the case before me. No case has been cited where the lady was a widow who had had a child, such as the present case. In the case of a spinster we cannot know whether she is capable of child-bearing, while a widow who has had children has been so capable. On the other hand, where a widow who has had a child has lived many years married without bearing any more children, as in the case before me, it may be presumed that her capacity has ceased. It seems to me, therefore, that I may apply the rule followed in the case of spinsters to the case before me, and make the presumption. Two cases where the court refused to make the presumption are distinguishable from the present case; in Croxton v. May, 27 W. R. 325, 9 Ch. D. 388, the age was fifty-four years, which is substantially less, and the lady had been married only three years. In In re Hocking, 47 W. R. 114, at p. 115, [1898] 2 Ch. 567, at p. 571, Lord Lindley expressly excepts cases like the present from the rule he lays down in deciding against the presumption.

MIDDLEMAS v. STEVENS. (a.)

Settled land — Tenant for life—Lease — Bonâ fide exercise of power—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 53, 58 (vi.).

A person having the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, whose interest terminates on her marriage, is not entitled to grant a lease of the property to her intended husband without the consent of the remainderman or the sanction of the court.

By his will dated the 29th of September, 1897, Robert Pennett Stevens gave to his wife, Sarah Stevens, the defendant, "the use and enjoyment, rent free, of his residence Sandfacre, wherein she then resided, for so long during her widowhood of him as she should personally reside in and occupy the same, and also the like use and enjoyment, for so long as she should so as aforesaid personally occupy the said residence, of all the furniture and household effects, and all other effects and things in, upon, and about the same, and about the buildings, gardens, ground, and premises occupied therewith.

By a codicil dated the 12th of October, 1897, the plaintiffs were made residuary legatees.

The testator died shortly after executing this codicil, and the defendant continued to occupy the house under the terms of the will.

She was now about to marry again, and proposed, before her second marriage, to grant a lease of the property to her intended husband for twenty-one years at a fair rent. It was admitted that this was done with a view of enabling the defendant to continue to reside in the house after her marriage.

The plaintiffs objected to the proposed lease, and now applied to the court for a declaration that the lease of the said premises which the plaintiff proposed to grant to her intended husband would not be a fit and proper lease or a bonâ fide exercise of such leasing powers (if any) that the defendant possessed, and was in violation of section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

The defendant claimed to have the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, and to be entitled to grant a lease on proper terms under the said Acts.

Hughes, K.C., and A. St. J. Clerke, for the plaintiffs.—This is not a proper exercise of the power. Under section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "A tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall in relation to the exercise thereof by him be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee of those parties." Here the tenant for life is proposing to exercise the power, not in the interest of all parties, but for her own personal advantage. Her interest in the property is infinitesimal and will cease very shortly. Such use of the power of a tenant for life should therefore be restrained: Sutherland (Dowager Duchess of) v. Sutherland (Duke of), 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169.

G. Lawrence, for the defendant.—The lease is for the benefit of the estate; as the "best rent" is reserved it does not prejudice the remaindermen. It is therefore for the benefit of the estate; that being so, the lease is none the less good because it is granted to a person bearing a particular relation to the grantor or because the tenant for life might indirectly obtain a benefit from it.

JOYCE, J.—Apart from any question as to the intended lessee, the court would look with some suspicion on any case in which a person whose interest in any settled property would cease to-morrow was insisting to-day upon granting a lease which was objected to by the remaindermen. This case, however, goes beyond suspicion. It is clear from the correspondence that the defendant's object in granting the present lease is that she may remain in occupation of the house. That is not a bonâ fide exercise of the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, and the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction to restrain the granting of the lease except with their consent or that of the court.

Sale of goods—Stoppage in transitu—Termination of transit—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 4, sub-sections 1, 3—Passing of property—Acceptance.

Goods were sold by B. to S. "on rail" at a railway station to S.'s order. No memorandum in writing of the contract was signed by S. The railway company advised S. of the arrival of the goods at the station, and that they held them, not as carriers, but as warehousemen at owner's sole risk. S. did not acknowledge the advice note or inspect the goods, but he attempted to resell them. S. having become insolvent and not having paid B., the latter claimed to stop the goods in transitu, and the railway company redelivered the goods to B. In an action against the company by S.'s trustee in bankruptcy claiming damages for conversion,

Held, that the transit of the goods was at an end; that the attempt by S. to resell the goods was evidence of an act done by S. in relation to the goods which recognized a pre-existing contract, and, therefore, evidence that S. had "accepted" the goods within section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Semble, noncompliance with the provisions of section 4 by a buyer of goods does not prevent the property in the goods from passing to the buyer.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

The plaintiff claimed, as trustee in bankruptcy of one Sanders, to recover damages for the conversion by the defendants of fifty-two quarters of barley, the property of Sanders.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment:

"Sanders was a corn merchant in Essex. His practice was to buy goods delivered at different railway stations and to resell the goods to his customers as and when he could. He had no warehouse of his own, and, as the goods which he bought were frequently not resold for some time, he used the depôts of the railway companies as stores, the railway companies charging him with rent. Before the events in this action he had traded in this way with the defendants. On the 19th of October, 1900, Sanders bought of a firm of Barnard Brothers the barley in question at a cost of £68 5s. The goods were sold 'on rail at Elsenham Station' to Sanders's order. On the 24th of October Barnard Brothers gave a written order to the defendants directing them to transfer the barley 'to await the order of Mr. Sanders; charges to Sanders.' This order seems to have been given in anticipation of the arrival of the goods at Elsenham, for they apparently did not reach that place until the 29th of October, on which day the defendants received the goods from a farmer named Newport, who directed the defendants to hold them to the order of Barnard Brothers. Thus the defendants were in possession of the goods with directions from the consignor to hold them to the order of Barnard Brothers, and with directions from Barnard Brothers to transfer them 'to await the order of Sanders.' Thereupon the defendants sent to Sanders an advice note dated the 29th of October. It is headed in large type, 'Advice of outward grain received to await order.' Then the note proceeds as follows: 'Mr. G. Sanders,—The undermentioned grain consigned to wait your order having been received at this station, I will thank you for instructions to forward same as soon as possible, as it remains here and is now held by the company—not as common carriers, but as warehousemen—at owner's sole risk and subject to the usual warehouse charges in addition to the charges now advised.' The note then contained an intimation that, in case forwarding instructions were given in respect of the goods, the defendants would not assume the responsibilities of common carriers until the day following such instructions. At the foot were particulars of the quantity of barley and of the sum payable for carriage to Elsenham. After receiving this advice note Sanders tried to resell the barley, using for the purpose a sample obtained from Barnard Brothers. He was not successful in finding a buyer. He never inspected or sampled the bulk at the railway station. Towards the end of November Sanders ascertained that he was unable to pay his debts as they fell due, and he thereupon called his creditors together by a circular dated the 28th of November. The issuing of this circular constituted an act of bankruptcy, upon which he was subsequently adjudicated; the appointment of the plaintiff as trustee followed. On or about the 30th of November Barnards paid to the defendants the charges for the carriage of the goods to Elsenham and also the amount due up to that time for rent, and the defendants then, at Barnards' request, gave up the goods, taking from Barnards an indemnity against the consequences of so doing. This delivery constituted the alleged conversion."

No memorandum in writing of the contract between Barnards and Sanders had been signed by Sanders or by anyone on his behalf.

Montague Lush, for the defendants.—First, Sanders never did anything to evince an intention of taking possession of the goods, and until he did so the transit never came to an end: Ex parte Cooper, 27 W. R. 518, 11 Ch. D. 68; Ex parte Barrow, 25 W. R. 466, 6 Ch. D. 783. There is no evidence of any agreement between Sanders and the defendants that they should hold the goods as warehousemen. Barnards were therefore in the circumstances entitled to exercise their right to stop the goods in transitu,

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Secondly, assuming that the transit came to an end, this action nevertheless must fail, because the property in the goods never passed to Sanders. There was no compliance with the provisions of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (see Taylor v. Smith, 40 W. R. 486, [1893] 2 Q. B. 65; Nicholson v. Bower, 1 E. & E. 172), 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 39, and therefore there was no binding agreement upon which Sanders could have been sued for the price of the goods or for damages for non-acceptance.

D. Stephens, for the plaintiff—The true inference to draw from all the facts is that the defendants held the goods as warehousemen and not as common carriers. The transit was therefore at an end: Kendal v. Marshall, Stevens, & Co., 31 W. R. 597, 11 Q. B. D. 356; Dixon v. Baldwen, 5 East 175; Rodger v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, 17 W. R. 468, L. R. 2 P. C. 393. As to the second point, non-compliance with the provisions of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act does not prevent the property from passing. The section only says that in such a case the contract shall not be enforceable, but it remains a good contract under which the property in the goods can pass to the buyer: Leroux v. Brown, 1 W. R. 22, 12 C. B. 801. There was, however, in fact an "acceptance" of the goods by Sanders within the meaning of the section, because the attempt to resell the goods was a clear recognition of a pre-existing contract, and therefore evidence of an acceptance: Abbott v. Wolsey, 43 W. R. 513, [1895] 2 Q. B. 97.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This is an action brought by the trustee in bankruptcy of one Sanders to recover damages for the conversion of a quantity of barley, and the question is whether at the date of the alleged conversion, the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the goods. [His lordship stated the facts as set out above, and continued:] The first question is whether Barnard Brothers were on the 30th of November entitled to stop the goods as being still in transitu. I am of opinion that they were not. The transitus was over as soon as a reasonable time had elapsed for Sanders to elect whether he would take the goods away or leave them in the defendant's depôt on rent. Such a reasonable time had elapsed, and, having regard to the fact that it was the practice of the defendants to hold goods for Sanders as warehouse-keepers at rent when they were not removed after arrival at the stations, I find that, by agreement between Sanders and the defendants, the goods were, at the time when Barnards took them away, in the possession of the defendants as warehouse-keepers for Sanders. I should have been of the same opinion even if there had been no course of business, for I do not think that after service of a notice such as that used in this case it is competent for a consignee by silence indefinitely to fix upon a railway company the onerous responsibilities of common carriers. I am satisfied that, if the defendants had sued Sanders for rent, Sanders could not have successfully resisted the claim. It was argued that the words in the advice note "the grain is now held at owner's sole risk and subject to the usual warehouse charges" meant that the goods were held by the defendants on account of whom it might concern, and that "owners" did not necessarily mean Sanders, but might mean Barnards or any one else who should turn out to be the owners. I do not think there is anything in this point. The advice note is addressed to Sanders for the purpose of affecting him, not for the purpose of affecting any one else, and, moreover, Sanders was the owner of the goods; a right in the vendor to stop in transitu does not prevent the buyer from being the owner of the goods; in fact, it necessarily supposes him to be the owner.

Two cases were relied upon by the defendants—Ex parte Cooper and Ex parte Barrow. The first laid down in clear terms that the transition does not end until by agreement between the carrier and the consignee the former holds as warehouse-keeper for the latter. The second case, which involved only a question of fact, determined that in the particular circumstances of that case no such an agreement ought to be inferred. I fully accept the law laid down in the first case, and my decision in no way conflicts with it, for I have found that the necessary agreement did exist; and as to the second case I would point out that, before any advice note could be served on the consignee, he had absconded and there were no facts which could justify a conclusion that the goods were being sold for him otherwise than in transit. In the present case, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwen: "The goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey, that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion," and without such orders they would have remained stationary; and furthermore, whatever the defendants may now say to the contrary, the goods were being held by them as warehouse-keepers for the consignee. In such circumstances I must find the transition to have ended.

But the defendants relied on another defence. It appeared that although Barnard Brothers had signed a sufficient memorandum of the contract of sale within the meaning of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, Sanders had not, and it was said that he had neither paid any part of the price (which was true), nor accepted any part of the goods. In these circumstances it was argued, as I understand, that the property in the goods had not passed from Barnards to Sanders, and that, therefore, Barnards were entitled to possession. I may say at once that this contention, whatever it may be worth in law, is not well founded in fact. I am of opinion that the goods had been accepted by Sanders. He had certainly received them; but, of course, receipt does not necessarily involve acceptance. But after receiving them he had obtained a sample, not, it is true, by drawing it from the bulk at the station, but by asking the vendors to let him have a sample which was in their possession. By means of this sample he had tried to sell the goods. He had, moreover, kept them for a month. These circumstances, in my opinion, amount to an acceptance. The words in section 17 (now repealed) of the Statute of Frauds were, "except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold and actually receive the same." Many cases are to be found in the reports dealing with the meaning of these words; but it is unnecessary to examine them; their effect is to be found sufficiently, and in my opinion accurately, stated on pp. 149 and 150 of the third edition of Mr. Chalmers's book on the Sale of Goods Act; and the new Act contains what the Statute of Frauds did not contain—viz., a definition of the word "acceptance" in this connection. Sub-section 3 of section 4 provides that "there is an acceptance of goods within the meaning of this section when the buyer does any act in relation to the goods which recognizes a pre-existing contract of sale, whether there be an acceptance in performance of the contract or not." Now, I think there could not be a clearer act recognizing a pre-existing contract of sale than the attempt by Sanders to resell. If he had in fact resold, would that not have been sufficient? And if an actual sale, then why not also an attempt to sell?

Can any one suppose that Sanders could have successfully resisted an action for the price? The defendants referred to and relied on a decision under the old Act in 1892, Taylor v. Smith. That case was dealt with by the court as merely involving a question of fact. This appears from an examination of the judgments. I see by a footnote that the case was reported in the Law Reports about a year after it was decided "in deference to representations from various quarters." I think the editor would have done well to have resisted those representations, for the case declares no principles of law, and is, in my opinion, of no general application. It was held there that the buyer did not by looking at the goods at the wharfingers' and by saying "I reject them" in fact accept them. For my part I agree, but it by no means follows that I think in the present case that the buyer did not "accept" the goods. I think he did, and I think, therefore, that though there was no memorandum in writing signed by Sanders, yet the provisions of the statute were sufficiently complied with to make the contract of sale binding upon him.

The view which I take of the facts makes it unnecessary to consider the point of law, but I should like to say a word or two about it and about the case of Nicholson v. Bower, which was cited by Mr. Lush in support of it. I think that the absence of a memorandum in writing and of the other conditions mentioned in section 4, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act does not make a contract void or even voidable. The contract is good. The only effect of the non-fulfilment of the statutory conditions is that it is unenforceable, and the contract being good all the legal consequences of a contract follow; so that if the contract is for the sale of specific goods the property in the goods passes to the buyer. It may be asked what happens if the buyer after making the purchase refuses to fulfil any of the statutory conditions which alone will make the contract enforceable against him. The property in the goods has passed to him, and it may be that he has received the goods themselves, yet he cannot be sued for the price. My answer is that the seller may call upon the buyer to pay for the goods, and, if he fails to comply, the seller may treat the contract as rescinded. The effect of such rescission would be to revest the property in the seller, and entitle him to resume possession.

As to the case of Nicholson v. Bower it was an issue to try whether certain wheat was the property of the plaintiff, who was the assignee of one Pavitt, a bankrupt, or the property of the defendant, who had sold the wheat to Pavitt. Pavitt had not complied with the requirements of the statute, so that the contract of sale never was enforceable against him; and it seems to have been decided that, on this ground, there was no binding contract between the vendor and the vendee, and that, therefore, the property never legally vested in the buyer. If that is the true ground of the decision, I do not think it was right, nor do I think it is in accordance with the later cases decided under the statute. The seller had sold the goods, and was already bound by the contract, and the buyer had bought the goods although he could not be sued for the price if he chose to insist on the statutory defence. In such circumstances it would not be true to say that the property had not passed. I think, however, upon a careful examination of the facts of the case, the decision may be justified on the supposition that, before the assignee's title could be said to have arisen, the vendor and vendee had rescinded the contract so that the property had revested in the former, and this appears to have been the ground upon which the judgment of Erle, J., proceeded.

I think there must be judgment for the plaintiff for £68.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Romer, L.JJ.) — April 1.

THE KING v. COCKERTON. (a.)

Education—Elementary school—School board—Science and art schools or classes—Provision out of rates—Day schools—Evening continuation schools—Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), ss. 3, 5, 7, 8, 53, 54, 74—Elementary Education Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86), s. 13—Education Code (1890) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 22), s. 1.

It is not within the power of a school board to pay out of the rates levied under the Elementary Education Acts the expenses of maintaining in their day schools or evening continuation schools science and art schools or classes registered under the Science and Art Department.

Judgment of Wills and Kennedy, JJ. (ante, p. 252, [1901] 1 Q. B. 322), affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari (ante, p. 252, [1901] 1 Q. B. 322).

The rule nisi was granted at the instance of three members of the School Board for London, and it called upon T. B. Cockerton, an auditor of the Local Government Board, to show cause against the issue of a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash three certificates of disallowance and surcharge made by him as against the applicants on the audit of the accounts of the school board for the half-year ending the 29th of September. 1898.

By an order of the court the facts were stated in the form of a special case, and by further orders leave was given to the Corporation of the City of London and to the Camden School of Art and Science Corporation to show cause against the issue of the writ.

The facts as stated in the special case are sufficiently set out ante, p. 252.

The question was whether the London School Board were justified in paying out of the rates levied under the Elementary Education Acts the expenses of maintaining in their day schools and evening continuation schools science and art schools or classes registered under the Science and Art Department.

The Divisional Court were of opinion that it was not within the power of the school board to pay such expenses out of the rates, and they accordingly discharged the rule.

The applicants appealed.

Asquith, K.C., and Llewelyn Davies, for the applicants.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and H. Sutton, for the auditor.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an important case, for it affects the education of a large portion of the population in this country; and although the excellent arguments which have been addressed to us have ranged over a considerable area of ground, this has been occasioned not so much by reason of the magnitude of the real point in the case, but because of the discussion of the numerous Codes, Directories, and Acts of Parliament relating to education which have come into existence since the passing of Mr. Forster's Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), intituled "An Act to provide for public elementary education in England and Wales." The title is a good clue to what will hereafter be found in the Act. If the arguments had taken place shortly after its passing, in my opinion the case would have been comparatively short; and even now, notwithstanding all that has happened during the thirty years since 1870, the same question still remains, which is the great question in the case—viz., what was the true construction of the Act when it received the Royal Assent upon the 9th of August in that year. My brothers Wills and Kennedy in the Queen's Bench Division have upheld certain disallowances and surcharges made by an auditor upon the accounts of the School Board of London in respect of payments made by that board out of moneys obtained from ratepayers towards the cost of certain education. The learned judges have held that no Act has authorized these payments, and the School Board of London appeals.

Before I come to the Act itself I must point out the condition of things in relation to two institutions which were, and had been for some years, in operation in this country in and prior to the year 1870, for these institutions play an important part in the consideration of this case. There then existed at South Kensington a body corporate under the name of the Department of Science and Art, which corporation was for the furtherance of science and art and generally to do any act or thing that might be conducive to the attainment of the objects for which the department was formed. Its funds were obtained by means of a Parliamentary grant, for which a distinct and separate vote was taken in Parliament. It issued periodically minutes of the matters to be taught in its schools. These minutes became known as the South Kensington Directory. There also existed a branch of the Privy Council called the Education Department. This was unincorporated, and carried on its work at Whitehall. Its funds were obtained by means of a Parliamentary grant for which a distinct and separate vote was also taken in Parliament. It issued periodically minutes of matters to be taught in the schools to which it made grants, and these minutes became known as the Whitehall Code. The system of education prescribed by the Directory and the Code respectively is radically different. Although there are some few matters in the Code and Directory which somewhat overlap, no objection in this case is taken to the teaching by the school board with ratepayers' money of those matters which appear in the Code. It is the teaching of the education prescribed by the Directory with the ratepayers' money which is objected to. After the elaborate and exhaustive judgment of Wills, J., it is wholly unnecessary, and would be mere waste of time, to again narrate in detail that which the learned judge has so clearly and adequately done as regards the essential difference between the Department of Science and Art at South Kensington with its Directory and the Education Department at Whitehall with its Code. It is now sufficient for me to say that the South Kensington Department and the Whitehall Department have always been, and are, separate and distinct institutions. They have a different registration of scholars, different examiners, different grants, and different inspectors; and the South Kensington Department deals by means of its Directory with a high and very advanced system of education, while the Whitehall Department, by means of its Code, deals with an education of a lower and of a much less pretentious character. I may say without going through the details of the South Kensington Directory that no effort of imagination can describe the system of education therein set forth as elementary education; and for the purposes of this case, but only for this case, it is to be taken by admission of the Attorney-General that the education prescribed by the Whitehall Code is elementary education within the meaning of the Act of 1870; and I am not asked in this case to say whether the Code embraces more than elementary education, but I may say it appears to me to embrace elementary education up to its high-water mark.

The concrete question now raised is, Can the School Board of London lawfully pay the expenses of schools and classes for teaching the education prescribed by the South Kensington Directory out of moneys of the ratepayers of London? Prior to the passing of Mr. Forster's Act in 1870 no ratepayer qua ratepayer was under any obligation whatever to contribute towards the expenses of any kind of education. No rates were applicable thereto. The moneys which the South Kensington Department and the Whitehall Department respectively received from Parliament, and which were respectively dealt with by them, were moneys obtained from the taxpayers by means of Imperial taxes and not from ratepayers by means of local rates. The Act of 1870 for the first time set up school districts and school boards therein, and for the first time made the education of children between the ages of five and thirteen compulsory, and it, for the first time, enacted that rates should be levied in order to contribute to the expense of education. It is beyond dispute that if the School Board of London, or, indeed, any other school board (they are all corporations created by statute), is to justify the payment of the expense of education out of the money of the ratepayers, this must be done by producing some Act of Parliament, or Order in Council having the force of an Act of Parliament, which enacts that the ratepayers' money shall be levied and applied to that purpose. Neither a Code nor a Directory has any such force.

Now, what was the scheme which was brought into being by Mr. Forster's Act of 1870, and whereby rates were to be applied to the cost of education? And what were the requirements of the State which then called forth the Act? Was it a scheme whereby the ratepayers should be called upon to contribute towards the expenses of the elementary education of the children in their districts, or was it a scheme that they should be called upon to contribute to the expenses of a high and advanced system of education such as that to be found in the Directory of the Science and Art Department at South Kensington, and were persons other than children to be educated at the expense of the ratepayers? What the State then required and what the consequent scheme of the Act was can only be found by a study of the Act itself, and to the true construction of this Act I now come. In my opinion, if it were not for the definition given in section 3 of the term "elementary school"—not, it will be noticed, of the term "public elementary school"—which definition Mr. Asquith for the school board very happily described as his sheet anchor, and to which if he could not ride he frankly owned that he must go to the bottom (and with this I agree), there would, in my opinion, for the reasons which will appear, have been but little to argue about. To clearly understand the object and scope of this definition, which, in my opinion, has been entirely misapprehended, I will first go through the Act without the definition to see whether in any part of the Act without the definition it can be said that the Act applies to anything else than the elementary education of children; for it is to the education which is to be found in the Act that the ratepayer is called upon to contribute, and to no other.

In the first place, as before stated, the Act is intituled "An Act to provide for public elementary education in England and Wales." This title is to be read as part of the Act itself: Fielding v. Morley Corporation, 47 W. R. 295, [1899] 1 Ch. 1, per Lindley, M.R., and Chitty and Collins, L.JJ. It will be noticed it is not an Act to provide for public education in general, but for public elementary education in England and Wales, which is clearly something less than education in general. By section 1 it is enacted that the Act may be cited as the Elementary Education Act, 1870. By section 3 "parent" includes guardian and any person who is liable to maintain, or has the actual custody of, any child. By section 5 it is enacted that "there shall be provided for every school district a sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools . . . available for all the children resident in such district for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made, and where there is an insufficient amount of such accommodation, in this Act referred to as 'public school accommodation,' the deficiency shall be supplied in manner provided by this Act." It will be seen that this accommodation, whatever the word may mean, is to be provided for children for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made. Mark the words "children" and "elementary education." By section 7, every elementary school which is conducted in accordance with the following regulations shall be a public elementary school within the meaning of this Act, and every public elementary school shall be conducted in accordance with the following regulations: It shall not be required, as a condition of any child being admitted into or continuing in the school that he shall attend or abstain from attending any Sunday-school, and that any scholar may be withdrawn by his parent from religious observances. This is the section by which an elementary school becomes and is called a public elementary school—that is, a board school. A point was made on behalf of the school board, that, as the word "scholar" was used, the education in a board school was not confined to children. I do not agree; for the word "scholar" and the word "child" will be found indiscriminately used both in the Education Acts and in the Codes. By way of example, I would refer to section 7 of the Act of 1870, to section 8 of the Free Education Act of 1891, and to section 17 of the Act of 1870, which two last sections must be read together, and to the Code of 1898, p. 18, in which infants are described as scholars. By section 8 of the Act of 1870 the Education Department—i. e., Whitehall—is to cause returns to be made, and then to take into consideration every school, whether public elementary or not, and whether actually in the district or not, which in their opinion gives, or will when completed give, efficient elementary education to the children of the district. Again, we find the words "elementary education to children," and the department to ascertain this is Whitehall and not South Kensington. By section 17 every child attending a school provided by any school board shall pay such weekly fee as may be prescribed by the school board with the consent of the Education Department—here again Whitehall—with power to the school beard from time to time to remit the whole or any part of such fee in the case of any child when they are of opinion that the parent of such child is unable from poverty to pay the same. This section applies to a child and no one else except its parent. Section 30 provides for the formation of school boards, and they are by this section made bodies corporate. Section 37 deals with school boards in the metropolis, and I find no distinction in the Act upon the point I am now inquiring into between the School Board of London and the other school boards in the kingdom. Sections 53 and 54 enact how the expenses of a school board are to be paid. Section 53 is as follows: "The expenses of the school board under this Act shall be paid out of a fund called the school fund. There shall be carried to the school fund all moneys received as fees from scholars"—this means the fees the board is entitled to receive under section 17 from every child attending school (note the words scholar and child used indiscriminately)—"or out of moneys provided by Parliament or raised by way of loan or in any manner whatever received by the school board, and any deficiency shall be raised by the school board as provided by this Act." And by section 54 it is provided that "any sum required to meet any deficiency in the school fund whether for satisfying past or future liabilities shall be paid by the rating authority out of the local rate." Here is to be found for the first time in the history of education in this country an enactment applying rates towards defraying the expenses of education. By section 67 the local authority once a year are to send to the Education Department, Whitehall, a return containing particulars with respect to elementary schools and children requiring elementary education in their district. By section 74, which is under the heading of "Attendance at School," it is enacted that every school board with the approval of the Education Department, Whitehall, may make by-laws for, amongst other, the following purposes: Requiring the parents of children of such age not less than five years nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the by-laws, to cause such children (unless there is some reasonable excuse) to attend school; and by a proviso to this section it is enacted that as regards a child between ten and thirteen years of age, such child need not attend school if one of his Majesty's inspectors—that is, from Whitehall—certifies that such child has reached a standard of education specified in the by-law.

Having now gone through the Act apart from the definition of the term "elementary school" in section 3, can it be said with any regard to truth that this Act deals with any education other than the elementary education of children? I think certainly not. In addition to what is set forth above, it should not be lost sight of that the Act of 1870 over and over again refers to the Education Department—that is, Whitehall—which for the purpose of this case is admitted to be the authority as to elementary education, and elementary education alone, and it is admitted that from first to last the Act of 1870 makes no reference whatever to the Department of Science and Art at South Kensington with its high and advanced system of education. That the recipients of the education mentioned in the Act are children, and children only, cannot be denied, for I would ask who else can be found pointed at throughout the Act to receive the education the Act prescribes other than children.

I now take the definition in section 3 of the Act of 1870 of the term "elementary school." It is as follows: "In this Act the term 'elementary school' means a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given, and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction from each scholar exceed 9d. a week." It is argued for the school board that this definition constitutes a statutory enactment whereby a board school or a department of a board school is empowered to give the highest and most advanced education of the South Kensington Directory at the ratepayers' expense, if the principal part of the education given in such school or department of such school is elementary. As to this contention the first observation to be made is that this definition of the term "elementary school" is not an enactment providing for the giving of any education at all, and much less an enactment that a school board in a public elementary school is thereby empowered to give the education prescribed by the Directory of South Kensington at the expense of the ratepayers. This seems to me to be an answer to the school board's contention. But, if the contention really be that it is a statutory enactment such as the board contends for, what is the meaning of the last part of the definition—"and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction from each scholar exceed 9d. a week"? I heard no reason given as to this by the learned counsel for the school board. It is common knowledge that prior to the Act of 1870 there was in this country a vast amount of education of all descriptions, elementary and non-elementary, carried on by schools supported by voluntary contributions, and, indeed, at the present day there still exists a considerable amount of such education. These schools have come to be known as voluntary schools. It was not the object of Mr. Forster's Act to destroy these voluntary schools and thus cast upon the rates their enormous cost, which was being provided for by voluntary contributions. What Mr. Forster's Act enacted was that the school board should supply and the ratepayer should pay for the elementary education of children if, taking into consideration every school, whether public elementary or not and whether situated in the school district or not (section 8), the elementary education which was then being provided was not sufficient. The object and meaning of the definition clause in my judgment is that, inasmuch as all kinds of education were then being taught in these voluntary schools, those outside schools only should come within the Act and derive the benefits by way of grants and otherwise conferred by the Act at which elementary education was the principal part of the education therein given; and, in addition, that only those outside voluntary schools should come within the Act if they were schools at which the ordinary payments therein in respect of the instruction from each scholar did not exceed 9d. a week apiece. That voluntary schools are referred to in the Act of 1870 as "elementary schools" in my opinion is apparent from, amongst others, section 23, section 12, sub-section 2, section 9, sub-section 2, and section 7. The object, meaning, and scope of the definition was to select out of these voluntary schools those which had these two attributes—viz., that the principal part of the education was elementary, and that the scholars paid no more than 9d. apiece a week. If there was not this definition, I do not see why all voluntary schools could not have claimed the benefit of the Act, no matter what was their teaching, if they conformed to the requirements of the Act as regards religious teaching and otherwise. This definition, in my judgment, instead of being a statutory enactment that the highest education prescribed by the Directory should be taught by a board school at the expense of the ratepayers, is a definition whereby a limit is placed as to those voluntary schools which should become public elementary schools within the Act of 1870 and obtain its benefits; and, in my opinion, this definition has no such effect as that contended for on behalf of the school board. What I have above said as to the true construction of the Act of 1870 I will not repeat, for what I have already said upon the Act equally applies whether the definition in section 3 is taken or not.

I now come to the next Education Act which was passed—namely, the Elementary Education Act, 1873, by section 2 of which it is enacted that "This Act shall be construed as one with the principal Act" (that is, of 1870), "and the expression 'this Act' in the principal Act shall be construed to include this Act." In other words, the Act of 1873 is made part and parcel of the Act of 1870, which Act is to be read as if the Act of 1873 had been contained therein. Now what do we find in this Act of 1873? Section 13, in my opinion, is decidedly of importance. It enacts, "A school board shall be able and be deemed always to have been able to be constituted trustees for any educational endowment or charity for purposes connected with education . . . and to have and always to have had power to accept any real or personal property given to them as an educational endowment or upon trust for any purposes or connected with education; provided that (1) nothing in this section shall enable a school board to be trustees for or accept any educational endowment, charity, or trust the purposes of which are inconsistent with the principles on which the school board are required by section 14 of the principal Act to conduct schools provided by them." (This is the section relating to the non-teaching of religion distinctive of any particular denomination.) "And (2) every school connected with such endowment, charity, or trust shall be deemed to be a school provided by the school board, except that nothing in this section shall authorize the school board to expend any money out of the local rate for any purpose other than elementary education." Here in this section, as it seems to me, which, be it remembered, forms part and parcel of the Act of 1870, is an emphatic declaration by the Legislature that the school board is not to expend any money out of a local rate for any purpose other than elementary education. In fact, it enacts in short and positive terms that which is the whole tenor of the Act of 1870, as I have above endeavoured to show.

In my opinion, the many Acts which were subsequently passed down to and including the year 1891 have no real bearing on the point I have to decide, except that they show that the Legislature was throughout dealing with the elementary education of children and nothing else. I will very shortly go through them, for they have been referred to. In 1876 an Act was passed as to the employment and education of children called the Elementary Education Act, 1876. By section 4 it enacted that it was the duty of the parent of every child to cause such child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that in default he should be liable to a penalty. By section 48 "a child in this Act means a child between the ages of five and fourteen years." In 1879 an Act was passed relating to the powers of school boards in relation to industrial schools. In 1880 an Act was passed to make further provision as to bye-laws respecting the attendance of children at school under the Elementary Education Acts. In 1885 an Education Act was passed foreign to this case. In 1890 an Act was passed for the purpose of making operative certain articles in the Code of 1890. This Act, by section 1, enacted that, "it shall not be required as a condition of a Parliamentary grant to an evening school that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education there given, and so much of the definition of the term 'elementary school' in section 3 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, as requires that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education given in the elementary school shall not apply to evening schools." So that, although an evening school need not have elementary education as the principal part of its education to thereafter get a Parliamentary grant (this has nothing to do with rates and moneys therefrom), yet, if the school was one at which the ordinary payment in respect of instruction for each scholar exceeded 9d. a week, an evening school, it would seem, is still left with that fetter, and will not get a Parliamentary grant. This is the first Act to which my attention has been called in which an evening school is mentioned. By section 3, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1890, the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1876, and the Elementary Education Act, 1880, and this Act may be cited collectively as the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1890. In 1891 an Act was passed to make further provision for assisting education in public elementary schools in England and Wales. By section 1 a grant called a fee grant was passed by Parliament in aid of the cost of elementary education in England and Wales at the rate of 10s. a year for each child of the number of children over three and under fifteen years of age in average attendance at any public elementary school in England and Wales not being an evening school; and by section 13 (1) the Act might be construed as one with the Elementary Acts, 1870 to 1890, and (2) the Acts may be cited collectively as the Elementary Acts, 1870 to 1891.

So much for the Acts ranging from 1870 to 1891; and I can find no indication in any of them that education other than that embraced in the Act of 1870 was to be taught by a school board at the expense of the ratepayers; and the education which a school board is by statute authorized to teach at that expense, in my judgment, is the same whether it be taught in the daytime or the evening. There is one other Act to which I must make reference, for it was much relied upon by the school board. It was not one of the Elementary Education Acts of 1870 to 1891, which form a code of themselves; but is one of the Technical Education Acts, 1887 to 1891, which form a distinct code of themselves. The Act is called the Technical Instruction Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76). It is an Act to facilitate the provision of technical instruction. It is said that this Act contains a legislative recognition that the higher education of South Kensington, and not merely the elementary education provided by the Code, can be taught by school boards and be paid for out of rates. This Act, by section 1, sub-section 1 (a), enacts that a local authority (this is not a school board, but a town or county council) may out of a local rate (this is not an education rate) supply or aid technical or manual instruction, but shall not out of the local rate supply the same to scholars receiving instruction at an elementary school in the obligatory or standard subjects prescribed by the minutes of the Education Department, Whitehall. The reason for this seems pretty obvious, because to the scholars in those standards the Education Department might well give elementary, technical, or manual instruction, and that the local and school board authorities were not to clash. Then comes a provision about making a local rate, by a local authority, which has nothing to do with a school board. It is there provided, sub-section 1 (g), that the rate to be raised in any one year by a local authority is not to exceed 1d. in the pound, and yet, according to the argument of the school board it may levy for technical and manual instruction a rate to any amount it may require. Sub-section 3 enacts "nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to interfere with any existing powers of school boards with respect to the provision of technical and manual instruction." As before stated, it seems to me that there may well be technical and manual instruction of an elementary kind which the school board may well teach as being elementary education. Then comes this (section 3): "The conditions on which Parliamentary grants may be made in aid of technical and manual instruction"—i.e., to the local authority—"shall be those contained in the minutes of the Department of Science and Art," the department, as before shown, with which the Elementary Education Act of 1870 has nothing to do. I have gone far enough in this Act to show that it has nothing to do with the true construction of Mr. Forster's Act of 1870, and with just referring to the novelty of the attempt to interpret one Act by another Act passed nineteen years afterwards, upon another and different subject-matter, I will conclude by saying that the Act of 1889 is not a legislative recognition of the right of the school board to teach the Directory education and make the ratepayers pay for it.

I now answer the questions put to me, but I will answer (1) and (2) together. (1 and 2) I say it was not within the powers of a board as a statutory corporation to provide science and art schools or classes of the kind referred to in this case, either in the day schools or in evening continuation schools, out of the school board rate or school fund. (3) That the rule nisi should not be made absolute in regard to any of the disallowances and surcharges, for, in my judgment, for the reasons above given, they were correctly made by the auditor. I may add that, if the school board is to have the powers it seeks, these must be obtained by legislation, for the powers it desires to have do not exist in any statute or its equivalent already passed. This appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

MOFFATT & PAIGE (LIMITED) v. GILL & SONS (LIMITED) AND MARSHALL. (a.)

Copyright—School edition of Shakespeare—Colourable imitation—Common sources of knowledge—Injunction, when granted.

An author dealing with a subject already treated by another is at liberty (1) to use all common sources of information, (2) to use the work of that other as a guide to those common sources, and (3) to use that other's work to test the completeness of his own.

Where there has been no extensive copying, and no extraction of the vital part of the plaintiff's work, the court will not grant an injunction.

Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 K. & J. 708, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 19, and Pike v. Nicholas, 18 W. R. 321, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 251, considered.

This was an action brought by Messrs. Moffatt & Paige (Limited) against Messrs. Gill & Sons (Limited) and the Rev. Francis Marshall as publishers and editor respectively of an annotated edition of Shakespeare's "As You Like It." Both firms are largely concerned in the publication of books for the use of schools.

In the year 1893 the plaintiff company published an edition of the play by Thomas Page, and in 1898 the defendant company published a similar work edited by the defendant Marshall. Upon the plaintiff company commencing an action on the ground that the last-named work was an infringement of their copyright, the proceedings were stayed on the terms of the defendant company agreeing to pay a sum by way of damages and to destroy all copies of their book. To this agreement the defendant Marshall was not a party.

In March, 1900, the defendant company published what purported to be a second edition of their work. This edition the plaintiff company declared to be a colourable imitation of their work and an infringement of their copyright. In particular they claimed that the general arrangement, the sketches of character, the literary notes and glossary, and the illustrative quotations were largely copied from their book, and were not the result of independent research. They claimed damages, an injunction to restrain the infringement of their copyright, and the delivery up of all copies of the book which were in the defendants' possession. The claim was restricted to the second edition.

By his defence the defendant Marshall denied that he had done more than make a legitimate use of the plaintiffs' book in common with the works of other commentators, but admitted that, for the sake of convenience, he had copied out of the plaintiffs' book a quotation from another writer.

Warrington, K.C., and Henry Lynn, for the plaintiff company.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the defendant company.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Percy Wheeler, for the defendant Marshall.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case stands alone, and must stand alone, unless and until another is concerned with a critical work on one of the plays of Shakespeare. In saying this I do not forget that the Bible is often classed with Shakespeare in our list of books in the English language. Biblical literature is far more extensive than Shakespearian, and it may safely be asserted that more has been written and spoken on one book of the Bible than has been written and spoken on any one play of Shakespeare; but, as regards Shakespeare's plays, we have, in addition to what has been written and spoken, the traditions of generation after generation resting on the dramatic performance of the plays, or at least of a large number of them, and the constant domestic discussion of such performances which have rendered the plots and characters, and even the language, familiar to all classes of educated English men and English women. The issue to be decided is simply whether the second edition of the defendant Marshall's book is an infringement of the copyright of which the plaintiffs are the proprietors in Mr. Page's book. I accentuate the words second edition because on them much depends. Yet I think the plaintiffs are entitled to know my opinion on the question whether, on the assumption that the first as well as the second edition is before me, the copyright has been infringed. That the first edition infringed the copyright is scarcely open to doubt. I count for nothing the consent judgment (to which Mr. Marshall was no party); but the admissions extracted from him in cross-examination show that, especially as regards the sketch of the character of Rosalind, he not merely derived great benefit from Mr. Page's book, but practically in many particulars copied it. I accept his statement that Mr. Page's book was not before him—that is, not lying open on the table so that he could refer to it—but I also accept his statement that he had read it carefully, and that with an excellent memory he could and did have present to his mind Mr. Page's treatment of the subject and the language in which that treatment was expressed. When preparing the second edition he read Mr. Page's book again in order to see what passages required to be deleted (which passages he at once struck out), and with his memory thus refreshed he rewrote certain characters, including Rosalind, so far as this operation rendered rewriting necessary. I think it was impossible for Mr. Marshall to compile a second edition on the same lines as the first which should not infringe the copyright. I think it was impossible for him to divorce his mind sufficiently for that purpose from the book which he knew well and from which he had largely borrowed, especially when he had been obliged to consult it afresh and with some special care. Avoiding the use of Mr. Page's language was wholly insufficient to enable Mr. Marshall to escape from the difficulty in which he had placed himself. If, therefore, I were at liberty to treat the first edition as the subject of complaint, or to regard the second as springing from it, I should not hesitate to find on this ground alone that the plaintiffs' copyright had been infringed, or to give them the full rights to which such infringement would entitle them in this court. It was agreed by counsel on either side that the liberty of an author dealing with a subject already treated by another is properly and completely stated by Mr. Scrutton in his book on the law of copyright. His statement on p. 116 of the third edition, which I willingly adopt, is this: He may (1) use all common sources of information; (2) use the work of another as a guide to those common sources; (3) use another's works to test the completeness of his own. Accepting this, the question is whether Mr. Marshall has to any, and what, extent gone beyond that, or in other words, to apply the test given by Lord Eldon in Wilkins v. Aikin, 17 Ves. 422, and quoted by Wood, V.C., in Spiers v. Brown, 6 W. R. 352, whether he has or has not made "a legitimate use of the plaintiffs' publication in the fair exercise of a mental operation deserving the character of an original work." The cases cited in argument, which include the two to which I have just referred, and which, of course, are only a careful selection from many, both ancient and modern, to be found in the books, are only illustrative of general principles applied by different judges to the different facts and different classes of books before them, with observations suggested by those facts and books. All their observations are valuable and instructive, and I must endeavour to use them with reference to this particular case as best I can; but, as already said, this particular case is one of such peculiarity that after all it has to be treated on its own lines. It bears some resemblance to cases respecting dictionaries, such as Spiers v. Brown, to cases respecting educational works, such as Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 K. & J. 708, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 19, and to cases respecting handbooks and directories, such as Murray v. Bogue, 1 W. R. 109, 1 Drew. 353, and Morris v. Wright, 18 W. R. 327, L. R. 5 Ch. 279; and yet under the circumstances and for the reasons above stated it is distinguishable from all, and stands alone. The plaintiffs were ordered to give further the better particulars than those mentioned in the statement of claim, and they delivered particulars extending to twenty printed pages. Those particulars are, to my thinking, extravagant, and the plaintiffs' counsel, though he did not abandon any, necessarily and properly limited his comments to a small part of them. I must make some remarks on each of the five different heads of the printed particulars, but, for reasons which will presently appear, I shall not take them altogether in the order adopted by the particulars themselves. The plaintiffs first object to the general arrangement of Mr. Marshall's book as compared with that of their own. My study of the two books does not lead me to the conclusion that in this respect Mr. Marshall has done anything wrong. Volumes such as those issued from the Clarendon Press, which, though noticing peculiarities of style, language, grammar, and the like, do not devote themselves to this side of the subject, but treat the play more on the lines on which a general reader would wish it to be treated, do not supply the materials required for purely educational purposes, which probably no one thought of collecting in bygone years. On the other hand, there are other works (notably Abbotts' Shakesperian Grammar) which do supply a vast body of materials, and merely because those materials are alike found to be used in two books I cannot arrive at the conclusion that Mr. Marshall copied Mr. Page unless I can further detect such a correspondence in arrangement and treatment as makes that conclusion necessary. I fail to do this. There is nothing in Mr. Marshall's book which may not have been fairly derived from common sources of information with the exercise of that liberty of reference which was open to him under the second and third head stated by Mr. Scrutton. I cannot doubt that Mr. Marshall is largely indebted to Mr. Page, but dealing at present only with the first objection in the particulars, I do not think that he can be held to have made an unfair use of the latter's work.

Under this first head of complaint the particulars call special attention to Mr. Marshall's glossary, which, it is alleged, corresponds closely in plan with Mr. Page's etymological notes. I have taken some pains to test the truth of this. No book on Shakespeare, or on any other particular play, would be complete without a glossary of some kind. It may be merged in general notes, as in the Clarendon Press volume, or it may be found elsewhere, but somewhere there must be available to the student an explanation of Shakespeare's language sufficient to enable him to understand what he reads. That there is a glossary by whatever name called in each of these books is therefore of no moment, and that they are to some extent alike in plan and in detail follows as a matter of necessity. I can discover no reason for concluding that Mr. Marshall has here transgressed the limits allowed him by law, and, indeed, I doubt whether in this particular part of his book he has consulted Mr. Page as much as elsewhere. His far more diffuse style and his restricted list of references point in this direction.

I pass over the second complaint in the plaintiff's particulars to notice the third, which deals with a passage in Lady Martin's essay on Rosalind, copied by Mr. Page into his book, and occurring also word for word in Mr. Marshall's book. That gentleman says that he was aware, as I have no doubt he was, of that passage in Lady Martin's essay, but that for convenience sake he copied it from Mr. Page's book. This was slovenly in editorship, and wrong in point of law.

The fourth complaint in the particulars deals with literary notes, which are alleged to have been copied by Mr. Marshall. There is no doubt a striking similarity between the criticism of language made by the two authors, and they to a great extent select the same language for criticism. Mr. Marshall arranges his criticisms under heads different from those of Mr. Page, and he apparently thought that herein consists a broad distinction between the two books. I do not agree with him in that; and if I thought that he had in fact copied Mr. Page I should have no difficulty in holding him to have infringed the latter's copyright, notwithstanding that his remarks are distributed on a different plan. Here comes in the paramount importance of the observation made above, respecting the common knowledge of Shakespeare's language and the many criticisms of it. Reading the extracts, I can myself recognize many remarks and illustrations as familiar, and I can discover nothing that strikes me as original.

Now I must turn back to the character sketches, and first to that of Rosalind. There is a great general resemblance between Mr. Page's sketch and that of Mr. Marshall, but each of them expresses what has been written again and again by many writers, including, of course, Lady Martin; and, with one exception, I do not find any striking correspondence in language. The exception is found in the use by Mr. Marshall of the words "without malice" in the description of Rosalind's wit.

On the whole, although believing that Mr. Marshall is far more indebted to Mr. Page than he has been willing to admit, I do not think that he has done anything coming up to what Kindersley, V.C. in Murray v. Bogue, 1 Drew., p. 369, styles "an extraction of the vital part." In other words, I do not think that if all borrowed by Mr. Marshall from Mr. Page were cut out of his book it would be a whit the worse or in any wise a different book or less useful for the purpose for which it is designed. This conclusion rests mainly on two considerations which have been already fully stated, but which by reason of their weight on my mind I deem it worth while to repeat. First, I am much impressed with the extraordinary abundance of common sources of knowledge, and as said by the Lord Chancellor in Pike v. Nicholas, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 261, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 19: "When once it was established that there were common sources it would be naturally expected that there would be great similarity in the statements of the facts which were narrated from those common sources,"

This opinion coincides with that of Wood, V.C., in Spiers v. Brown. In the commencement of a judgment which has never seemed to me to have attracted the attention it deserves, he dwells on this, and towards the end apparently relies on it as largely assisting the conclusion at which he arrived—that there had been no illegitimate use by the defendant in that case of the plaintiff's work. It may be that I have attributed too much weight to this consideration, and yet my conclusion that the plaintiffs' copyright has not been infringed is still sound. Secondly, I have treated the second edition of Mr. Marshall's book quite independently of the first edition for the purpose of comparison with the plaintiffs' book. If in this my judgment is erroneous, it cannot, according to my own view, be supported at all.

The question then arises whether, holding that Mr. Marshall has borrowed some language in particular passages from the plaintiffs' book, I am bound to grant an injunction. It was well urged by Mr. Hamilton, on behalf of the publishers, that where you find a phrase copied here and there, but there is nothing to show extensive copying or extraction of the vital part, the severe remedy by injunction ought not to be applied. It is strange how little authority is to be found on this point. It was discussed in Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 K. & J. 708, apparently formed the mainstay of Sir Hugh Cairns's argument, and was dealt with by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment (p. 722), but that case was decided on motion for an interlocutory injunction and at a time when the Court of Chancery only granted an injunction in aid of a legal right when that legal right was not in question or had first been established in an action at law. A similar remark applies to the two cases noticed by the Vice-Chancellor—Bell v. Whitehead, 3 Jurist 68, and McNeill v. Williams, 11 Jurist 344. But in Pike v. Nicholas, the court was dealing with a decree made on the hearing of the cause, and on p. 269 Giffard, L.J., uses language which maintains the discretion of the court in granting or refusing the particular remedy. He was brought to the conclusion that there had been really no such use made by the defendant of the plaintiff's book as entitled the plaintiff to an injunction, though the defendant was much more indebted to the plaintiff's book than he had at all admitted. And it seems to me that on principle the court must have that discretion and is bound to exercise it with reference to the particular facts and circumstances of each case brought before it. The main question which one has to put to oneself is whether there is evidence of animus furandi. I think there is not, and that therefore no injunction should be granted. The plaintiffs, of course, formally ask for damages, but it follows from what has already been said that damages, if granted, could only be nominal, and I see no reason for granting them such relief. There remains the question of costs. I cannot give any to the defendant Marshall. He has avowedly done one thing reprehensible in any editor, even though dealing with such a subject as this, and even though quoting from such a well-known book as that of Lady Martin. Moreover, he has made no acknowledgment of his indebtedness to Mr. Page, and, as regards his second edition, he has not had the generosity to make any admission in the witness-box. The defendants George Gill & Son (Limited) stand in a somewhat different position. They are, of course, responsible for the publication of Mr. Marshall's book and for his errors, but they have already been sued by the plaintiffs and have been condemned in damages as regards the first edition, and it would be hard to deprive them of costs when they have been successful in defeating the plaintiffs' claim as regards the second edition. The plaintiffs must pay their costs.

THOMSON v. SELOUS. (a.)

Joint tenancy—Settled estate—Trustees—Tenancy in common—Assignment — Commensurate estates, legal and equitable—Merger.

A leasehold property settled by a testator on his two daughters in equal shares as tenants in common was, at their request, assigned by the trustee to them as joint tenants for the residue of the lease, they entering into a joint covenant with him to pay the rent, &c., and to indemnify him. One of the daughters having died,

Held, that the assignment created a joint tenancy, the original tenancy in common not raising a presumption against the merger of the equitable estate of such tenancy in common in the legal estate; the entirety, therefore, belonged to the surviving daughter.

The rule that one person cannot be trustee for himself (Selby v. Alston, 3 Ves. 339) applies also to a case of two or more absolute owners.

Originating summons.

The testator bequeathed a leasehold messuage to a trustee in trust for two of his daughters in equal shares as tenants in common. He died on the 24th of September, 1890.

By an indenture dated the 24th of June, 1895, and made between the trustee of the one part, and the daughters of the other part, after reciting the above bequest, and reciting that the daughters had requested the trustee to execute such assignment to them of the said messuage as was thereinafter expressed, it was witnessed that the trustee at the request and by the direction of the daughters assigned the messuage to the daughters as joint tenants for the residue of the lease, the daughters entering into a joint covenant with the trustee to pay the rent and perform the covenants of the lease, and to indemnify the trustee against all claims on account of the same.

One of the daughters having died on the 15th of September, 1900, this summons was taken out to determine, among other questions, whether one moiety of the leasehold messuage belonged to her estate, or whether the entirety belonged to the surviving daughter.

Jason Smith, for the executors of the deceased daughter.—There is nothing unusual in the form of the assignment of the 24th of June, 1895. The equitable estate of the tenancy in common was not extinguished or merged in the legal joint tenancy, for the two estates (equitable and legal) were not commensurate or of the same quality.

T. Method, for the surviving sister.—The equitable estate became merged in the legal estate by virtue of the assignment, leaving a joint tenancy. The rule in Selby v. Alston, 3 Ves. 339, applies; see also Lee v. Lee, 25 W. R. 225, 4 Ch. D. 175, and In re Douglas, Wood v. Douglas, 33 W. R. 390, 28 Ch. D. 327.

R. Goddard and C. E. Bovill, for other parties to the summons.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FARWELL, J.—In my opinion this is a joint tenancy. [Here his lordship stated the facts as above, reading the recitals in the assignment and also the joint covenant.] For the executors of the deceased daughter it was argued that only the legal estate was conveyed. In my opinion that is not the true view. The true rule, as laid down in Selby v. Alston, is not confined to one person only. The rule that one person cannot be trustee for himself applies to the case of two absolute owners; two persons cannot be trustees for themselves, any more than one can for himself. My only doubt was whether the advantage of a tenancy in common raises a presumption against merger. I think that the difference in interest between a joint tenancy and a tenancy in common is so small and shadowy that it is not enough to raise the presumption, even if it could be raised. But I decide on the point that two persons cannot be trustees for themselves.

In re MORRISON. (a.)
MORRISON v. MORRISON.

Trustee—Investment—Sale and conversion—Shares in partnership—Conversion into limited company—Unauthorized investment—Jurisdiction.

The court has no jurisdiction to authorize trustees of a testator, who was a member of a partnership carrying on a business, to agree to take shares in a limited company into which it is proposed to convert the business, in exchange for the interest of the testator therein, where such shares are not investments authorized by the will or by law; and the court will not consider whether such a course is beneficial for the estate of the testator or not.

The cases where the court has approved of such agreements have been benevolent cases.

The testator in this case was a partner in an iron foundry business, and this was a summons by his trustees asking for the sanction of the court to an agreement entered into by them with the surviving partners to accept shares in a limited company into which it was proposed to convert the business, in exchange for the interest of their testator.

Mr. Morrison, the testator, being entitled to one-fourth share of the said business, which he carried on in conjunction with five other partners, by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to the plaintiffs, who were also his executors, upon trust for sale and conversion, for payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and for investment of the residue of the proceeds of sale. He directed his trustees to carry on his farming business, and gave them power to postpone the sale and conversion (except as to shares in unlimited companies), and to continue to hold his (then) present investments so long as they thought fit; and in addition to the securities mentioned in the Trustee Act, 1893, or any statutory modification thereof, he gave his trustees power to lay out the trust funds in the purchase of freehold and copyhold estates in England and Wales. The will contained no further power of investment. The iron foundry business was not mentioned. The beneficiaries under the will were the defendants, the testator's widow and his six infant children. The testator died in February, 1900.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The surviving partners desired to turn the business into a limited company, and it was proposed that the company should take over the business in exchange for the issue of 40,000 fully paid-up shares of £1 each, and £20,000 worth of £5 per cent. debenture stock (that being the whole of the stock to be issued), and the company were to indemnify the vendors of the business against all debts and liabilities. The plaintiffs were to have one-fourth of the shares and one-fourth of the stock in respect of their testator's interest. The surviving partners and the plaintiffs had entered into an agreement in July, 1900, to carry out the above proposals, subject to the approval of the court being obtained. This summons was taken out by the trustees against the widow and infant children asking the court to approve of the agreement as beneficial for the infants, and to authorize the trustees to carry it out. Affidavits were made showing that the proposed arrangement would be beneficial for the testator's estate.

Ingpen, K.C., and Fischer Williams.—It is not the trustees who are turning the business into a company, but the surviving partners. The whole transaction may be looked upon as a step in the process of converting the assets into money under the trust for sale and conversion. Such transactions have been sanctioned by the courts on previous occasions, as in the cases of Lord v. Seddon, Sir Titus Salt's Estate, and Bryce v. Bullard, mentioned in Palmer's Company Precedents (7th ed.), p. 613. [BUCKLEY, J., referred to West of England and South Wales District Bank v. Murch, 31 W. R. 467, 23 Ch. D. 138, and to In re Crawshay, 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 126, 60 L. T. R. 357.]

H. C. Hawkins, for the beneficiaries, referred to In re Crowther, 43 W. R. 571, [1895] 2 Ch. 56.

BUCKLEY, J.—The course proposed amounts in substance either to a sale of the property, and an investment of the proceeds in unauthorized securities, or to an exchange of the testator's property for property of a kind which his trustees are not authorized to hold. The trustees have no power to adopt either of these courses, and the court also in administering the estate has no such power. There have no doubt been cases where the court has made orders of this kind. One was made by Sir George Jessel in the case of the estate of the late Sir Titus Salt, in 1881, a case of an extraordinary nature. But I have been referred to no principle as laid down in those cases upon which the jurisdiction of the court was founded. They were all benevolent cases. Only two cases upon this question are reported. One is West of England Bank v. Murch. In that case Fry, J., treated the transaction as a compromise with creditors, and as coming under section 30 of Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145). The other is In re Crawshay, where the court was asked to sanction the business being turned into a limited liability company, and the acceptance by the trustees of shares and debentures in the company in exchange for the shares of the testator in the business; and North, J., held that even if the scheme was a beneficial one, he had no jurisdiction to sanction it. I feel myself in the same position. I have not heard the evidence as to the advantage of the proposed arrangement, but I do not think that, even if it is beneficial, there resides any jurisdiction in the court to sanction the trustees doing that which the will does not allow them to do.

Application refused.

FOULGER v. ARDING. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease, construction of—Covenant to pay taxes, &c.

Under a demise of premises for sixteen years the lessee covenanted that he would "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, including sewers and main drainage assessments, and impositions whatsoever which now are, or which at any time or times hereafter may during the continuance of the said term hereby granted, be taxed or rated, assessed, charged or imposed upon or in respect of the said premises or any part thereof, on the landlord, tenant, or occupier of the same premises by authority of Parliament or otherwise howsoever (landlord's property tax and tithe only excepted)." There was no covenant to repair on either side.

Held, that expenses incurred by the landlord in complying with a notice of the sanitary inspector to abate a nuisance by the execution of structural alterations on the premises were not expenses which he was entitled to charge to the lessee under the covenant.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court.

The plaintiff was the owner of a lease dated the 5th of March, 1891, of premises known as Parklands, Tooting Graveney Common, granted by B. J. Aspinall, the freeholder of the premises, to Sir Henry Doulton, who transferred to the plaintiff.

The defendant was the tenant of the same premises under an underlease dated the 27th of June, 1892, granted by Sir Henry Doulton to Robert Ellwood, which underlease was transferred to the defendant in June, 1896.

The underlease, which demised the premises for a term of sixteen years, contained the above covenant.

By a notice dated the 25th of August, 1900, the plaintiff was required by the sanitary inspector for the parish of Streatham to abate a nuisance arising on the above premises from a foul and offensive privy, defective soil-pipe or connections to water-closets, and other defective sanitary arrangements, by removing the old foul and offensive privy and all contaminated soil and excreta, building a new water-closet strictly in accordance with the bye-laws of the London County Council, laying a new 4-inch drain properly ventilated, making good the defects in the soil-pipe or branches, and by executing other works of a like character necessary to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance.

The plaintiff executed the work required by the notice at a cost of £35, and demanded that amount from the defendant, who refused to pay. Thereupon the plaintiff brought an action in the county court claiming the above sum as damages for breach of the above covenant.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Colam, for the appellant.—The words of the covenant do not extend to these expenses. In Tidswell v. Whitworth, 15 W. R. 427, L. R. 2 C. P. 326, the tenant covenanted that he would "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, assessments, and impositions whatsoever (except property tax) which should become payable in respect of the demised premises," and it was held that the covenant did not cover paving expenses which the landlord had been required to pay under a local Improvement Act. In Rawlins v. Briggs, 27 W. R. 158, 3 C. P. D. 368, the terms of the covenant were almost precisely similar to the terms of the present covenant, and it was held that the tenant was not liable to pay under it expenses to which the landlord had been put in complying with a notice to abate a nuisance: see also Badcock v. Hunt, 37 W. R. 205, 22 Q. B. D. 145. In Brett v. Rogers, 45 W. R. 334, [1897] 1 Q. B. 525, and Farlow v. Stevenson, 48 W. R. 213, [1900] 1 Ch. 128, the covenant included the term "duties," and the cost of drainage work required to be done by the local authority which was held to be covered by the covenant came under that term.

Clavell Salter, for the respondent.—The covenant is one by means of which it is intended that the landlord should have his rent clear, and things are put in it which are usually borne by the landlord. The words "imposition . . . imposed upon or in respect of the premises" covers these expenses: see Thompson v. Lapworth, 16 W. R. 312, L. R. 3 C. P. 149; Hartley v. Hudson, 4 C. P. D. 367, 28 W. R. Dig. 119; Smith v. Robinson, 41 W. R. 588, [1893] 2 Q. B. 53.

Colam, in reply.—The words "imposition whatsoever" must be read ejusdem generis with the preceding words. The covenant is a rates and taxes covenant, and must not be construed so as to make it indirectly a covenant to repair.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—These cases have always presented to my mind a very great difficulty, a difficulty not, I think, so much arising from a question of law as from the fact that these covenants have from time to time been modified in order to put greater or less—and generally greater—liabilities upon the tenant, and it is extremely difficult in these cases to find the governing principle.

We think that we are obliged to reverse the judgment of the learned county court judge; but I say, speaking for myself, that I do consider the case to be one of very considerable difficulty, and in which it may well be that minds may differ as to the view to be taken of the covenant in question. The lease was for sixteen years from 1892. Neither landlord nor tenant undertook any obligation to do anything as to repairs. I agree that if the words of the covenant are clear, the fact that there is no repairing covenant may be regarded as immaterial, but I think in this case, as in all other cases, you are entitled to consider the position of the parties from the point of view of repair when you have words which are, to say the least of it, doubtful or ambiguous.

Now, as far as I can extract a principle from the many cases that have been cited it seems to me to be this, that you have to find in the covenant a contract or undertaking by the tenant to indemnify the landlord against a particular charge which he, the landlord, has been called upon to pay, and that you are to construe the covenant and fix the obligation of the tenant by looking as far as you can at the whole terms of the covenant, and you should also look at the lease to see whether or not the terms import a contract by the tenant to indemnify in respect of the particular expense. It is for that reason that I think that the authorities have divided themselves—not very satisfactorily in my opinion—into two groups—the one a group of authorities in which the covenants, whatever the words, were held to be sufficient to throw upon the tenant the obligation of indemnifying the landlord against the discharge of a duty or obligation; the other a group of authorities where the covenant was so construed that the tenant was held only to have undertaken to indemnify the landlord against specific charges that were made upon the premises or upon him in respect of the premises. By charges I do not mean charges in the sense of obligations, but money charges. I agree and I have already said that the authorities are difficult to distinguish and are not altogether satisfactory. For instance, in Brett v. Rogers, in which the tenant was held liable, the words were "to pay the land tax, sewers rates, and all other taxes, rates, duties, assessments, and impositions." It is true there was in that case a covenant to pay the rent clear from land tax and all other taxes, rates, assessments, and impositions whatever, parochial or otherwise, now rated, charged, or imposed upon the premises." As is pointed out in the very admirable book of Mr. Foa nobody seems to have noticed the curious words "to pay duties," and if we looked at the covenant grammatically it would rather seem that the word "duty" there, if taken to be the object of the verb "to pay," must have been used in the sense of a money payment rather than an obligation. I only state that to show the difficulty there is in endeavouring to use one case as an authority in favour of one view or the other. It has been properly pressed upon me by Mr. Colam that it is a case in which the word "duty" is relied upon, but I think if the covenant is looked at grammatically the fact that it was a duty to pay might have been looked at from the other side.

We have, then, on the one hand cases starting from Tidswell v. Whitworth and—without referring to other intermediate cases—Rawlins v. Briggs, and, finally, Farlow v. Stevenson (which was a case in the Court of Appeal), from which the principle to be evolved is that you must find a covenant by the tenant to indemnify the landlord against either the payment he has to make or the obligation or duty which is cast upon him. On the other hand, in the cases beginning with Thompson v. Lapworth, and passing through Hartley v. Hudson and—again omitting several intermediate cases—Smith v. Robinson—which Mr. Salter has very properly pressed upon us as being near the present case—we find a series of decisions with varying words which are summed up by Wright, J. (a judge of the greatest experience in these matters), in the following words: "Tenants have got off in cases where no such word has occurred as 'charge,' 'duty,' or 'outgoings,' or where there have been no words extending to charges upon the owner, or where there are words indicating an intention that the landlord is to pay; but where the words are sufficient we must hold the governing intention to be that the owner shall get his rent clear of all deductions."

Now I endeavour to apply these different dicta, and this principle which I have with more or less success evolved from the dicta to the particular covenant here. I have already mentioned that there is no covenant to repair upon either side, and no language in the covenant for payment of rent has been pressed upon us, nor does the learned county court judge rely on any other covenant. To take the strongest argument—and I thought it was an extremely ingenious argument, and an argument which requires to be met—in favour of the landlord was the one which was put by Mr. Salter, apart from the authorities—namely, that you are entitled to say it was an imposition charged upon or in respect of the premises. I think the answer to that is that the words "impositions charged upon the premises" do not primâ facie purport to refer to any duty to be performed by the landlord or tenant. I am not relying upon the ejusdem generis argument alone, though I do not know that it ought to be disregarded, because the governing words are "taxes, rates including," and I think that the word "including" did include imposition; but so far as I can, endeavouring to clear my own mind upon this troublesome point, I think there is not in that covenant sufficient language to show that the tenant had undertaken to indemnify the landlord against the neglect by the landlord to fulfil a statutory duty that was put upon him, which was not a rate or a tax or an imposition in the sense of something charged or imposed upon the premises. Of course a very little would have made all the difference. Any word, as Wright, J., pointed out, which would have indicated that the tenant was to indemnify the landlord against a duty which the landlord had to perform or which the landlord had to fulfil would have been enough. I come to the conclusion with very great hesitation, having regard to the learned county court judge, who has taken an opposite view, that these words are not sufficient.

I will only add one word more upon the lease. This was a structural defect—it was not a nuisance caused by the tenant or any act of his—it was a structural defect which by statute the local authority could call upon the owner to remedy. I think where there is no covenant to repair, and where there is no question of shifting or discharging a liability which the tenant has undertaken, you ought, in a lease in which there is no covenant to repair by the tenant, to find clear words in the indemnifying covenant to put upon the tenant an obligation to indemnify the landlord. It is with regret that I have to come to the conclusion that the learned county court judge was wrong, and that judgment ought to be for the defendant.

LAWRANCE, J.—I quite agree.

Special case.

This was a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions on an appeal by the Guardians of the Poor of the West Ham Union against the order of two of the justices in and for the county of London, dated the 15th of May, 1900, whereby it was adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of one Elizabeth Heritage, a lunatic pauper then confined in the Claybury Lunatic Asylum of the London County Council at Woodford, in the county of Essex, was in the parish of West Ham, in the county of Essex, and whereby the Guardians of the Poor of the West Ham Union were ordered to pay the treasurer of the said asylum for the maintenance of the said pauper.

The appeal was heard on the 6th of July, 1900, at the Clerkenwell Quarter Sessions and was allowed.

The facts of the case as stated are as follows:

Elizabeth Heritage was born in Stephenson-street, Canning Town, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, on or about the 11th of February, 1852, and resided at 3 and 5, Widdicombe-terrace, in the said parish, for about seventeen years until the month of August, 1888.

She resided at the aforesaid address in such manner, and under such circumstances during the whole of the said period of seventeen years, and in each of such years as to render her irremovable from the parish in which such residence took place.

By an order of the Local Government Board, dated the 24th of August, 1886, and made under the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, as amended and extended by the Poor Law Act, 1879, it was ordered as follows: "All that part of the said parish of Wanstead which is included in the borough of West Ham shall cease to be part of that parish, and shall be amalgamated with the said parish of West Ham." This order took place on the 28th of March, 1887.

The said address at which the said Elizabeth Heritage so resided as aforesaid was situate in the parish of West Ham as constituted previously to the date of the said order, and not in any part of the parish of Wanstead.

Elizabeth Heritage left the parish of West Ham in the month of August, 1888, and did not thereafter acquire a settlement in any parish.

She was afterwards found in the hamlet of Ratcliff, in the Stepney Union, in the county of London, and was sent therefrom to the said Claybury Lunatic Asylum.

By an order of two of the justices of the peace acting in and for the county of London, dated the 14th of February, 1900, the said pauper lunatic was, under section 290 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), adjudged to be chargeable to the county of London.

On the 15th of May, 1900, the London County Council procured from two of the justices of the peace acting in and for the county of London the aforesaid order of that date, whereby amongst other things the said pauper lunatic was adjudged to be settled in the West Ham Union.

On the above facts the justices at quarter sessions were of opinion that they were bound by the case of Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union, 46 W. R. 309, [1898] 1 Q. B. 594, and that in their opinion the decision in that case applied not only to a district where the parish is divided, but also where a district is destroyed by reason of amalgamation. They therefore allowed the appeal of the Guardians of the Poor of the West Ham Union.

From this decision the London County Council now appealed.

Daldy, for the London County Council.—The question here is as to the settlement of a pauper lunatic. In 1886 a small portion of the parish of Wanstead was added to the parish of West Ham and the justices at the quarter sessions have held that that has had the effect of destroying all pauper settlements in West Ham before 1886. That decision is wrong. The present case is distinguishable from Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union. There it was decided that if a parish were divided and two new parishes made out of it under the Divided Parishes Act all the settlements in the old parish are gone. In the present case no new parish is created, but only a part of one parish added to another whole parish. The Dorking case, which decided that the old law in the case of Reg v. Tipton, 3 Q. B. 215, must still be acted on, therefore does not apply here. In the case of Reg. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum, 9 Q. B. 241, governs the present case. There a pauper gained a settlement in a parish which was afterwards united with another parish, and it was held that the pauper was settled in the united parishes. The meaning of that case is that where you unite parishes a settlement existing in either of the previous parishes which are united is not lost. So here where a part of another parish is added to a whole parish a settlement existing in that whole parish, previous to the addition of the part of the other parish, is not lost.

Counsel also referred to the case of Bristol Guardians v. Guardians of the Barton Regis Union, 66 L. T. Rep. 190, 40 W. R. Dig. 171.

J. C. Earle, for the Union of West Ham.—Where a pauper becomes chargeable, there he must be kept and maintained unless the parish in which he is settled can show a liability somewhere else. The pauper in the present case, it may be, loses no right of settlement in West Ham, but the London County Council cannot remove a pauper to West Ham, because there is no power under which they can do so. The part of Wanstead which is joined on to West Ham has never been under any liability to maintain this pauper. As long as it is impossible for the London County Council to remove a pauper to West Ham without fixing the liability on that part of Wanstead, then they cannot do it at all. In the Tipton case, 3 Q. B. 215, the pauper could not be removed into the old parish, and, a fortiori, here he cannot be so removed, for to do so would be to also remove him into something else. A liability cannot be imposed on part of a parish, by removing a pauper there, which has never been under any liability hitherto with reference to that pauper. The New Sarum case has no bearing upon this case. In that case the whole question turned upon the construction of the terms of a particular Act of Parliament. It is not enough here to say that the parish is still called the parish of West Ham. It is not a question of names, it is a question of substance, and as a matter of fact the parish is no longer the same parish of West Ham because it has been altered by the addition of a part of another parish.

Daldy was not called upon to reply.

DARLING, J.—I think in this case our judgment must be for the London County Council. What happened appears to have been this: By virtue of the Acts of Parliament which have been cited to us, and of the order of the Local Government Board, a part of the parish of Wanstead was added to the parish of West Ham and was, in the words of the order, amalgamated with it. It was not a question of merely joining one to the other, but they were amalgamated in the sense that they became one. The parish of West Ham from that moment exists with its old overseers, the only difference being that the authorities of West Ham have authority over the area of what was their old parish and also over the portion joined to it and amalgamated with it, which was part of Wanstead.

The pauper in question in this case had a birth settlement in West Ham. and it is said that that settlement is lost and gone by reason of the amalgamation with West Ham of a part of Wanstead, and in support of this proposition the case of Reg. v. Tipton is cited. What happened in that case was this, and it is stated exactly by Lindley, M.R., in his judgment in the case of Dorking Union v. St. Saviour's Union, where he says: "As I understand the law, it seems now to be established that a settlement gained by birth is a settlement gained in the parish and not in any particular part of the parish, and if that parish is subdivided, the old parish ceases to exist, and the settlement goes with it. No settlement in the portion made into a new parish can be implied in favour of a person who had acquired a birth settlement in the old parish which had passed away." Now, the Tipton case has been followed with a good deal of reluctance by the judges. I do not myself, in the least, wish to say anything which would suggest that in my opinion it was not properly decided, but I think that this case does not come within Reg. v. Tipton at all. The reason why the pauper in that case lost his birth settlement was because he had been born in a parish which had passed away. In the present case the pauper was born in West Ham, and West Ham, in my opinion, has not passed away. West Ham has been amalgamated with a small portion of another parish, which has been joined on to and amalgamated with it; but West Ham, in my judgment, still remains, and the parish in which the pauper was settled still remains, although the boundaries of it have been enlarged. In the case of Reg. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum the pauper gained a settlement in parish J., and afterwards, by Act of Parliament, that parish was united for all but ecclesiastical purposes with parish B., by the title of the united parishes of J. and B. and it was held that the pauper was settled in the united parishes of J. and B. That would have been an authority, it seems to me, for this—that if all West Ham and all Wanstead parishes had been joined together with the title of the united parishes of West Ham and Wanstead, the paupers of both would have kept their settlements in the united parishes. But what has happened here is that a portion has been taken off Wanstead and amalgamated with West Ham. Has that destroyed West Ham so as to bring it within the Tipton case? I do not think so. It may have destroyed Wanstead, and I do not say that it has not done so, and by reason of the Tipton case the paupers situate in Wanstead may have lost their settlements, but although one may think that that is so, I do not see that that forces us to extend the doctrine, which has been reluctantly accepted by the judges in many cases, and which is laid down in that case, and to say that a parish is destroyed, or has ceased to exist, when you take a part of something else and add that part to it. It is quite enough to say that the Tipton case settled that if you took away something from the parish you destroyed that parish, but it has not yet been settled that adding something to a parish equally destroys it. Then there is the authority of the case of Reg. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum for saying that adding one parish to another parish does not destroy either of them.

It seems to me, therefore, that this case is not brought within the rule which has been laid down in the Tipton case, and unless it comes within that rule the pauper is not deprived of her settlement, and for that reason I think the London County Council succeeds as against the parish of West Ham, where the pauper still remains, in my judgment, settled.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to come to this, that where settlements have been acquired in a parish, and that parish is destroyed, that then the settlements are gone unless the authority which has destroyed the parish has made some provision for the settlements, which, of course, ought to be done. When that is not done it is because it has been overlooked; but there is a provision which I think meets the case under the Divided Parishes Act, and which, as far as I can see, is acted upon now, because the point has been before the courts and is therefore now foreseen. But where the settlements are not in fact provided for by the authority which destroys the parish, there the settlements are gone. In that case the question which one has to consider is, what is a destruction for the purpose of producing that result. Now, it has been decided in the New Sarum case that the adding to one parish the entirety of another parish does not destroy for the purpose of settlements the parish to which the entirety of another parish is added. What we have to say is, whether adding to one parish, not the entirety of another parish, but a portion of another parish, destroys the former parish. Inasmuch as the adding of the entirety would not destroy it, I do not see how it can be said that the adding of a part does so. Upon that ground I am able to decide that in the present case the pauper's settlement is not gone.

Appeal allowed.

Q. B. Div. (Div. Court). (Kennedy and Darling, JJ.) — Dec. 17, 18.

HANSON v. WALLER. (a.)

Master and servant—False imprisonment—Arrest by servant—Liability of master.

The plaintiff, a barman, who was employed by the defendant, the owner of a public-house, was given into custody on the charge of stealing whisky belonging to the defendant by M., who was the manager of the said public-house and the servant of the defendant. M., in giving the plaintiff into custody, acted under a complete misapprehension, and withdrew the charge as soon as they arrived at the police-station.

There was no evidence that any whisky had been stolen, or that it was necessary to give the barman into custody in order to protect the property of his master. The defendant was in the habit of visiting his public-house nearly every day.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for false imprisonment.

Held, that no action lay against the defendant, and that, under the circumstances of the case, there was no evidence that there was any implied authority on the part of the manager to give the plaintiff into custody.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order for a nonsuit by the deputy county court judge, F. B. Fitzroy Cowper, Esq., sitting at Marylebone.

The action was brought for false imprisonment.

The plaintiff was a barman in the employ of the defendant, who was the proprietor of a public-house.

The defendant employed one Moseley as manager, but he was himself in the habit of visiting the house nearly every day.

On the 15th of June, 1900, the plaintiff was at work in the cellar of the house, when the manager entered, accompanied by two policemen, and, having made a remark as to catching the plaintiff thieving, gave him into the custody of the policemen on a charge of running whisky from the cellar into a cart which was standing at the door and was delivering mineral waters.

The plaintiff was taken to the police station.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the way there the manager found that he had made a mistake, and told the constables so.

On arrival at the station he withdrew the charge and the plaintiff was released. No whisky had in fact been stolen, and the manager had acted under a complete misapprehension.

The plaintiff then brought an action for false imprisonment against the defendant, his employer.

The learned deputy-judge nonsuited him on the ground that there was no evidence that the manager in causing him to be arrested was acting within the scope of his authority.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Stuart Sankey, for the appellant.—The manager had an implied authority to act as he did, and it was necessary for him as manager of a public-house to have such authority, and what he did was to protect the interests of his master, and was within the scope of his employment.

Counsel referred to Stedman v. Baker & Co. & Another, 12 Times L. R. 451, and Moore v. Metropolitan Railway, 21 W. R. 145, L. R. 8 Q. B. 36.

Lincoln Reed, for the respondent.—Even assuming that there is an implied authority in the manager of a public-house to give persons into custody, yet here the real motive of the manager was to punish the barman and not to protect his master's property. The nonsuit was right. There is no difference between this case and that of Jones v. Duck (Times, 16th of March, 1900). There is, however, no implied authority for the manager's action, and his master, therefore, cannot be held liable for what the manager did. This is abundantly clear from the cases decided.

Stuart Sankey replied.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case the plaintiff brings an action for false imprisonment against the proprietor of a public-house whose manager gave him into custody on the charge of stealing whisky. It was argued below that there were no circumstances in this case such as would give the manager an implied authority to act as he did. The learned deputy-judge thereupon nonsuited the plaintiff, and I think he acted quite rightly in doing so. I think this is a case the application of the law to which is a matter of some difficulty though the law itself is quite clear in principle. In each case it is a question of the particular circumstances. This is not a case where a person has been appointed to an agency which includes, as in cases relating to railway bye-laws, the duty of arresting, if necessary, nor is it a case of a person within whose ordinary duty it falls to give persons into custody. The question for us to decide, therefore, is whether the circumstances of this case are such that we can say the manager had an implied authority to act as he did. The law is clearly stated in Jones v. Duck, which was a similar case to this one. There A. L. Smith, L.J., said: "The cases showed that a servant had an implied authority to give a person into custody if it was necessary to do so in order to protect his master's property. But that did not apply here, because the master's property was safe before the plaintiff was given into custody. The cases also showed that a servant might have such an implied authority derived from the exigency of the particular occasion."

That statement of law is binding on us. It is, however, not new law.

Then, also, in the case of the Bank of New South Wales v. Owston, 4 App. Cas. 270, 27 W. R. Dig. 156, Sir Montague Smith, in delivering judgment, says at p. 288: "In none of the cases referred to did the question of the authority of a manager or agent entrusted with the general conduct of his master's business arise. They were all cases of particular agencies where the agents had been appointed to a special sphere of duty. The result of the decisions in all these cases is that the authority to arrest offenders was only implied where the duties which the officer was employed to discharge could not be efficiently performed for the benefit of his employer unless he had the power to apprehend offenders promptly on the spot; though it was suggested that possibly a little authority might be implied in the supposed cases of a servant in charge of his master's property arresting a man whom he had reason to believe was attempting to steal or had actually stolen it. In the latter of these cases it is part of the supposition that the property might be got back by the arrest, but in such a case the time, place, and opportunity of consulting the employer before acting would be material circumstances to be considered in determining the question of authority."

That decision was adopted in Abrahams v. Deakin. In that case Lord Esher, M.R., referring to Bank of New South Wales v. Owston, says: "Though we are not bound by that decision, I have no intention of differing from it; on the contrary, I adopt it in every respect."

We next come to the case of Stedman v. Baker, before Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. In that case the Master of the Rolls says: "It might be that if the manager saw a person taking away the property of his master he could take that person into custody or give him into custody for the purpose of protecting the property of his master. The court refused to decide that point in Abrahams v. Deakin, and we refuse to decide it now."

Now in the present case is there any evidence to show that the defendant is liable for the act of the manager? In my opinion there is not. Were there any such circumstances as are mentioned by Sir Montague Smith in his judgment in Bank of New South Wales v. Owston? I think not. This is not a case where the protection of the property could only be effectually carried out by giving the barman into custody. There was no evidence that any whisky had been stolen or that any might be saved by an arrest. There was no evidence that it was within the manager's duty to arrest persons or to decide whether a person should be arrested. There was ample opportunity for the manager to consult his master, who visited the house every day. There were, in my opinion, no circumstances of time or place rendering the arrest necessary.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the learned deputy-judge was right and that this appeal must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly settled law that a servant may in certain circumstances give a man into custody in order to protect his master's property. But that is not the case here. There is no question here of either protecting the master's property or of getting it back. The supposed thief was not running away. Under these circumstances it was not necessary to give him in charge, and unless there can be shown to be some such necessity the master cannot be held responsible for the act of his servant.

Appeal dismissed.

In re Painter, 43 W. R. 144, [1895] 1 Q. B. 85, distinguished.

Appeal from an order of the registrar of the county court at Brighton refusing to rescind a receiving order made upon the debtor's own petition.

The debtor had been three times bankrupt between 1891 and 1897, and had not obtained his discharge in any of the three cases. He had an income of £1,100 a year under his marriage settlement, which went over to his wife upon bankruptcy.

Upon the 1st of September, 1900, he was arrested under an order made in the county court at Brighton for non-payment of a debt of £12 3s. 7d.

Upon the 3rd of September the debtor filed his own petition, and a receiving order having been made thereon he obtained his release from prison.

The official receiver thereupon applied to the registrar to rescind the receiving order on the ground that the debtor was abusing the process of the court.

The registrar delivered a written judgment in which he expressed a very unfavourable opinion of the debtor's conduct, but concluded that he was bound by the case of In re Painter, 43 W. R. 144, [1895] 1 Q. B. 85, to refuse to rescind the receiving order.

The official receiver appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant, read In re Painter, and was stopped by the court.

The debtor appeared in person, but did not oppose the appeal.

WRIGHT, J.—There is no doubt as to the correctness of the law laid down in In re Painter, that where a debtor files his own petition the bankruptcy is not to be stopped merely because he has done it for the purpose of escaping from an order under the Debtors Act. I do not question that decision in any way. Still, there must be a limit, and if in fact the debtor is in the habit of filing petitions and renders the bankruptcy law auxiliary to frauds on his creditors, there must be some means of stopping him. A case like the present, where, as the registrar has found in fact, the debtor obtains credit and then avoids payment by presenting petitions in bankruptcy, must be an abuse of the process of the court. The receiving order must be rescinded.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to have been found as a fact that the debtor has adopted a regular scheme for avoiding payment of his debts or committal to prison for their non-payment. I do not think that he ought to be allowed to reduce committal orders to a nullity. The receiving order in this case was an abuse of the process of the court and must be rescinded.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy — Practice — Costs — Appeal — Security for costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52)—General Rules, 1886, 1890, r. 131.

The deposit of £20 which an intending appellant is required by Bankruptcy rule 131 to lodge in the High Court as security for the cost of his appeal may be applied to satisfy the costs of an unsuccessful application to diminish or dispense with such security, as well as to the costs of the actual appeal.

Appeal from the taxing-master in Bankruptcy.

In November, 1900, Child, the debtor, had given notice of appeal to the Divisional Court sitting in Bankruptcy from an order of a county court. It became therefore necessary for him to comply with the terms of rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules of 1886—1890, which are as follows: "At or before the time of entering an appeal, the party intending to appeal shall lodge in the High Court the sum of twenty pounds to satisfy, in so far as the same may extend, any costs that the appellant may be ordered to pay. Provided that the Court of Appeal may, in any special case, increase or diminish the amount of such security or dispense therewith."

On the 22nd of November Child applied to the court to dispense with the security, but his application was dismissed with costs. On the 26th of November he paid the deposit of twenty pounds and entered his appeal, which was eventually dismissed with costs. When the costs of the appeal were taxed the taxing-master directed that the costs of the application to dispense with security, as well as the costs of the actual appeal, should be paid out of the deposit of twenty pounds.

Child appealed.

H. J. Turrell, for the appellant.—By rule 131 a deposit of twenty pounds has to be lodged in court to satisfy "any costs that the appellant may be ordered to pay." This can only apply to the costs of proceedings after the money has been lodged in court, not to costs incurred before the deposit has been paid. It has been held that this deposit is security only for the costs of the appeal in respect of which it has been paid, not for the general costs of the bankruptcy: In re Scott and Mitchell, 39 W. R. 32, 7 Morr. 178.

Neilson, for the respondent.—The costs of the application to dispense with security form part of the costs of the appeal, and should be paid out of the sum lodged in court: see Kevans v. Joyce, [1897] 1 Ir. 1, per Fitzgibbon, L.J., at p. 5, "Costs of the appeal mean additional expenses first incurred in the litigation which is started by the notice of appeal—extra expense incurred by reason of the appeal being taken."

Turrell replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It is clear from the wording of rule 131 that the deposit is to be paid into court as security for any costs of or in relation to the appeal. The only question, therefore, is whether the costs of the application to dispense with security were costs in relation to this appeal. I am of opinion that they were. The applicant was an intending appellant, and the application certainly was in relation to this appeal. I can see nothing in the wording of the rule to limit the application of the deposit to future costs only. I think, therefore, that the taxing-master's decision must be upheld.

In the Goods of BELHAM.
RICHARDES v. YATES. (a.)

Probate — Practice — Administration bond—Creditor—Right to retain—Not "unduly" preferring.

Quære, whether a creditor, having given an administration bond to administer the estate rateably, is not bound not to prefer his own debt, despite the decision of Romer, J., in Davies v. Parry, 47 W. R. 429, [1899] 1 Ch. 602.

This was a motion on behalf of Roderick Clement Richardes for the variation of an administration bond granted to the defendant Joseph Graham Yates.

The deceased died on the 28th of October, 1898, having left incomplete certain building contracts.

He was at the time of his death indebted to the defendant Joseph Graham Yates.

On the 25th of November, 1898, a grant of letters of administration was issued to Mr. Yates, a bond with two sureties being entered into by him.

The bond provided, inter alia, that the defendant should administer the estate according to law, "rateably and proportionably and according to the priority required by law, and not unduly preferring his own debt."

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Griffith Jones, in support of the motion, relied on In the Goods of Brackenbury, 25 W. R. 698, 2 P. D. 272, and argued that since the judgment of Romer, J., in the case of Davies v. Parry, 47 W. R. 429, [1899] 1 Ch. 602, the construction of the bond had been altered. The court there held that the bond gave the administrator the power of preferring his own debt so long as he did not do it unduly. That the bond still left it open to the administrator to retain his own debt so long as the law allowed him the right of retainer, and so long as he did not in that respect act unduly. In consequence of this judgment the defendant had sought to swamp the estate with his own debt to the detriment of other creditors.

Ingpen, K.C., and Whinney, for the defendant, contended that there was no jurisdiction to revoke the grant, and even if it was revoked the revocation would be ineffectual, as the defendant had a right of retainer which was a vested right in him and could not be thereby divested: In re Rhoades, 47 W. R. 561, [1899] 2 Q. B. 347. Neither ought the court to act in a high-handed way and force a new contract upon the defendant. The fact that the defendant had got a benefit which had not been contemplated when the contract was made was no ground for depriving him of it.: In the Goods of Brackenbury.

The cases of In re Jones, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440; Blackborough v. Davis, 1 Salk. 38; In the Goods of Baddeley, 60 L. T. R. 237, 37 W. R. Dig. 6; and Williams on Executors were also cited.

BARNES, J., in delivering judgment, said that the question raised a matter of some interest and of no little difficulty. The motion was brought by Mr. Richardes, a creditor of the deceased, in order that the bond in question might be varied by striking out the word "unduly," or otherwise varied so that the estate might be administered without the administrator unduly preferring his own debt, or, in the alternative, that the grant should be revoked. The deceased died intestate in October, 1898, and letters of administration were granted on the 25th of November to Mr. Yates as a creditor of the deceased, the widow having renounced. The bond given by the creditors was dated the 23rd of November, 1898, two days prior to the grant. That was all done in the usual way. On the 29th of January, 1899, the applicant took out an originating summons against all other creditors, and it appeared that the total debts of the deceased amounted to £3,350 10s., Mr. Yates's quantum aggregating to £950. The assets of the deceased amounted to £452 7s. 10d., which had been paid into court, though there was now a further sum of £520, so that the total assets amounted to a little more than the whole of the administrator's own debt. If, therefore, he was entitled to retain, practically speaking there would be nothing left for the other creditors. The question therefore raised for the consideration of the court was whether a creditor under such circumstances could successfully retain or was he bound to distribute rateably? The claim that he made in the administration suit he based upon the decision of Romer, J., in the case of Davies v. Parry. A small question of fact had also arisen in the course of the case, and that was as to the time when he first put forward his claim to retain, and his solicitor said that it was when he was before the master in Chambers, between the 21st of October, 1899, and January, 1900. The court felt that the decision of Davies v. Parry was binding upon it, and it had not been argued that that decision was wrong; but the question being indirectly raised the court had felt it incumbent upon it to make careful research to appreciate aright the considerations found therein. If that case were questioned, then this motion would be unnecessary; but could it be successfully made in face of that case?

Now the practice of this court appeared to be that a creditor has no right to a grant of administration except by the practice of the court, and administration is granted to him if there is no one else to take it. In the case of In the goods of Brackenbury the grant was made to a creditor, no bond to pay pro rata being applied for, but if other creditors petitioned in future then the court would compel him to enter into articles to administer rateably. In Fonblanque on Equity, 1820, Book IV., Part II., p. 407, it is said "administration to a creditor generally granted on condition that he claims no preference in respect of the administration." Again, in Toller on Executors, 1822, at p. 105, it is said, "Where on the renunciation of the next-of-kin several creditors apply for administration, though the court may prefer any one of them, yet on the petition of the others it will compel him to enter into articles to pay debts of equal degree in equal proportions without any preference of his own." In Coote and Tristram's Probate Practice, on p. 43, a form is given, and no doubt that form was taken from the old forms in use in the Ecclesiastical Courts; but hitherto those who have searched on behalf of this court have not been able, owing to the lapse of time, to procure an actual bond given by those courts to a creditor. In the 1896 edition of Coote and Tristram's Probate Practice, at p. 718, a form is also given, but it is substantially the same as the one above referred to; but in a note thereto it is said, "This form of bond pro rata is supplemental to the ordinary bond which the creditor administrator gives, but it is now the practice to incorporate in the ordinary administration bond the special clause to pay pro rata." In 1877, in Brackenbury's case, administration with the will annexed was granted to a creditor of the deceased, but no application was at that time made to the court by any other creditor to order the administrator to give a bond conditional to divide the estate rateably amongst all the creditors; but the other creditors of the deceased instituted proceedings in Chancery for the administration of the estate under the direction of the court. The application, however, failed in that case, because the other creditors had failed to take a pro rata bond. In all future cases, however, since then every creditor taking a bond took it pro rata until the case of Davies v. Parry. The decision of that case is that the personal representative may still retain his own debt, notwithstanding the present form of a creditor's administration bond which provides for due course of administration rateably and proportionably and according to the priority required by law and not unduly preferring his own debt or the debts of any other of the creditors of the deceased. Referring to the words "not unduly preferring his own debt," Romer, J., is there reported to have observed that those words were put in on purpose to exclude the right of retainer, and that the bond there in question was settled in its then form in consequence of the decision in In the Goods of Brackenbury. His attention, however, did not appear to have been drawn to the old practice of the court, which inserted the words for the very purpose of preventing a creditor from preferring his own debt. Moreover, in coming to this decision the learned judge who tried the case observed, "I have been so reluctant to allow this claim of retainer, and personally feel it so unjust, that I have had this case re-argued to see if I can find any ground on which I could base a judgment that the right of retainer ought not to be allowed" Now I have read that judgment with very great care, and more than once, but there was no case therein cited where there had been a pro rata bond, and it appears that the judgment pronounced was confined to criticisms of the actual wording of the bond itself. Now it appears to me that the reason for that judgment is that the administrator ought to be allowed to pay such debts as he knew of, because he is in a difficult position; but I fail to appreciate the hardship of the position if he chooses to take the bond on those terms. Moreover, he could protect himself by a Chancery suit to administer the estate under section 29 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, and under the Bankruptcy Acts. The effect of that decision is to render the whole of the pro rata clause nugatory, as the basis of the decision is that there is no necessity to administer rateably and proportionably. If, however, a number of creditors had petitioned it could not be contended that the administrator could prefer any one of those creditors; why, then, should he be allowed to prefer himself? Lyttleton v. Cross, 3 B. & C. 317. Although it is probable that the purport of the subsequent words "unduly preferring" were thus intended in the Ecclesiastical Court, and though I have made research into the matter, it is too remote to ascertain. However, in order that the position of the creditor might be made more clear, the form of the bond has now been altered; and in the Weekly Notes of the 23rd of December, 1899, the President is reported to have said that, although the words "not unduly preferring his own debt" were understood, no doubt, wrongly, to have the effect of preventing an administrator appointed in the ordinary course of law from preferring himself and paying his own debt, even though the estate should be insolvent, Romer, J., in the case of Davies v. Parry, 1 Ch. 602, decided that the effect of that provision in the bond was to enable the administrator to pay his own debt in priority to others, since, although a preference, it was not by law an undue preference. "In future," said the President, "the word 'however' will be substituted for 'unduly,' so that the bond will read, 'not, however, preferring.'" It is with very great diffidence and all possible deference to the decision of Romer, J., that I comment upon it, but at present, being bound by it, I feel it my duty to do so, for if it is not supported in the Court of Appeal this motion is an unnecessary motion. The court is asked to do one of two things, but as it is I think that I can do neither one thing nor the other. I do not think that I can alter the bond, for the court cannot make a new contract with the administrator. Nor can I effectively do what was suggested in In the Goods of Brackenbury. No doubt the court has power to revoke the grant, but I cannot see that the creditor and administrator has acted improperly. There still remains this difficulty also. In Williams on Executors, 503, it is said, "If administration be committed to a creditor and afterwards be repealed at the suit of the next-of-kin, the creditor shall retain against the rightful administrator and his disposal of goods even pending his citation till sentence of repeal is good": Blackborough v. Davis. Further, in In re Rhoades, Lindley, M.R., said, "The older common law authorities go far to show that if an executor was a creditor of his deceased testator and had assets in his hands sufficient to pay his debt (and all others of a higher degree if any), such debt was treated as extinguished." Therefore, even if I revoked the grant of administration, it would not destroy the right of retainer. For these reasons I cannot accede to this motion, but will give the applicant every facility, if he so desires it, to go to the Court of Appeal; and I have sought to so deal with this case that that court may have all the materials before it. Following In the Goods of Brackenbury, the costs must be paid out of the estate.

BARTLETT v. HIGGINS. (a.)

Practice — Costs—Taxation—Party and party costs—Depositions taken on examination before trial not used at trial—Ord. 65, r. 27 (29).

Where, under an order for examination, a witness is examined before trial, but the witness is present at the trial and his depositions are not read, the costs of his examination may be allowed if, having regard to the state of affairs at the date of the examination, they were reasonably and properly incurred.

This was an appeal from the decision of Ridley, J., refusing to review the taxation of a bill of costs by the master.

The action in connection with which the taxation arose was brought in respect of certain money-lending transactions.

(a.) Reported by H. CLAUGHTON SCOTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, who was an officer in the militia, was the only person present at certain interviews with the defendant, and it was admitted that his evidence was essential to his case.

Several months prior to the hearing of the action the plaintiff volunteered for the war in South Africa, and was informed by his commanding officer that he might expect to receive orders to proceed to the front on very short notice, and he consequently obtained three days' leave of absence in which to wind up his affairs.

Under these circumstances his legal advisers, having previously obtained the necessary order for the examination of the plaintiff, had his depositions taken in the usual manner. The plaintiff, however, did not proceed to the front, and was present in person at the trial, but he was not called as a witness, as the defendant, after hearing the opening speech of counsel, consented to judgment against him, with costs, upon certain terms.

When the costs came to be taxed the master disallowed the costs of the examination of the plaintiff, holding himself bound by Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), and by the decision in Ridley v. Sutton, 11 W. R. 314, 32 L. J. Exch. 122, and Ridley, J., reluctantly held himself bound by the same decision.

Bray, K.C. (W. B. Allen with him), for the appellant.—The case of the Duke of Beaufort v. Earl of Ashburnham, 11 W. R. 267, 32 L. J. C. P. 97, is clearly in our favour. That was followed at an interval of a few days by Ridley v. Sutton, which the master and Ridley, J., have considered binding upon them. Each case must be decided on its merits. No hard-and-fast rule has been laid down by these cases. Such costs may be allowed, although the witness examined appears at the trial: Delaroque v. S. S. Oxenholme & Co. (1883), W. N. 227. The question was of vital importance to the plaintiff, as the defendant held his entire property as a security.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (Montague Shearman with him).—As a fact, it was not necessary to have taken the plaintiff's evidence. The examination was merely a luxury: per Malins, V.C., Smith v. Buller, L. R. 19 Eq. 473, at p. 475, 24 W. R. Dig. 187. In Delaroque v. S. S. Oxenholme & Co., a new allegation had been inserted in the defence, and this necessitated the calling of the witness. In both the Duke of Beaufort v Earl Ashburnham and Ridley v. Sutton the court followed the decision of the master. Moreover, the master exercised his discretion under Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), and the court will not disturb his decision.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am very loath to treat this case as a question of discretion, but I think the master has not used his untrammelled discretion in the matter, as he thought himself bound by the decision in Ridley v. Sutton. I do not think that is really a decision in point. That case was decided in 1863 under 1 Will. 4, c. 22. The Court of Exchequer came to the conclusion, under that Act, that the costs could not be claimed unless the evidence so taken was used at the trial. At the same time the Court of Common Pleas in the Duke of Beaufort v. Earl Ashburnham thought they had a discretion in the matter. Now, under the Judicature Acts, by Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), quite a different rule is laid down. "As to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or defending the rights of the party, or which appear to the taxing officer to have been incurred through over-caution, negligence, or mistake, or merely at the desire of the party." Whether the course adopted was "necessary or proper" must be gauged not by the event which ultimately happened, but by the state of facts existing at the time when the legal advisers had to make up their minds in the matter. The test is, was the advice given due to over-caution or to negligence; was it reasonable or necessary? The case is on all fours with Delaroque v. S. S. Oxenholme & Co. The introduction of a new plea in that case is immaterial. In Smith v. Buller Malins, V.C., was dealing with what was a mere luxury. The evidence in this case was vital; and the plaintiff's advisers would have been negligent had they not so taken his evidence.

STIRLING, L.J.—My only difficulty throughout this case has been whether we ought to overrule the decision of the taxing-master. In my judgment it is not correct to say that costs ought not to be allowed merely because in the event they prove to be unnecessary. The question is, were they properly incurred viewing the matter at the time when the examination took place? In my opinion they were eminently proper at that time.

Appeal allowed.

DUXBURY AND OTHERS v. BARLOW AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Action founded on contract—Separate causes of action against two defendants—Sum not exceeding £50 recovered against one—Ord. 65, r. 12.

The plaintiffs, who were trustees of a friendly society, brought an action in the High Court against two defendants claiming, as against the first defendant, the treasurer of the society, a sum of £90 as money had and received by him for the society, and as against both defendants the sum of £50 upon a joint and several bond for that amount in favour of the society for the due performance by the first defendant of his duties as treasurer. At the trial the plaintiffs recovered judgment against the first defendant for £90, and against the two defendants on the bond for £50.

Held, that, under ord. 65, r. 12, the plaintiffs were not entitled, as against the second defendant, to costs on the High Court scale.

Appeal from an order of Grantham, J., at chambers.

The plaintiffs were the trustees of a friendly society, of which the defendant Barlow was the treasurer. The defendant Barlow and the defendant Richardson, as his surety, had executed a joint and several bond in favour of the plaintiffs in the sum of £50 for the performance by Barlow of his duties as treasurer. Barlow having received the sum of £90 9*s.*, the moneys of the society, for which he had not accounted, the plaintiffs brought an action in the Queen's Bench Division against both defendants to recover £50 on the bond, and against the defendant Barlow to recover £90 9*s.* as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use.

At the trial the judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs for £50 as against both defendants on the bond, and for £90 9*s.* against the defendant Barlow, with costs against Barlow and such costs against Richardson as the plaintiffs were entitled to. The learned judge refused to make a special order giving the plaintiffs costs as against Richardson on the High Court scale, and the master refused to tax the costs as against him on the High Court scale.

On appeal, Grantham, J., directed him to do so.

Richardson appealed.

J. Brooke Little, for the defendant Richardson.—The causes of action against the defendants were separate and distinct. Upon the cause of action against Richardson the plaintiffs only recovered £50, and therefore as against him they are not entitled to High Court costs by reason of ord. 65, r. 12: Millington v. Harwood, 40 W. R. 481, [1892] 2 Q. B. 166. The case is covered by Solomon v. Mulliner, ante, p. 364, [1901] 1 Q. B. 76, though that case was decided on section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

W. Ellis Hill, for the plaintiffs.—Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not apply. Unless the case comes within ord. 65, r. 12, the plaintiffs are entitled to High Court costs. There was only one judgment in the action against both defendants. The plaintiffs have recovered by that judgment a sum exceeding £50, as they have recovered by the judgment £90 9s.; ord. 65, r. 12, therefore does not apply. Solomon v. Mulliner is not in point, as the only judgment was against Mulliner for £2.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In my opinion the order of the learned judge is wrong. The plaintiffs brought an action against Barlow and Richardson to recover £50 on the bond. Richardson was liable in that action for £50 at the most. In that action the plaintiffs also put forward a claim for £90 9s. against Barlow for money had and received. Those were two separate and distinct causes of action. At the trial the plaintiffs recovered judgment against both defendants—that is to say, against Barlow and Richardson on the bond for £50, and against Barlow for £90 9s. The learned judge at the trial refused to make an order giving the plaintiffs High Court costs against Richardson, leaving them to recover any costs which the law allowed. The question, therefore, which we have to decide is whether the plaintiffs are entitled as against Richardson to High Court costs. In my opinion they are not. By ord. 65, r. 12, "in actions founded on contract, in which the plaintiff recovers, by judgment or otherwise, a sum (exclusive of costs) not exceeding £50, he shall be entitled to no more costs than he would have been entitled to had he brought his action in a county court, unless the court or a judge otherwise orders." In my opinion that means that the plaintiff is to be entitled to no more costs as against the defendant, against whom he recovers judgment for a sum not exceeding £50, than he would have been entitled to had he brought the action in the county court. The plaintiffs only recovered £50 as against Richardson, and therefore they are not entitled to High Court costs as against him.

TAYLOR v. LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING CO.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING CO. v. NIXON. (a.)

Mortgage—Priorities—Trust—Fraud of trustee—Legal estate—Tabula in naufragio—Relation back.

The rule that an equitable mortgagee without notice may gain priority by getting in the legal estate, even though in the interval he has received notice of a prior incumbrance, does not apply where there is an express trust for the incumbrancer whose equity it is sought to displace.

As between purely equitable titles, that one will have priority which has the better right to call for the legal estate.

Conduct which will postpone an incumbrancer considered.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

The facts, which are more fully set forth in the judgment, were as follows:

Prior to the year 1897 Frederick Talbot Tasker, of the firm of Talbot & Tasker, solicitors, was a customer of the plaintiffs at their Holborn branch, and as such became largely indebted to them.

The plaintiffs required him to give them some security, and, accordingly, on the 14th of August, 1897, he deposited with the plaintiffs four indentures of mortgage relating to house property in the county of Middlesex, and on the same day, by a deed of charge, he charged in favour of the plaintiffs all his interest in the property comprised in the deposited indentures as a security for the payment on demand of all moneys owing from him to the plaintiffs.

By this document Tasker undertook on request to execute a legal mortgage to the bank, or such person or persons as they might appoint. And he declared that during the continuance of the security he would hold all his present and future estate thereby charged "in trust for you as such mortgagees as aforesaid, and will convey the same as you shall direct." And he authorized the bank during the continuance of the security by deed to remove him or any other person from being a trustee in respect of the trust thereinbefore declared, and to appoint themselves, or any persons or person, to be trustees or a trustee in respect of the said trust, and thereupon to make a declaration vesting all his said estate in such new trustees or trustee. And Tasker thereby irrevocably appointed the then head manager, the chief accountant, and the country manager of the bank, and every two and one of them, or the persons for the time being holding those respective offices, and every two and one of them jointly and severally, his attorneys and attorney for him, and on his behalf and as his act and deed, to make, execute, and deliver every or any such further mortgage or mortgages as aforesaid.

By an indenture dated the 5th of April, 1898, and expressed to be made between F. T Tasker of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part (executed on behalf of F. T. Tasker by officials of the bank as his attorneys), the several principal sums owing on the security of the mortgages were assigned and conveyed by F. T. Tasker, as beneficial owner, to the plaintiffs, and the hereditaments and premises comprised were granted and conveyed to the plaintiffs as a security for the payment of all moneys secured by the deed of charge of the 14th of August, 1897.

The five mortgages deposited with the plaintiffs were held by F. T. Tasker as trustee of a marriage settlement, called the Tasker settlement, and formed part of the funds thereby settled.

From 1890 to 1895 he was sole trustee, but on the 25th of February in the latter year the defendant Samuel Nixon was appointed his co-trustee.

In March, 1898, F. T. Tasker absconded, and was afterwards adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 10th of February, 1900, Richard F. K. Guswell was appointed a trustee of the settlement in the place of F. T. Tasker, and the trust estate was duly vested in the defendants.

When the document of the 14th of August was executed the bank had no notice that Tasker was a trustee of the property, but they had received notice of the trust before they executed on his behalf the mortgage of the 5th of April, 1898.

Both parties in this action claimed priority over the charge or security of the other in the matter of the mortgages.

Farwell, J., held that the defendants were entitled to priority over the bank.

The bank appealed.

Warmington, K.C., Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Edward Chitty, for the bank.

Badcock, K.C., and Edward Ford, for Nixon.

Levett, K.C., and G. Cave, for Taylor.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—STIRLING, L.J., read a written judgment, with which RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., agreed. He said: These are three appeals which raise questions of priority between three sets of claimants (viz., the trustees of two marriage settlements and the London and County Bank) to four mortgages for sums amounting to £1,400, which were originally made in favour of one Frederick Talbot Tasker, a solicitor, who has absconded after dealing with the mortgages in such a way as to give rise to the present contest. The facts as now established differ in one important respect from those on which the case was dealt with in the court below, and are as follows: On the 14th of February, 1882, Tasker advanced out of his own moneys to one R. Ward the sum of £1,400 on the security of four indentures of mortgage by which four leasehold houses were assured by way of subdemise to Tasker as security for £350 and interest. In December, 1889, Tasker and C. W. Chubb were trustees of a settlement dated the 12th of April, 1850, made on the marriage of R. T. Brockman. In that capacity Tasker received on behalf of himself and his co-trustee a sum of £1,000 which had been invested on a mortgage given by King and Brown, who had paid it off. Tasker appears to have applied to his own use £700 part of this sum. In respect of it he paid to the beneficiaries under the Brockman settlement the half-yearly sum of £17 10s. by way of interest. In Tasker's books of account, under the heading of "Trustees of R. T. Brockman's Income Account," the interest on the £1,000 lent to King and Brown was entered half-yearly down to February, 1889: "By half-year's interest £1,000 King and Brown." Opposite the last entry of this kind is a pencil memorandum "now £700 Ward." Subsequently to 1889 the half-yearly payments of interest are entered in most cases "By half-year's interest on £700 Ward," though in the year 1891 the entries are "By half-year's interest on £700." Some of the earlier entries are open to suspicion as alterations have been made in them; but those made in 1893 and following years do not fall within this observation. Farwell, J., has held that, although Tasker executed no formal declaration of trust, and still less any legal assignment of the mortgages or any of them, nevertheless these entries establish that previously to 1895 Tasker had appropriated £700, part of the mortgage debt of £1,400 due to himself from Ward to answer the £700 which he had taken from the Brockman settlement funds. It does not appear that this appropriation was ever communicated by Tasker to his co-trustee. Further, there is no evidence that the appropriation was communicated to any of the beneficiaries previously to 1896, but in that year it certainly became known to one of them, Mr. Brockman, a solicitor, who acted on behalf of the others. All these beneficiaries were in 1889 sui juris, and entitled to absolute interests in possession in the trust funds. Mr. Brockman made no inquiries on the subject of this £700 mortgage, and the explanation he gave was that he did not suspect anything wrong. It is to be inferred that Mr. Brockman did nothing to relieve either trustee from any responsibility he had incurred. At this point arises a question of fact. Was an appropriation actually made by Tasker or did it rest only in intention? Speaking for myself, I am unable to differ from the conclusion of Farwell, J. I place no reliance either on the pencil memorandum or on the earlier entries to which I have referred, but I think the entries in 1893 and 1894 show that an actual appropriation was made, and that the case is brought within the decisions in Middleton v Pollock, 2 Ch. D. 104, 24 W. R. Dig. 88, and New, Prance, & Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting, 45 W. R. 577, [1897] 2 Q. B. 19, affirmed in the House of Lords under the name of Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419, which establish that such a transaction may be good though not communicated by a trustee to his beneficiaries. At the same period—viz., December, 1889—Tasker and J. K. Blake were trustees of another settlement, dated the 18th of April, 1873, made on the marriage of William Tasker. Blake died on the 18th of July, 1890, and thenceforth until February, 1895, Tasker was sole trustee of the settlement. In that month Mr. Nixon was applied to to become co-trustee with Tasker of the Tasker settlement. Thereupon Nixon inquired what the funds subject to the trusts were, and Tasker furnished him with a list in which he included as one of the investments "£1,400 lent to Mr. Ward on mortgage of houses in Park-terrace. Kensal-road." Nixon subsequently went to Tasker's office to see the securities for this sum, and had produced to him the four leases and mortgages, and he required that these should be transferred into the joint names of Tasker and himself. It has been proved before this court by the evidence of a clerk of Tasker's that transfers were prepared accordingly and were executed by Tasker. These transfers have been searched for and cannot be found, but completed drafts of them have been produced, and it must be taken that the mortgages were legally transferred and became vested in Tasker and Nixon as joint tenants. The appointment of Nixon as trustee of the Tasker settlement bears date the 25th of February, 1895, but appears to have been executed later. The transfers were executed in June, 1895. All this took place before the appropriations in favour of the Brockman settlement was communicated to the beneficiaries

The leases and mortgages remained in the possession of Tasker, who in August, 1897, deposited them with the London and County Bank by way of security; he also executed an instrument under seal on a printed form which on the face of it appears to be one used by the bank where security is given by a single member of a firm for the debt of the firm, but so as also to cover the private account of the partner giving the security. [His lordship then read the clauses of the instrument.] On the 26th of March, 1898, Tasker was adjudicated bankrupt. By an indenture of the 5th of April, 1898, the attorneys appointed by the deed of the 14th of August, 1897, in the name and on behalf of Tasker purported to convey the leaseholds as a security to the bank for all moneys secured by the deed of the 14th of August, 1897. When the last-mentioned deed was executed the bank had no notice of the title either of the Brockman trustees or of the Tasker trustees; but before the 5th of April, 1898, the bank had acquired notice of that of the Tasker trustees, but not of that of the Brockman trustees. In August, 1898, the plaintiff Taylor was appointed trustee of the Brockman settlement in the place of Tasker and along with C. W. Chubb. In February, 1899, the plaintiff W. L. Chubb was appointed a new trustee of the Brockman settlement in the place of C. W. Chubb.

On the 6th of February, 1899, Taylor and Chubb, as such trustees, commenced an action against the bank, Nixon, and Tasker claiming to have the mortgages transferred to them as security for £700 and interest. At the trial Nixon failed to prove the execution of the transfers of the mortgages to Tasker and himself, and by the judgment it was declared that the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge in respect of the sum of £700 and interest on the sum of £1,400 secured by the four mortgages, and that the sum of £700 had priority over the claim of the Tasker trustees, but was subject to the charge in favour of the bank. On the 25th of April, 1900, the bank commenced an action against the trustees of the Tasker settlement, and claimed priority to the charge of the defendants, who counterclaimed priority over the bank. At the trial the defendants succeeded in proving the execution of the transfer, and by the judgment the bank's action was dismissed, and it was declared that the defendants had priority over the plaintiffs. Upon the hearing of the appeals further evidence was, by leave of the court, adduced as to the execution of the transfers, with the result already stated.

Although a mortgage debt is a chose in action, yet where the subject of the security is land the mortgagee is treated as having an interest in land, and priorities are governed by the rules applicable to interests in land and not by the rules which apply to interests in personalty. The reason is stated by Sir William Grant in Jones v. Gibbons, 9 Ves. 407, at p. 410; see also Wilmot v. Pike, 5 Hare, 14. Leaseholds are real estate for the purposes of this rule: Wiltshire v. Rabbits, 14 Sim. 76; Union Bank of London v. Kent, 37 W. R. 364, 39 Ch. D. 238. In dealing, therefore, with these appeals, the first point to be determined appears to be the state of the legal title. It must now be taken that previously to the 14th of August, 1897, this was vested in Tasker and Nixon as joint tenants. On that day Tasker executed the instrument already stated, and it becomes necessary to ascertain the legal effect of it. As has been pointed out it is in a form adapted for use in a particular class of cases. It is intended to be employed with the view of creating a security on property in which the estate and interest of the person giving the security may differ widely in different cases. This accounts for the generality of the language found in the operative part. In construing that language great weight must be attributed to the title disclosed by the scheduled deeds which form the basis of the whole instrument. In the present case those deeds showed a good legal title in Tasker, and in my judgment Tasker intended to declare himself a trustee of that legal estate, and to authorize the officers of the bank as his attorneys to execute a proper mortgage of it to the bank. The case of Fausset v. Carpenter, 2 Dow. & Cl. 232, might appear at first sight to be an authority for a different conclusion, but regard being had to the criticisms to which that case was subjected by Lord St. Leonards in Drew v. Norbury, 3 Jo. & Lat. 267, at p. 284, and by Lord Hatherley in Carter v. Carter, 3 K & J. 617, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 48. it must be taken to have been decided on its own peculiar circumstances, which differ widely from those now under consideration. In Drew v. Norbury Lord St. Leonards states the general rule applicable in such cases. In my judgment the deed of the 5th of April, 1898, operated in execution of the authority conferred on the officers of the bank by the deed of the 14th of August, 1897, and is effectual to the same extent as if it had been executed by Tasker himself, and consequently the joint tenancy subsisting between Tasker and Nixon was thereby severed, and an undivided moiety of each of the legal terms created by the mortgages became vested in the bank, the other moiety remaining vested in Nixon.

It is next to be considered to what extent the bank and Nixon can avail themselves of the legal titles which have thus become vested in them. A legal mortgagee who makes an advance without notice of a prior equitable title is a purchaser for value without notice. From such a purchaser a court of equity takes away nothing which he has honestly acquired: Pilcher v. Rawlins, 20 W. R. 281, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 259; Heath v. Crealock, 23 W. R. 95, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 22, at p. 33. Further, an equitable mortgagee who has made an advance without notice of a prior equitable title may gain priority by getting in the legal title, unless there are circumstances which make it inequitable for him so to do. One case which falls within this exception is where the mortgagee has notice that the legal title at the time when it is so got in is held on an express trust in favour of persons who assert a claim to the property: Saunders v. Dehew, 2 Vern. 271; Allen v. Knight, 5 Hare, 272, 11 Jur. 527; Sharples v. Adams, 11 W. R. 450, 32 Beav. 213; Taylor v. Russell, 41 W. R. 43, [1892] A. C. 244, at p. 259. Now in the present case the legal title was not got in by the bank by the instrument of the 14th of August, 1897. No doubt Tasker thereby declared himself a trustee of the mortgages for the bank, but the legal title such as it then existed remained undisturbed, and Tasker had previously made himself along with Nixon an express trustee of the mortgages for the beneficiaries under the Tasker settlement to the full extent of £1,400; and of this and Nixon's claim the bank had notice before the 5th of April, 1898. In my judgment it was inequitable in the bank to get in the legal title against Nixon or the Tasker beneficiaries; and against neither ought the bank to be allowed to gain priority by virtue of it.

It was contended that the deed of the 5th of April, 1898, related back to the 14th of August, 1897, and the cases of Cooke v. Wilton, 9 W. R. 220, 29 Beav. 100, and London and County Bank v. Goddard, 45 W. R. 310, [1897] 1 Ch. 642, were cited; but in neither had the equitable mortgagee notice of any express trust affecting the legal title at the time when it was got in. Further, these cases do not support the proposition for which they were cited, and in the absence of authority the contention appears to be wholly without foundation.

As regards Nixon the cases of Thorndike v. Hunt, 7 W. R. 246, 3 De G. & J. 563, and Taylor v. Blakelock, 34 W. R. 175, 32 Ch. D. 560, establish that he must be treated as a purchaser for value on the ground that by accepting the transfers he gave up a right of action which he had against Tasker for the £1,400. It is not alleged that Nixon had himself any actual knowledge or notice of the appropriation made in 1889 by Tasker in favour of the beneficiaries under the Brockman settlement, but it is contended that he had constructive notice thereof either personally or through Tasker, who, it is said, acted as solicitor in the preparation of the transfers. In this respect the case is governed by the Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 3. That section has been to some extent judicially construed in Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25, where Lindley, L.J., says, "Ought here does not impose a duty or obligation; for a purchaser need make no inquiry. The expression 'ought reasonably' must mean as a matter of prudence having regard to what is usually done by men of business under similar circumstances" Now, applying the Act to the present case as regards sub-section 1 by means of what possible inquiries or inspections on the part of Nixon would the prior appropriation have come to his knowledge? All that could be suggested by counsel in argument was an inquiry whether the mortgages were subject to any incumbrances; but it is now settled that a vendor is not bound to answer such a general inquiry: In re Ford & Hill, 27 W. R. 371, 10 Ch. D. 365. As regards sub-section 2 though the appropriation was perfectly well known to Tasker still it did not come to his knowledge as Nixon's solicitor, nor in the same transaction with respect to which the question of notice arises. Again, if Nixon had employed an independent solicitor what inquiries or inspections ought reasonably to have been made which would have brought the appropriation to his knowledge? It is said that an independent solicitor ought to have called for an abstract of Tasker's title, and that such an abstract would have disclosed the appropriation. But I fail to see why in the case of a title so simple an abstract should be called for, or if called for it would have disclosed the appropriation.

In support of the contention that Nixon had notice of the appropriation were cited two cases: Freeman v. Laing, 48 W. R. 9, [1899] 2 Ch. 355; Boursot v. Savage, 14 W. R. 565, L. R. 2 Eq. 134. But the former was decided on the law relating to tacking, and the latter was decided before the Conveyancing Act, 1882, which has introduced very considerable modifications. In my opinion Nixon became purchaser for value without notice. It was not contended that he has been guilty of anything which would deprive him of priority, nor, having regard to Northern Counties Insurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482, could such a contention succeed.

The result therefore is that as regards the undivided moiety legally vested in Nixon he and his beneficiaries under the Tasker settlement are entitled to priority over both the bank and the beneficiaries under the Brockman settlement, while as regards the undivided moiety legally vested in the bank the latter gains no priority as against Nixon and his cestuis que trust.

I next proceed to consider the order of priority between the purely equitable titles. This is governed by order of time, unless there has been some act or omission by the owner of the prior equitable title such as to cause his title to be postponed. The rules which govern the postponement of a prior legal estate to a subsequent estate were laid down in Northern Counties Insurance Co. v. Whipp, already referred to. In Taylor v. Russell, 39 W. R. 81, [1891] 1 Ch. 8, Kay, J., carefully considered the law with respect to the postponement of a prior to a subsequent equitable interest and came to the conclusion that the same rules as those laid down in Northern Counties Insurance Co. v. Whipp applied to the case before him. On appeal his lordship's decision was reversed on another ground, and the House of Lords, 41 W. R. 43, [1892] A. C. 244, affirmed the Court of Appeal on the same ground, but Lord Macnaghten took occasion to remark that he was not satisfied of the correctness of the view taken by Kay, J. I am not aware that the precise point considered by Kay, J., has since arisen for decision and I do not think it necessary to decide it in the present case. The ground of postponement relied on in this case is that the prior equitable claimants allowed Tasker to remain in possession of the deeds, including the mortgages to himself. There are undoubtedly cases (Waldron v. Sloper, 1 Drew. 193; Farrand v. Yorkshire Banking Co., 37 W. R. 318, 40 Ch. D. 182), where an equitable mortgagee who has allowed his mortgagor to retain or regain possession of the title deeds has been postponed to a subsequent equitable incumbrancer who has obtained possession of the deeds. But where the relationship between the equitable incumbrancer and the person in possession of the deeds is not merely that of mortgagee and mortgagor but is of a fiduciary nature, such as cestuis que trust and trustee or client and solicitor, there is a great body of authority to show that the equitable incumbrancer is not to be deprived of his priority by reason of the improper acts of the person intrusted with the deeds, so long at all events as the incumbrancer had no grounds to suppose that there was any want of good faith on the part of the custodian of the deeds. The leading authorities on this point are Cory v. Eyre, 1 De G. J. & S. 149; Shropshire Union Railway Co. v. Reg., 24 W. R. 709, L. R. 7 H. L. 496; In re Vernon Ewens & Co., 35 W. R. 225, 33 Ch. D. 402. The same principle was applied in Carritt v. Real and Personal Advance Co., 37 W. R. 677, 42 Ch. D. 263, and I think it must also be applied here.

So far as the title of Nixon or the beneficiaries under the Tasker settlement is equitable only, he and they were entitled to rely on Tasker for the performance of his duty as trustee. In my judgment the bank is not entitled to say that the Tasker trustees have lost priority in respect of their equitable title. The same principle applies as between the Tasker trustees and the Brockman trustees so far as the title of the former is equitable only. It was contended on behalf of the Brockman trustees that as between them and the Tasker trustees they are prior in point of time, and although they may not be entitled to priority as between themselves and the bank, they ought to the extent of their charge to be allowed to stand in the place of the Tasker trustees in accordance with the rule applied to the priority of judgment creditors in Benham v. Keane, 10 W. R. 67, 3 De G. F. & J. 318, and treated in In re Wyatt, White v. Ellis, 40 W. R. 177, [1892] 1 Ch. 188, at p. 208, as applicable between incumbrancers. Now a purchaser for value without notice is entitled to the benefit of a legal title not merely where he has actually got it in, but where he has a better right to call for it: Wilkes v. Bodington, 2 Vern. 599. It has accordingly been held that if a purchaser for value takes an equitable title only, or omits to get in an outstanding legal estate, and a subsequent purchaser for value without notice procures at the time of his purchase the person in whom the legal title is vested to declare himself a trustee for him, or even to join as party in a conveyance of the equitable interest, although he may not formally convey or declare a trust of the legal estate, still the subsequent purchaser gains priority: Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves. 246, at p. 270; Stanhope v. Verney, 2 Eden 81; Wilmot v. Pike, Rooper v. Harrison, 2 K. & J. 86, at p. 106, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 86. Here Nixon on being appointed a trustee of the Tasker settlement insisted that the mortgages for £1,400 should be legally transferred to himself and Tasker as trustees of that settlement. Tasker was not merely a formal but an actual conveying party to the instruments by which this was done. By accepting the transfers Nixon gave up a right of action which he had against Tasker and became a purchaser for value without notice of any prior incumbrance. There was no suspicion attaching to Tasker at this time, and it would have been a breach of trust to vest the legal title to these securities in any persons other than Tasker and Nixon, the duly constituted trustees of the Tasker settlement. Everything, therefore, was done that could be done to deal with the legal title in such a way that the securities should be vested in the proper persons, and be held on behalf of the Tasker beneficiaries. The position of the Brockman trustees and beneficiaries is very different. They got no declaration of trust from Tasker nor any assignment of the legal title. None of them gave up any right whatever against Tasker or gave other valuable consideration for what Tasker did. The securities were never legally vested in the Brockman trustees as such, and the appropriation made was the voluntary act of Tasker and of Tasker alone. In my judgment the Tasker trustees have acquired a better right than the Brockman trustees to call for the legal title which prior to the 5th of April, 1898, was vested in Tasker. The result is that the Tasker trustees are entitled to the mortgages in priority to the other claimants.

Appeal dismissed.

WARD v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Fixtures—Tenant for life and remainderman—Tapestry.

Trade fixtures and articles affixed to the freehold for purposes of ornamentation are exceptions to the rule, "Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit," equally in the case of a landlord and tenant and in the case of a tenant for life and remainderman.

Where tapestry had been affixed by a tenant for life to the walls of a mansion-house it was held that the affixing was only for the better enjoyment of the tapestry, and not for the purpose of increasing the value of the freehold. Consequently, the legal personal representatives of the tenant for life were entitled to the tapestry as against the remainderman.

D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382, and Norton v. Dashwood, 44 W. R. 680, [1896] 2 Ch. 497, commented on.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

The question in dispute was as to the ownership of certain valuable tapestries which, at the time of the death of the late Madame de Falbe, were in the mansion-house at Luton Hoo, of which she had been tenant for life.

The tapestries in question consisted of ten pieces, three in the hall and seven in the large drawing-room of the mansion-house.

The three pieces in the hall were hung in a manner similar to that adopted for hanging heavy pictures and pier glasses, and could be removed without injury to the wall. The seven pieces in the drawing-room were fixed as follows: Small strips of wood were fixed in the wood on the walls by means of nails and screws, and over these wooden strips canvas was stretched and nailed, and the tapestries were fastened to these strips and over the canvas by very small tacks which did not penetrate the strips.

After the tapestries were put up, white and gold mouldings made for the purpose were fixed round the strips of wood by thin wire nails and screws some of which were long enough to penetrate, and did in fact penetrate the face of the wall.

The tapestries formed an essential feature of the general decoration of the room; and though the ceiling and frieze remained as before, the rest of the walls of the room were altered and decorated so as to suit the tapestries.

On the death of Madame de Falbe these tapestries were claimed on the one hand by those now interested in the mansion-house as part of the settled estates, and as representing the freehold interest, and on the other hand by the executors and residuary legatees of Madame de Falbe.

Byrne, J., came to the conclusion that the three pieces of tapestry in the hall were not attached to the wall or fabric of the house in such a way as to constitute permanent additions to the mansion-house, and that those three pieces were therefore chattels belonging to the estate of Madame de Falbe. As to the seven pieces in the drawing-room, his lordship held that, from their position, importance, and the essential part they played in the decoration of the room, they had been in effect annexed to the mansion-house, and passed with it to the persons interested in the settled estates.

The residuary legatees and legal personal representatives of Madame de Falbe appealed as to the tapestries in the drawing-room. There was no appeal as to the tapestries in the hall.

Norton, K.C., and Wilkinson, for the residuary legatees.

Howard, for the legal personal representatives of Madame de Falbe.

Levett, K.C., and Methold, for the remainderman.

Norton, K.C., replied.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L R. 3 Eq. 382; Norton v. Dashwood, 44 W. R. 680, [1896] 2 Ch. 497; Hill v. Bullock, 45 W. R. 587, [1897] 2 Ch. 55; Lawton v. Lawton, 3 Atk. 13; Beck v. Rebow, 1 P. RIGBY, L.J.—The question arises in the present case between a tenant for life of an estate, including a mansion-house, and the remainderman. The tenant for life being dead, her claim is represented by her executors, but it is not in any sense a case between heir and executor as that is understood in the authorities. It is a question between the representatives of the tenant for life, who must be taken to be in the same position as the tenant for life herself would have been, and the remainderman. With reference to the question of fixtures, we all know that there was a time when everything fixed to the freehold was held to go with the freehold, and it was only by slow degrees that that unbending rule was modified. For instance, in Herlakenden's case, 4 Co. 62, hangings and wainscot, although fastened in such a way that they might be removed, nevertheless went with the freehold, but in modern times there have come to be important exceptions to that rule; one being in favour of a person who has put up what are now called trade fixtures—that means removable fixed things for the purposes of trade, entitling him to remove them, and that exception is not confined in any way to a case of landlord and tenant, meaning thereby the owner of the immediate reversion and a tenant for years only. That exception extends equally, as is shown by Dudley (Lord) v. Warde (Lord), to the case of a tenant for life and the person who comes into possession of the estate upon his death. There is another equally important and equally well-established exception from the rule in the case of articles which are fixed to the freehold, not with the object of enhancing the value of the freehold, but for the purposes of ornamentation. Objects so fixed are removable, and counsel for the respondent is obliged to allow that, in the case, for instance, of chimney glasses, it would not be only as between landlord and tenant for years that the exception would apply, but as between a tenant for life and a person in remainder or reversion who takes the estate subject to the life tenancy. Now, if that exception as to articles affixed for the purpose of enjoyment or ornamentation is to apply in one case—that is to say, in the case of a chimney glass, I cannot see why the same exception is not to be of general application, and I shall assume that it is.

Then the question comes to this, whether these tapestries which are now in question were so affixed as to become part of the house, or so affixed as to remain removable at the will and pleasure of the person who affixed them, or failing her doing so during her lifetime, by her executors after her death? Now a great deal of time has been spent on the point as to how these tapestries were affixed to the freehold. It is said they are as firmly fixed as they could be. I pass that by. They were quite as firmly affixed, I dare say, as they would be by a person who intended them to remain there always, but I do not think that is of much importance. The courts in such cases fortunately are not given to inquiries whether screws which fix an object to a wall are one inch or two inches or three inches long, or whether there were half-a-dozen or a dozen of them, or whether they penetrated into the mortar of the wall or did not. In all cases of this kind it appears that the object, whatever it is that is affixed for the purposes of ornamentation, is affixed, but then comes the exception which says it may be removed. Now, numerous cases have been cited, and amongst others D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, which is a decision of Lord Romilly, and Norton v. Dashwood, which is a decision of Chitty, J. As to the first case I have no hesitation in saying that I have great difficulty in accepting it, owing in part to what I consider the very inconclusive reasoning which is used by the learned judge in support of his decision, because he talks about paper and panelling and other matters of that kind as if they really concluded the case. Paper, he says, is part of the wall, and so, of course, it is. Then he says it cannot be taken away. That I question altogether. If there be a paper which a tenant for life does not like, I conceive that the right of the tenant for life is to take away that paper and substitute another, and if it is not worn out a tenant for life is under no obligation to wait until the first paper is worn out, but if it becomes distasteful or displeasing, or if another paper pleases the tenant for life better, he may scrape away the earlier paper and put on another one which he likes better. With regard to the panelling I am by no means satisfied that the law has changed since Lord Hardwicke laid it down in Lawton v. Lawton that whatever originally might have been the rule about wainscot fixed with screws, in the year 1743, the time when he was speaking, it had become recognized as removable. I might go on through other instances which were cited by Lord Romilly, especially, for example, one of them about a grindstone—that is, the upper loose stone. He considered that applicable—I do not consider it applicable at all. I consider that the finding as to tapestries in that case cannot be maintained or supported unless there was some proof (which I do not see in the report of the case) that the house was fitted to the tapestry rather than the tapestry to the house, and in that way, although I do not say it would even then be clear, it might be possible to support the decision by saying that the tenant who affixed the tapestry had shown a plain intention to add it irrevocably and permanently to the house. At any rate I am of opinion that the decision in D'Eyncourt v. Gregory is not right if it is applicable to the case now before us, and for the purpose of the present case and as far as may be necessary for that purpose I should hold that that case ought to be overruled. Then there is the case of Norton v. Dashwood. That case is also in its circumstances very different from the present. There tapestries which had for 100 years belonged to and formed part of the decoration of the mansion-house were held under very special circumstances to be attached to the house and not removable. I may say that I am not quite satisfied that those circumstances were sufficient to authorize the finding, but they are, at any rate, very different from the circumstances in the present case. Here we have a tenant for life purchasing a number of tapestries. I think there were seven which are called French tapestries and three which are called Flemish tapestries. The three Flemish tapestries, it is suggested, were of a kind fit to be put into frames without stretching, but the seven French tapestries, according to the evidence of people who understand these things, require to be stretched, and they were chosen to be put up in the drawing-room. [His lordship described what was done, saying that the result was very much in the nature of a picture frame round about each piece of the tapestry, and that he could see nothing to indicate anything else than the natural intention of the owner of beautiful objects to set them up for the purpose of the ornamentation of the room, and continued:] It is said that the tapestries formed part of the wall. I agree in a sense they were part of the wall. They were rigidly affixed to the wall, and no doubt affixed in such a way as in earlier days would have been held to make them inseparable parts of the wall, but the question is whether they were not made fixtures, meaning objects fixed to the wall, which might be removed at the will of the person who fixed them, and I am of opinion they were of the last-mentioned character. I can see no other reason in any one of the things done than the wish of the tenant for life to get beautiful and valuable objects placed in such a position as might please the eye and satisfy her desire for ornament. I see no reason why she should not have the right to take them down. The argument for the remainderman amounts to this: that the moment she had once placed them there she—as well as every one claiming through her — would be absolutely bound to leave them there, and, if the argument is sound, might have been restrained by an injunction from taking down the tapestries on the ground that they were part of the wall and the building. I altogether dissent from any such suggestion. The tenant for life happened to retain them there during her life. It is quite conceivable that she might have fallen in with better specimens of tapestry, and if she had done so I think she would have been entitled at once to remove those which she had already placed there for the purpose of replacing them by others, or she might if she had been tempted by an enhanced offer have agreed to sell them, and taken them down for the purpose of sale. I do not think the fact that she would first have had to take down the mouldings, and then to undo the fastening by tacks and nails, makes any difference at all. I think she had a perfect right to take them down at any time, and I think that right passed on to her executors. As a matter of fact she made a bequest of these tapestries, and the legatee has appeared here to argue on his own behalf. The executor has also appeared. The executor must be taken to have been supporting the legatee, and I think the pair of them are right. There were one or two other cases cited by counsel for the appellant which I have not taken the time or the trouble to go into because it is not necessary to do so. The case falls within the broad principle that decorative objects—that is, objects set up for the purpose of ornamentation—fall within the exception to the rule that things fixed to the freehold must belong to the owner of the freehold. On that broad ground I wish to decide the case.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. The question in this case is a question with respect to the right to remove certain tapestries which have been affixed to the freehold. I do not mean to say, and no one would say, that, as a matter of history, all the cases upon the subject of removability of fixtures are absolutely consistent. They are not. But there is this amount of consistency in the cases: that, starting from the absolute rigid rule quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, there has been a consistent progress towards relaxation of that rule, and it is impossible, according to my view, to show that there has been ever any substantial period of relaxation. Now, having said that, I wish to add that this is a case in effect between the executors of the tenant for life and the remainderman. I want to state one fact which is really the basis of my judgment. The matter in respect of which this question has arisen is certain tapestries, certain chattels. I have not the very faintest doubt myself upon this evidence that these tapestries or these chattels were affixed to this freehold for the purpose of the enjoyment of these chattels, and in no sense and in no way for the improvement of the freehold. I do not suppose that it would be denied that when one has to deal with the question of fixtures sometimes it becomes a material question to consider the object and purpose of the annexation. That does not mean to consider the motive of the person annexing, but to consider the object and purpose of the annexation to be inferred from the circumstances of the case. That being so, let us see how it is that that question comes to be material. It will not be denied, and has not been denied, in argument that amongst the exceptions from the rigid rule quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit there come two broad exceptions—one, the exception in respect of trade fixtures, the other, the exception in respect of ornamental objects which have been annexed in some way or another to a freehold. Counsel for the respondents in his argument suggested that the latter exceptions did not apply excepting in the case of landlord and tenant. Now here again is one of the instances of the progression of the law, but without considering the relaxation in favour of trade fixtures, about which I have not got to say anything because no such question arises here, with regard to this question of ornamental fixtures it seems to me that the authorities are substantially all one way. We find cases as early as Squier v. Mayer, which was a case between the executors and the heir, where the exception in respect of ornamental fixtures was applied as against the heir. On the contrary, the heir is always supposed to be the most favoured. I do not consider it necessary to go through the various cases in which that exception has been applied since that time. All I do say is that if the cases are looked at during the whole of the period since Squier v. Mayer it will be found from time to time that this exception or relaxation in respect of ornamental fixtures has been recognized, and also the authorities seem to me to make it clear that it has been recognized in cases other than cases as between landlord and tenant. That being so, it is impossible to say that the only matter to be taken into consideration is the quantum of fixture—how much and in what manner the chattel has been affixed to the freehold. No one, of course, would say that that is not a material fact to be taken into consideration. There may be such an incorporation of the chattel with the freehold that it might be absolutely impossible to deny that the chattel has become part of the freehold and absolutely impossible to apply these exceptions. Therefore the quantum of fixture is important, but that is not the only fact that has to be taken into consideration; one has to ask oneself, Is there any more fixing here than was necessary for the enjoyment of the chattel? If you have a heavy object like a heavy ormolu clock and you fix it to the wall of some room, of course you may have to use, in order to make the thing safe, very substantial fittings. You may have to drive an iron bar right through the wall of the house, and to rivet it at the back. You may have to apply a sort of fixing that in many cases would be conclusive of incorporation of the chattel in the freehold; but that inference does not arise the moment you come to the conclusion that that fixing which was done was a fixing which was absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of the chattel. That seems to me the right conclusion in this case. The tenant for life has tapestries—expensive tapestries—which she has bought and wishes to enjoy, and the mode of enjoying them necessarily is by hanging them on the walls of the house, and she wishes to hang them in such a way that they shall not be torn. To drive nails through the tapestry into the wall would spoil the tapestry and make indelible marks all round the edges of the tapestry. That is avoided by putting laths or thin pieces of wood against the wall and then affixing the tapestry to those thin pieces of wood by small nails which do not tear the tapestry, whereas the use of nails to affix the tapestry to the wall would involve the use of much bigger nails which would tear the tapestry. In my judgment it is perfectly obvious that everything which was done can be accounted for as being absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of the tapestry, and when I come to that conclusion that is an end of the case so far as my judgment is concerned, notwithstanding the remaining objections that counsel urged, whether the objection went to denying the exception in favour of ornamental tapestries or to denying its application as between tenant for life and remainderman. I think when one has fairly arrived at the conclusion that there was only such a fixing as was necessary for the enjoyment of the chattels one is bound to decide the case in favour of the executor of the tenant for life.

I want to say one word about D'Eyncourt v. Gregory and Norton v. Dashwood. Speaking for myself I do not find that either Lord Romilly or Chitty, J., say one word inconsistent with the principle which I have sought to apply in arriving at this judgment. Lord Romilly expressly says in arriving at his conclusion that it is an inference which he draws from the particular facts of that case, and he says, "Unquestionably in coming to these conclusions I have not done so with any degree of confidence, or even of complete satisfaction to myself." (He is there speaking of questions of fact.) "The evidence, minute and clear as it is, cannot give the same effect that a personal examination might do, but even on a personal examination I should doubt whether I could come to a more accurate conclusion. The best conclusion I can come to with regard to the articles I have enumerated is that they seem to me to belong to the freehold and to be inseparable from it." That is to say, Lord Romilly concluded from all the facts of that case that the intention to be inferred from the fact was that the tapestries were affixed as they were to the wall for the purpose of the improvement of the freehold, and not for the purpose of the enjoyment of the chattels. It seems to me that Norton v. Dashwood is capable of precisely the same explanation.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in substance arises between the tenant for life, Madame De Falbe, and the remainderman under her former husband's will. Madame De Falbe, being tenant for life under that will, became possessed of certain tapestries worth, it is stated, several thousands of pounds, and she proceeded to affix them to the walls of the drawing-room of a house of which she was tenant for life. She has died, and the tapestries remaining so fixed, the question has arisen between her representatives, who it is admitted stand in the same position as herself, and the person who was entitled in remainder under the husband's will. The question is whether those tapestries still form part of the estate of Madame De Falbe or whether they pass to the remainderman as annexed to the freehold. Undoubtedly the old rule of common law was that whatever became affixed to the freehold passed to the owner of the freehold, but modifications have been introduced from time to time into that rule. The first point which deserves consideration is, what is the ground on which that old simple rule has been modified? Now, I find in a case which I have before me a statement on that subject in the judgment given by Martin, B., in the Court of Exchequer, which expresses so exactly what I desire to say that I prefer to read his judgment rather than use any words of my own. I refer to the case of Elliott v. Bishop, 10 Exch. 496, at p. 522. [His lordship read the judgment from "The old rule laid down in the old book is," to "of course saleable at the will of the person who has annexed them."] It will be observed there that the learned judge says the rule has been relaxed in favour of tenants both for life and for terms of years, and that the objects to which the rule relates are those which have been affixed to the freeholds for the more convenient or luxurious occupation of them or for the purposes of trade. It is not disputed that as between landlord and tenant chattels annexed to the freehold for purposes of trade have long been included within this exception to the rule. It cannot be disputed that in recent years, whatever may have been the case in former times, objects which have been affixed by way of ornament to the freehold as between landlord and tenant fall within the same category. That point is considered in this very case of Elliott v. Bishop, and forms the subject of an elaborate judgment by Coleridge, J., in an appeal in that case reported in 11 Exch., at p. 113. There the court came to the clear conclusion, citing a judgment which has been already referred to of Dallas, L.C.J., in Buckland v. Butterfield, 2 Bro. & Bing. 54, in these terms: "In the progress of time this rule has been relaxed" —that is, the old rule quic quid plantatur solo, solo cedit—"and many exceptions have been grafted on it. One has been in favour of matters of ornament, as ornamental chimney-pieces, pier-glasses, hangings, wainscot fixed by screws only, and the like." So that it is clearly established that as between landlord and tenant ornamental objects are included in the exceptions. Now is there any reason why, if the ornamental objects are included in the exceptions as between landlord and tenant, they should not be included in the exceptions as between tenant for life and remainderman? If we look at the origin of the rule as stated in the passage which I have just read it seems to me there can be no reason for such a distinction. The origin of the rule is stated to be to prevent the injustice of denying the tenant the right to remove them at his pleasure and so practically forfeiting expensive property to the owner of the freehold. If that be a good ground as between landlord and tenant I fail to see why it is not a good ground as between tenant for life and remainderman. So far as authority goes we find the matter in this position: Lord Hardwicke in the year 1751 dealing with a case of trade fixtures—namely, Dudley v. Warde, said, "The case being between executors of a tenant for life and a remainderman is not quite so strong as between landlord and tenant, yet the same reason governs it." Therefore as regard trade fixtures he treats the rule as being the same in the case of landlord and tenant and as between tenant for life and remainderman. It seems to me that in a case of earlier date—namely, Laughton v. Laughton, decided in 1743, which was also a case of trade fixtures, Lord Hardwicke refers to the case of ornamental fixtures and treats them as really being governed by the same rule. He points out that in the old cases, and as long ago as Henry VII.'s time, the court construed furnaces to be part of the freehold, but he goes on, "Since that time the general ground the courts have gone upon of relaxing this strict construction of law is that it is for the benefit of the public to encourage tenants for life to do what is advantageous to the estate during their term. What would have been held to be waste in Henry VII.'s time, as removing wainscot fixed only by screws and marble chimney-pieces, is now allowed to be done." That I read as referring to ornamental objects and as showing that Lord Hardwicke's opinion was that ornamental fixtures stood in the same position as trade fixtures both as regards the position between landlord and tenant and tenant for life and remainderman. It appears to me, therefore, that both on principle and authority the exceptions from the rule extend as well to ornamental fixtures as to trade fixtures. Now what are the objects as to which the dispute arises here. Tapestries which we can see from the photographs before us are plainly of an ornamental character, and therefore it appears to me that the rule applies in this case. That goes a long way, if not the whole way, to decide the case, but I do not desire to rest it entirely on that. A case which is less favourable to the right to remove is the case between heir and executor, or between vendor and vendee, or between mortgagor and mortgagee. In those cases no question of injustice arises. There is no injustice and no forfeiture of any property when an owner in fee affixes his own chattels to the freehold. Therefore there is no necessity for introducing any relaxation into that rule at all. But even in such cases the question arises as between heir and executor as to whether or no things which are originally chattels have or have not become part of the freehold. And as is pointed out in Holland v. Hodgson, the question as to what constitutes an annexation sufficient to make the property part of the land is one which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances as indicating the intention—namely, the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation. As regards the degree of annexation, that in some cases is material, as is pointed out by the learned judge in that case, who gives various examples in which the degree of annexation may be material. As regards the object, the main question which has to be considered is whether the object of the annexation is to improve the freehold to which the annexation is made, or whether it is for the more complete and better enjoyment of the chattel itself. Here, as I have said, the chattels to be enjoyed are certain pieces of tapestry. They must, to be enjoyed, be made available for being seen by the eye, and in order that they may be properly seen they must be put in a large room, being large pieces of tapestry. Madame De Falbe put them into the best room in the house—namely, the drawing-room. She affixed them no doubt to the walls of the room, but she did it in such a way that the tapestries might be removed without any structural damage, by which I mean not that there may not be some injury done to the plaster and so forth, but that nothing is required to be altered in the structure of the house. Nor was anything in the structure of the house really altered when they were put up, but there were certain additions made in the shape of panels and canvas stretched upon them, painted or dyed a suitable colour for the enjoyment of the tapestries so that the accompaniments might not be an eyesore to the beholder. Looking at the evidence as to the mode in which they were affixed and the position in which they were placed, and what was done in reference to putting them up, I feel no doubt that everything that was done here was done for the better enjoyment of the chattels, and not to make an addition to the extent of many thousands of pounds to the value of this mansion-house. I come, therefore, to the same conclusion at which my learned brothers have arrived, and I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

BELMORE, COUNTESS OF v. KENT COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway—Land alongside road—Evidence of user—Presumption.

An uninclosed strip of land, of varying breadth, adjoined a highway for the space of 300 yards. The road authorities had made no use of it, but the owner of the adjoining land had, as far as living memory went, exercised acts of ownership over it.

Held, that there was no presumption of dedication of the strip to the public; and even if there had been any such presumption, it was rebutted by the surrounding circumstances and by the evidence.

The question in this action was whether the public had any, and if so what, rights over an uninclosed strip of land adjacent to the metalled road leading from Sevenoaks to Offord.

The road was not laid out under any Inclosure Act.

It seemed to be an ancient highway which was kept in repair under a turnpike trust from the middle of the 18th century until a few years ago, when the trust expired.

It was now a main road under the control and management of the Kent County Council.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants had begun to deposit rubbish and lay a drain along the strip, for the purpose of rendering it suitable for public use. The strip lay on the west side of the road. It was about 300 yards long, and about 50 feet wide at the broadest part, tapering off to nothing at each end. The strip was not part of the waste of the manor. The land adjoining the strip on the west was a farm, of which the plaintiff, the Countess of Belmore, was tenant for life in possession, the co-plaintiff Kipping being her tenant. The farmhouse and farm buildings stood a short distance to the west of the strip. Pawley, who occupied the farm from 1865 to 1870, constructed a cartway with a drain alongside from the high road across the strip, and a similar cartway had since been made by Kipping. The swamp had by this means been partly drained, and the tenants had cut willows and rough grass thereon. There was no evidence that any vehicle ever went along the strip, but occasionally foot-passengers walked on its margin along the high road.

Eve, K.C., and Wace, for the plaintiffs.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Church, for defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, J., found on the evidence that as far as living memory went the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title had used and enjoyed the strip in such a manner, and to such an extent, as the nature of the strip permitted, and had exercised acts of ownership inconsistent with public rights. He would not regard the action of the highway authorities in occasionally placing a heap of stones or road scrapings on the west side of the high road instead of on the east side, where they were usually placed, as of any real importance. Even if the occupier did not protest, the proper inference would be that it was permissive. Upon the whole the evidence was insufficient for the purpose of proving dedication of the strip as a highway by user. The defendants, however, asserted that there was a presumption of dedication to the public quite up to the ancient fence, and that there was no justification for limiting the dedication to that portion of the high road which was metalled, even though highway rights had not been exercised beyond the metalled roadway.

The learned judge continued: On this point I have derived assistance from the judgments of Channell, J., and of the Court of Appeal in Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council, 81 L. T. Rep. 405, 48 W. R. Dig. 67. Lord Russell of Killowen says at p. 409: "It seems to me very difficult to give assent to such a general proposition as this, that under all conditions where you find a metalled road bordered by unmetalled margins, and beyond the margins by hedges, there is an invariable presumption that all the space between the hedges is highway. The question whether such a space is all highway would depend to a great extent, I think, on many other circumstances. Such, for instance, as the nature of the district through which the road passes, the width of the margins, the regularity of the line of the hedges, and the levels of the land adjoining the road. These are all circumstances which should be taken into account before any presumption of law can arise as to the width of the highway. It seems to me that it is not safe to say, as a general proposition, without knowing the condition of each particular case, that in such a case as I have mentioned all the space between the hedges is part of the highway. It is often impossible to discover the exact circumstances under which a fence has been erected upon any particular spot. The fence may have been put there because there was already a sort of natural boundary, or it may be in some cases that the person who made the inclosure wished to leave a margin of ground for the use of the public if at any time the road should become founderous. But even in the latter case I doubt whether it would be right to say that a margin left by the landowner outside a fence for that purpose is necessarily dedicated by him as a highway for all time."

Now, applying the principles laid down by the late Lord Chief Justice, I think there is no presumption of dedication up to the old fence, or that, if there is any such presumption, it is rebutted by the surrounding circumstances and by the evidence. The only difficulty I have felt is as to the margin. But upon reflection I do not see my way to hold that it is part of the highway unless every highway passing through an uninclosed country must, as a matter of law, be deemed to include a certain space on each side of the metalled road.

I am satisfied that the margin has been used only occasionally and by a few persons, and only to such an extent and in such a manner as was inevitable by reason of the absence of any fence or other obstacle. Such user is too indefinite to form the foundation of a public right, or to establish a dedication as part of the highway. I may add that even if the public have rights over the margin, but not beyond, the acts of the defendant council cannot be justified. I must therefore make a declaration and grant an injunction in terms of paragraphs 1 and 3 of the claim, and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

Market — Statutory remedy — Construction of Act of Parliament—Jurisdiction of the High Court—Injunction.

Where there is a liability existing at common law which is re-enacted by statute with a special form of remedy, unless the statute contains words necessarily excluding the common law remedy, the plaintiff has his election of proceeding either under the statute or at common law.

Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawkesford, 7 W. R. 464, followed.

Where a remedy in Chancery is wider than the old common law remedy, the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to grant an injunction, unless the statute deprives it of such jurisdiction.

The enactment of special penalties or remedies by a statute does not exclude the jurisdiction of the High Court unless it is so expressly provided.

Summons.

These were actions for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling within the parish of Sidmouth any articles, commodities, or things usually sold in public markets, except in accordance with the provisions of the following Acts—one of 1839 entitled "An Act for maintaining and regulating the market in the parish of Sidmouth, in the county of Devon" (2 & 3 Vict. c. lxxxi.), and a subsequent Act of 1846 (9 Vict. c. xlviii.).

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case came before the court on a point of law to determine whether the High Court had jurisdiction.

The Act of 1839, section 6, provided: "If any person holding, using, or in any manner occupying any of such buildings, sheds . . . or stations as aforesaid, or selling, or offering, or exposing to sale any butchers' meat or any other goods . . . or things in the said market place, or within the said parish of Sidmouth, shall, upon demand thereof made by the agent . . . or other person so authorized to receive the said several tolls . . . neglect or refuse to pay, or shall evade the payment of the same . . . or any part thereof, then . . . it shall be lawful for the agent, collector, or other person authorized to receive the same . . . to levy the same by distress and sale of all or any of the goods, articles, and things so offered or exposed to sale, and the distress so taken to sell by auction or private contract immediately on such distress being made . . . or otherwise to summon the party so neglecting . . . or evading such payment before some justice of the peace for the county of Devon, who is hereby authorized and directed to hear and determine such case in a summary way, and to order and enforce such payment, with the costs of such proceedings, as he shall think fit. . . ."

Section 10: "In case any dispute shall arise concerning such distress or sale for recovery of tolls, as authorized by this Act, such dispute shall be settled and determined by any justice of the peace having jurisdiction within the limits of this Act, who shall by warrant . . . summon the parties to appear before him and hear and determine the matter of every such complaint upon oath and make such order therein and award such costs to either party as to him shall appear reasonable, and by warrant . . . cause the money to be awarded and the costs of such warrant to be levied by distress and sale of the goods of the party liable. . . ."

Section 28: "If any person shall find himself aggrieved by any rule . . . made under the provisions of this Act or by any determination or judgment made in pursuance thereof or of this Act . . . it shall be lawful for such person to appeal to any general or quarter sessions of the peace to be held in and for the county of Devon, . . . which court is hereby authorized to hear and finally determine the matter of the said appeal."

Section 31: "Nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prejudice, hinder, abridge, make void, destroy, lessen, or defeat any right, interest, title, property, power . . . or authority of the lord of the manor of Sidmouth . . .; but that every lord . . . shall and may at all times hereafter enjoy all such rights and privileges (except as aforesaid) in as full . . . a manner, in all respects whatsoever, as he could have done in case this Act had not been made . . ."

The Act of 1846, s. 2, provided: "If any person shall hawk, sell . . . or carry for sale any butcher's meat . . . or other article of provision in any place whatsoever within the parish of Sidmouth, except at the said market-house, before twelve o'clock at noon, nor after that hour without having first so personally attended at the said market-house . . . and there paid the said tolls and duties, every such person shall on conviction before any justice of the peace for the said county of Devon, for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding five pounds . . ."

Percy Wheeler (Macmorran, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff, relied on the following cases in support of the jurisdiction: Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 32 W. R. 341, 25 Ch. D. 511; Attorney-General v. Aspinall, 2 My. & Cr. 613; Earl of Shaftesbury v.

Russell, 1 B. & C. 666; Corporation of Birmingham v. Foster, 70 L. T. Rep. 371; Reg. v. Buchanan, 8 Q. B. 883; and Cooper v. Whittingham, 28 W. R. 720, 15 Ch. D. 501.

R. B. Phillpotts, for the defendant in the action, in support of his plea to the jurisdiction, cited the following cases: Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawkesford, 7 W. R. 464, 28 L. J. C. P. 242; Barraclough v. Brown, [1897] A. C. 615, 46 W. R. Dig. 64; North London Railway Co. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B D. 30; Hayward v. East London Waterworks Co., 28 Ch. D. 138, 38 W. R. Dig. 240; Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners v. Straker, 38 W. R. 158, 42 Ch. D. 83.

FARWELL, J.—A preliminary point of law has been taken, which raises a question as to the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiff sued in respect of market rights, which were set forth in the two Acts of Parliament that have been frequently referred to in the arguments. It appears from the preamble of the Act of 1839 that an ancient market, with tolls attached to it, had existed at Sidmouth; and in my opinion what that Act really did was to provide for the substitution of a new market for the old market, and of new tolls which included, but did not extinguish, the old tolls, the maximum tolls allowed by the schedule to the Act covering the previous tolls, which were thus kept alive. Section 31, which was a saving clause, is also important in this connection. The Act of 1839 is therefore really an Act by way of confirmation of an old market, with specific regulations for the benefit of the owner and the convenience of the individuals using it. It has been argued that the present case fell within the third class of cases mentioned by Willes, J., in Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawkesford. The three classes were as follows: "There are three classes of cases in which a liability may be established by statute. There is that class where there is a liability existing at common law, and which is only re-enacted by the statute with a special form of remedy; there, unless the statute contains words necessarily excluding the common law remedy, the plaintiff has his election of proceeding either under the statute or at common law. Then there is a second class, which consists of those cases in which a statute has created a liability, but has given no special remedy for it; there the party may adopt an action of debt, or other remedy at common law, to enforce it. The third class is where the statute creates a liability not existing at common law, and gives also a particular remedy for enforcing it." In my opinion the present case falls, not within the the third class, but within the first class of cases mentioned by Willes, J. The statute had not created a liability not existing at common law, but had simply re-enacted the old common law rights—the new tolls included the old tolls, and the remedies were extended to the whole of them. The plaintiff, therefore, could have brought an action at common law. Moreover, even if that had not been so, in my opinion the remedy in Chancery was wider than the old common law remedy, and I do not think that the Court of Chancery could be held to have no jurisdiction to grant an injunction in such a case, unless the statute expressly deprived it of such jurisdiction.

Then it was argued that, unless an action at law would lie, the court could not grant an injunction. I cannot accept that contention in face of what Turner, L.J., has said in Emperor of Austria v. Day, 9 W. R. 712, 3 De G. F. & J. 217, at p. 253. If it was held that the statute, either by a new creation or by a restatement of former rights, enacted a right of property, that at once gave rise to the jurisdiction of the court, and no special penalties or remedies provided by the statute excluded the jurisdiction of the court, unless it was expressly so stated. Had no penalties been provided in the present statute there would still have been a right of property, which could have been protected. This view of the case was entirely borne out by Sir G. Jessel's judgment in Cooper v. Whittingham. It had been contended that Chitty, J., had held in Hayward v. East London Waterworks Co., that Sir G. Jessel had gone too far in his application of the law, but in my opinion that was not the case, and Sir G. Jessel's judgment is sound law.

The result is that the plea to the jurisdiction is unfounded, and the summons must be dismissed.

In re GREENWOOD.
SUTCLIFFE v. GLEDHILL. (a.)

Will—Forfeiture—Trustee—Garnishee order.

A testatrix devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate to trustees for sale and conversion, and then upon trust to pay the annual income to her son during his life or "until he does or attempts to do or suffer any other act or thing, or until any other event happens whereby, if the same income were payable to him absolutely for his life, he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof," in any of which cases it was given over.

A creditor obtained an order garnishing the income accrued due and in the hands of the trustees.

Held, that a garnishee order could not be obtained unless a debt was actually due from the trustee to the beneficiary, and that the garnishee order did not create a forfeiture.

Sampson v. Sampson, 44 W. R. 557, [1896] 1 Ch. 630, followed.

Bates v. Bates, [1884] W. N. 129, not followed.

This was an originating summons to determine whether a forfeiture or cesser had taken place of the life interest of John Arthur Greenwood under the will of Mary Greenwood, dated the 4th of November, 1891, and under settlements dated the 30th of March, 1893, and the 20th of February, 1896.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In this case I have come to the conclusion that the order absolute does not operate as a forfeiture. John Arthur Greenwood is entitled under a trust in the will which—is, I am told, in terms similar to the settlements, which have also been put in evidence on this application—which is in these words: "Upon trust if my said son shall not at the time of my death be an undischarged bankrupt, or shall not have executed, done, or suffered any act, deed, or thing, or if no event shall have happened whereby the trust next hereinafter declared would if subsisting be determined, then to pay the said income to my said son John Arthur Greenwood during his life or until he attempts to alien, charge, or anticipate the same or any part thereof, or is adjudged a bankrupt or takes proceedings for liquidation in bankruptcy or makes any arrangement or composition with his creditors having the effect of a charge upon or alienation of the said income or any part thereof, or until he does or attempts to do or suffer any other act or thing, or until any other event happens whereby if the same were payable to him absolutely for his life he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof," in any of which cases, as well as on the death of the said John Arthur Greenwood, it is given over.

Now what has happened is this: A creditor has obtained an order nisi first of all, and then absolute, garnishing the income accrued due and then actually in the hands of the trustees. That that is the case is plain from the decisions on the rules about garnishing. You can only garnish the debt after it has become due. For that I will take the words of Lindley, L.J., in the case of Webb v. Stenton, reported in 11 Q. B. D. 518, 31 W. R. Dig. 8: "Is a trustee a debtor to his cestui que trust? You cannot say he is unless he has got in his hands money which it is his duty to hand over to the cestui que trust; then, of course, he is a debtor, and there is no difficulty in attaching such a debt under this order. But take the case of a trustee of Consols for my life. Is he in any proper sense my debtor so long as he has no dividends which are payable to me? Clearly not; he individually may never receive those dividends; there may be a change of trustees before the next dividend day. You cannot possibly say that a trustee is a debtor to the cestui que trust before he has, or but for some fault of his might have had, the money which it is his duty to hand over." The garnishee order therefore proceeds on the footing that the trustee is not only a trustee, but has also been turned by the operation of the true construction of the will and the rules of law and equity into a debtor as well. It is by virtue, not of a continuing trusteeship, but by virtue of the new relation of debtor and creditor, that the garnishee order can be made at all; and that being so, it seems to me that there is this dilemma with regard to the applicant's position, that either the garnishee order is ineffectual because there is no debt at all, and therefore it is a mere nullity; or, if it is effectual, it has operated because there is a debt, and a debt arising as between the trustee and the tenant for life, which shows that the income has actually become payable in such a way as to make a debt In my opinion that is the true view of this will. I bear in mind, first of all, that the courts do not construe gifts of forfeiture so as to extend their limits beyond the fair meaning of the words unless they are actually driven to it. Forfeiture is not regarded with favour, and one does not apply one's mind to a case with any particular desire to extend the terms of a forfeiture clause to a gift such as the present. In my opinion, on the true view of these words, which are the only words which are really material to the present case—"or until any other event happens whereby if the same income were payable to him absolutely for his life he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof"—they mean if he were deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof on the day it becomes due. That seems to me not only a fair and reasonable construction of the words of this particular will, but, also, to be in accordance with what, I think, are really the necessary requirements of the law to make it a valid gift. I think the late Sir John Rolt's argument in the case of Re Stulz, 1 W. R. 499, 4 De G. M. & G. 404, was well founded, and that you cannot give a man the income during his life payable on the quarter days on which it becomes due, or the half-yearly days on which it becomes due, and then take it away from him by reason of any event that happens after the day when it has actually become due. So to do would be repugnant to the absolute gift. Mr. Upjohn tried to avoid that by saying there is no absolute gift here. I do not agree with that. The first gift is to pay the income to John during his life. Then, according to the construction I put on this clause, all the other matters are limited—I mean that the defeasance portion of the clause is limited to the period until each particular quarterly payment or half-yearly payment becomes actually payable. When once it becomes payable there is a trust to pay, and the day after the creditor's dividend has become payable a trustee is turned into a debtor as well as a trustee, and is bound to pay, under the trusts of this will, to John Arthur Greenwood. That being so it is not competent to the testator to attempt to deprive John Arthur Greenwood, after the period at which he is so entitled to give a receipt, of the income by reason of any matter subsequent to the day on which he was entitled to give a discharge for it. That seems to me to be the true view to take of the construction of this will. To some extent I am confirmed in the view I take by the case of Sutton v. Goodrich, 80 L. T. Rep. 765, 47 W. R. Dig. 208, and still more by reason of the decision of Stirling, J., in the case of In re Sampson, Sampson v. Sampson. 44 W. R. 557, [1896] 1 Ch. 630, where the learned judge puts the proposition which I have been trying to adapt to this will in a way that seems to me to be applicable not only to the will before Stirling, J., but also to the will now before me. His lordship says: "I think that the epoch at which the destination of any instalment of income is to be determined is the moment when that instalment either accrues due or is in the hands of the trustees ready for application in accordance with the trusts of the will." Any other construction would, as it appears to me, lead to results which would be startling, assuming that it was legal. For example, the cestui que trust might go to his trustee the day after the income was received, receive his money, and then go round and pay his bills, but if he were ill in bed he could not send a request to the trustee to be good enough to go round and pay his bills for him, and write at the same time to his creditors, and say: "I am ill, do not trouble me, my trustee is coming round to pay you with the income which is already mine." That would be a conclusion I should be very reluctant to arrive at unless I was actually driven to it; but on the cases which have been cited I think I am not driven to it.

Now, the matter that has really caused me the most trouble has been the decision of Pearson, J., in the case of Bates v. Bates, reported in [1884] W. N. 129. I confess I cannot avoid the conclusion that I am really not following Bates v. Bates, because I think the result of the view I take is that you cannot really, by garnishing, create a forfeiture. Inasmuch as you can only garnish what is a debt actually due, I do not see how any garnishing could ever operate as a forfeiture, and Pearson, J., undoubtedly did in that case hold that a garnishee order did operate as a forfeiture. I can only say, with every possible respect to that very eminent judge, that the judgment is reported only in the Weekly Notes; no reasons are given for it, and I am really unable to follow it. It has already not been followed by Kennedy, J., and I do not think myself it is consistent with the case of In re Stulz in the Court of Appeal. I quite follow what Mr. Upjohn said in reply, that the words there were different, but I do not agree with his distinction that they were all governed by the word "anticipate." I do not think that is so. It is not a fair way of construing a clause to say "anticipate, assign, or otherwise incumber" makes the word "anticipate" govern the assignment or otherwise incumbering. The three words are all different, and are meant to apply to different things. I do not think the decision turned on that, except so far as it gave rise to the argument of Sir John Rolt, which, I think, is a sound argument that really disposes of the question. There has been no forfeiture.

THE KING v. OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF CONNAH'S QUAY. (a.)

Local government—Burial Acts—Transfer of powers of burial board to urban district council—Burial expenses—Moneys borrowed under the Burial Acts—Poor rate—General district rate—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 53 (3), 62 (1), 67 (3).

Where an urban district council takes over the powers and duties of a burial board under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1894, the expenses incurred by the council in carrying into execution the Burial Acts and the payment of interest upon, and the repayment of moneys borrowed in pursuance of the Burial Acts, are chargeable to the poor rates of the parish or parishes for which the burial board was formed, and are not payable out of the general district rate.

Rule nisi for a mandamus commanding the overseers of the parish of Connah's Quay to show cause why they should not honour a certificate of the Urban District Council of Connah's Quay, and pay to them the sum of £150 to defray the expenses of carrying into execution the Burial Acts.

In the year 1882 a burial board was formed for the three townships of Wefre, Golftyn, and Kelsterton.

On the 20th of November, 1882, the board borrowed £1,500 from one James Freme, and on the 22nd of November, 1883, a further sum of £300, by terminal annuity deeds, which constituted the repayment of the sums a charge upon the poor rates of the parish of St. Mark, Connah's Quay. The parish of St. Mark consists of the three above-mentioned townships. From 1882 to 1897 the expenses of the board were paid out of the poor rate upon the certificate of the board.

On the 3rd of March, 1897, the Urban District Council of Connah's Quay by resolution took over all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the burial board. In 1897, 1898, and 1899 certificates were issued by the urban district council to the overseers of the poor in respect of the accounts payable under the annuity deeds and the expenses of carrying into execution the Burial Acts, which certificates were duly honoured.

On the 4th of July a certificate was issued to the overseers directing them to pay the above sum of £150. The overseers refused to comply, on the ground that the moneys ought to be paid out of the general district rate and not out of the poor rate.

Marshall, K.C. (Jenkin with him), showed cause.—The Burial Act, 1852, by section 19, provides that the expenses incurred or to be incurred by the burial board of any parish in carrying the Act into execution shall be chargeable upon and paid out of the rates for the relief of the poor of such parish, and the overseers are required to pay out of the rates for the relief of the poor such sum as the board may direct upon receipt of a certificate from the board. Section 20, which has been since repealed, gave the board power to borrow money for the purpose of laying out burial grounds, and for other purposes. It is provided by the Burial Act, 1857, s. 4, that a local board of health may, by Order in Council, be constituted a burial board, and by the Burial Act, 1860, that the expenses of a local board constituted a burial board may be paid out of the general district rate or by a separate burial rate. Then came the Local Government Act, 1894, which by section 62 (1) gave an urban district council power by resolution to take over the powers, duties, property, and liabilities of any authority in its district constituted under any of the adoptive Acts. Section 28 of the same Act provides that the expenses of an urban district council shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be paid out of the district fund and general district rate, and section 53 (3) provides as follows: "The property, debts, and liabilities of any authority under any of the adoptive Acts whose powers are transferred in pursuance of this Act, shall continue to be property, debts, and liabilities of the area of that authority, and the proceeds of the property shall be credited, and the debts and liabilities, and the expenses incurred in respect of the said powers, duties, and liabilities shall be charged to the account of the rates or contributions levied in that area, and where that area is situate in more than one parish the sums credited to and paid by each parish shall be apportioned in such manner as to give effect to this enactment." The effect of those provisions was to enact that the expenses incurred by a district council under the Burial Acts should be paid out of the general district rate. It is true that section 67 provides that "Where any powers and duties are transferred by the Act from one authority to another authority . . . (3) all debts and liabilities of the first authority incurred by virtue of such powers and duties shall become debts and liabilities of the latter authority, and be defrayed out of the like property and funds out of which they would have been defrayed if this Act had not passed." But that provision only applies in cases where powers and duties are transferred directly by the Act, and not, as here, by resolution of the authority which takes them over.

Macmorran, K.C., and R. V. Bankes, for the urban district council, in support of the rule, were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the Urban District Council of Connah's Quay has become the burial authority in the parish of Connah's Quay by virtue of the operation of the powers of the Local Government Act, 1894, and they have as a burial board made a demand upon the poor law authorities to pay the money which would have been payable under the Burial Acts.

As I gathered from Mr. Marshall's very clear statement, the facts are that there was a burial board from 1882 to 1897. In March, 1897, there was a resolution to transfer the powers and duties of the burial board to the urban district council under the powers of subsection 1 of section 62. It is not denied that the Burial Acts are adoptive Acts, and it is not denied that the powers under them are now to be exercised by this urban district council.

As I understand sections 62 and 67 of the Local Government Act, 1894, taken together and with some other provisions of the Act which I need not mention, but which Mr. Marshall referred to, they mean this, that after the transfer of the powers under the adoptive Act by resolution, or by whatever machinery transfers those powers, the new authority is to exercise the powers of the old body. If it had been intended to charge a different class of ratepayers special words would have been used. The Acts referred to are adoptive Acts—that is to say, Acts which the local authority may adopt. Mr. Marshall argued that because a resolution was required to pass the powers and duties from the burial board to the urban district council—that, therefore, the transfer was not a transfer of powers and duties from one authority to another by the Act within the initial words of section 67. But I think that if it had been intended to exclude from the protective clause of section 67 transfers which took place under section 62, we should have found a specific enumeration, and I think that it was intended that when powers and duties were transferred by virtue of the operation of the Act that the protective clause in section 67 should apply.

I agree that we have not to consider the rights of the persons who lent the money in this case, but I think it is fair to point out that the ordinary scheme of legislation would be that where duties are transferred under the powers of an Act to a new authority, the rights, powers, and obligations continue to have the same incidence and effect in the hands of such new authority. I think that the rule for a mandamus must be made absolute.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

REX v. GOVERNOR OF HOLLOWAY PRISON.
Ex parte BLUHM. (a.)

Extradition — Extradition treaty with Germany — "Apprehension"—"Sufficient evidence for the extradition" within two months from apprehension—Subsequent investigation of other charges—Jurisdiction to review decision of magistrate—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), s. 8.

B. was arrested in this country under the extradition treaty with Germany, charged with obtaining money by false pretences from one Wallesch, and evidence was given upon that charge, and B. was remanded from time to time. After the expiration of two months from his arrest, B. was committed for extradition on this charge. He was, however, detained pending the investigation of thirty other charges against him, and he was also committed on those charges.

Held, that there was, in fact, upon the depositions before the expiration of the two months from the date of B's arrest, sufficient evidence for his committal on the first charge under the treaty.

Semble, the committal of B. on the subsequent charges was regular.

In this case a rule nisi for a habeas corpus had been obtained calling upon the Governor of Holloway Prison to show cause why he should not bring up Joseph Bluhm, a prisoner in his custody, in order that he might be released.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared from the evidence before the magistrate that Bluhm had been charged with obtaining money by false pretences from a German subject resident in Germany, the allegation being that he promised one Wallesch an advance of a considerable sum of money upon receipt of an instalment of interest, and having received the instalment never sent the principal. Bluhm was brought before Mr. Marsham, one of the metropolitan police magistrates, remanded from time to time, and, after the two months had expired, he was committed for extradition on the Wallesch charge, but was detained pending the investigation of some thirty or forty other charges of similar frauds said to have been perpetrated by him in Germany, and he had now been committed for extradition also on those charges. The Extradition Treaty with Germany (see articles 9 and 12) and the Extradition Act of 1870 provide that unless sufficient evidence to justify committal be brought against a prisoner within two months of his apprehension he should be discharged from custody.

The rule nisi was applied for and obtained on the 8th of March, the prisoner having been arrested on the 27th of December, 1900, and was granted on the following grounds: (1) That no sufficient evidence for extradition had been produced within two months from the applicant's apprehension, (2) that the magistrate was not entitled after the expiration of two months to receive any evidence in support of charges other than those on which the prisoner was apprehended, and (3) that there was no evidence of the identity of Joseph Bluhm with the person referred to in the depositions taken in Germany.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G. (H. Sutton and H. C. Biron, with him), showed cause.—The rule was moved for and granted under a belief that there was no evidence within the two months of the charge on which extradition was applied for. But that in fact was not the case. The treaty—and articles 9 and 12 of the Extradition Treaty with Germany* which for the purposes of this case may be taken as incorporated into the Extradition Acts, although upon that questions might arise in other cases—only impose the condition that there should be within two months sufficient evidence on which the magistrate could act. The depositions amply fulfilled that condition. If an order had been made for extradition on the first charge there would be nothing to prevent the German government from making an application on the subsequent charges also. If no evidence had been offered on the Wallesch charge within two months then the magistrate ought to have discharged him, but he could immediately have been re-arrested on the other charges.

J. R. Randolph, in support of the rule.—On the 14th of February, 1901, at which date the two months expired, there was not sufficient evidence to justify the committal of Bluhm. The court was not bound by the adverse opinion expressed by the magistrate on this point, as was clear from a dictum of Lord Brampton given in In re Castioni, [1891] 1 Q. B. 149, at p. 164. [The case is also reported in 39 W. R. 202.] Moreover, the prisoner has been committed on some thirty charges other than the one preferred by Wallesch, the evidence in support of which is insufficient to justify extradition. If these are to form the ground of extradition, the prisoner is entitled to be discharged under the order issued in regard to the charge made by Wallesch and he should be reapprehended. A man in custody may be apprehended by reading over the warrant to him: Reg. v. Weil, 31 W. R. 60, 9 Q. B. D. 701.

*Article 9 of the Extradition Treaty with Germany is as follows: "If the requisition for extradition be in accordance with the foregoing stipulations the competent authorities of the state applied to shall proceed to the arrest of the fugitive. The prisoner is then to be brought before a competent magistrate, who is to examine him and to conduct the preliminary investigation of the case, just as if the apprehension had taken place for a crime committed in the same country."

Article 12: "If sufficient evidence for the extradition be not produced within two months from the date of the apprehension of the fugitive, he shall be set at liberty."

CHANNELL, J.—In my opinion this rule should be discharged on the first ground, as in my opinion there was in fact, upon the depositions, before the expiry of two months from the apprehension sufficient evidence for a committal of the prisoner on the charge made by Wallesch. That being our opinion it is unnecessary to say anything on the question whether the magistrate's opinion that there was sufficient evidence would have been binding upon us or not, but there seems some authority for saying that the court should not go behind the opinion of the magistrate on that point. The result, therefore, is that within two months from the apprehension sufficient evidence was produced on the first charge, and therefore the prisoner is not entitled to the benefit of article 12 and ought not to be set at liberty. With regard to the other questions argued by Mr. Randolph, and upon which we granted the rule in order that they might be considered, I am not sure whether it is necessary for us to express any opinion. However, we think that the proceedings which we now know have taken place—namely, the committal on thirty odd charges—were regular, and even if they were irregular I do not see how we can grant this application for a habeas corpus, since the prisoner is not entitled to be set at liberty, in our judgment, on the first charge, and we could not say he could be detained on one ground and not on another. Article 12 is intended to prevent a prisoner against whom a charge has not been made out from being detained longer than two months under suspicion, and he has a right to be set at liberty if within two months a case is not made out justifying his detention. If that does not apply, the procedure is to be the same as in this country. Article 9 provides for this. If he is charged with one offence, and the evidence is sufficient to justify his being committed, the magistrate can commit him then and there, but not necessarily if there are other charges pending against him. The only difference in procedure is that which is made by article 12, and if that does not apply there is no difference at all. These proceedings appear to me regular and businesslike. It may be that when the prisoner is tried in Germany he may be entitled under the German law, made in accordance with article 7, to plead he has been properly extradited only on the one charge. If he has not been properly extradited as to the thirty charges he can raise that point in the German courts but not here. It is, moreover, clear that we could have granted an application to quash these proceedings if the matter had come before us in some such form, and not on a rule for a habeas corpus. For these reasons the rule must be discharged.

BUCKNILL, J.—I agree, and for the same reasons. I would only add that by our decision no injustice has been done the man as he is not precluded raising the same point in the German courts as his counsel desired to raise here.

LUDBROOK v. LUDBROOK. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Mortgage—Person claiming under a mortgage—Possession adverse to mortgagor—Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833, ss. 2, 20; 1837; 1874, s. 9.

The plaintiff, the sister of the defendant, sought to recover possession of a house which was held by their father under a lease expiring in 1922.

In 1876 the father demised and assigned this and other premises to a mortgagee for the whole term except the last day; and in 1882 he assigned all the premises to a second mortgagee for the whole term, subject to the first mortgage.

The father died on the 1st of January, 1885, having by his will bequeathed the lease to trustees in trust to secure an annuity to his widow for her life, and after her death an annuity to his daughter (the plaintiff) for her life, and subject thereto in trust for the defendant.

After the father's death the widow was allowed to reside in the house until her death in July, 1899, under circumstances which the plaintiff alleged gave her a title by possession, under the Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874, for the remainder of the term. By her will the mother bequeathed all her property to the plaintiff, who continued to reside in the house until December, 1899, when the defendant took possession and excluded her.

In 1888 the defendant paid off the second mortgage, and in 1893 the first mortgage, and obtained a transfer of the property. In 1894 he purchased the reversion subject to the lease on the whole of the premises. It was admitted that, up to the transfer in 1893, interest upon the mortgage debts had been duly paid by the mortgagor or his assigns, and therefore within twelve years of the son taking possession

Held (reversing the decision of Grantham, J.), that, as the mortgage was not extinguished, the defendant was entitled to rely upon the Real Property Limitation Act, 1837, and to take possession as mortgagee, the mortgage having been created before the possession of the mother commenced; and, further, that section 20 of the Act of 1833 did not apply.

This was an application by the defendant for judgment or new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a special jury.

The action was brought to recover possession of certain premises situated in the East End of London, and mesne profits from the 27th of December, 1899, and damages for trespass.

The plaintiff was the sister of the defendant, and it was not disputed that the defendant was legally entitled to the possession of the premises unless the plaintiff could show a possessory title by reason of the Statutes of Limitation.

This title the plaintiff said she had acquired in the following way.

She alleged that under the Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874, her mother had acquired a title by possession for more than twelve years for the remainder of the term on which the premises were held, and that she, under her mother's will, was entitled to the houses.

The jury found that since the death of the plaintiff's father, his widow was in possession of the house, and after her death the plaintiff remained on in possession, but without the consent of the defendant.

Grantham, J., on further consideration on the above findings of the jury, gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

R. A. M'Call, K.C. (Younger, K.C., and H. H. Lawless with him), appeared for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 29.—The following judgment was read by

ROMER, L.J.—The only question that arises for our determination on this appeal is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant possession of the house and premises known as Eagle House. The plaintiff claims to have acquired as against the defendant a good title to the property under the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, as altered by the Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. Apart from the operation of these Acts it is clear that the plaintiff has no title to the premises. To the plaintiff's claim several defences have been raised, but there is one short answer on the part of the defendant which renders it unnecessary for us to consider the other points taken by him. He is a mortgagee of the premises, and he claims the benefit of the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, as altered by the statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 9. We think that this claim on his part is good, and affords a complete answer to the plaintiff's case. The circumstances of the case, so far as necessary to be stated to show how the point we are now dealing with arises, are as follows: The premises, together with others, were held by the father of the plaintiff and defendant under a lease for a long term of years which will not expire until the year 1922. In his lifetime the father mortgaged the lease to secure certain sums of money advanced to him. First, in 1876, he mortgaged it by deed by which the leasehold premises were demised and assigned to the mortgagee for the whole term except the last day, and, secondly, in 1882 he mortgaged it by deed by which the leasehold premises were assigned to the second mortgagee for the whole term subject to the first mortgage. The father died on the 1st of January, 1885, having by his last will bequeathed the lease to two trustees in trust to secure an annuity given to his widow for her life, and after her death an annuity given to his daughter, the plaintiff, for her life, and subject thereto in trust for the defendant. After the testator's death the widow was allowed to reside during her lifetime in Eagle House under circumstances which we should have had carefully to consider but for the point now being dealt with. On the 1st of December, 1888, the defendant, in consideration of his payment to the executors of the second mortgagee of the sum then owing on the second mortgage, obtained a transfer to himself of the mortgage debt and security; and on the 27th of January, 1893, in consideration of his payment to the first mortgagee of the sum then owing on the first mortgage, the defendant obtained a transfer of that mortgage debt and security. In 1894 the defendant purchased and had conveyed to him the reversion, subject to the lease, in the leasehold premises. In July, 1899, the widow died, having by will bequeathed all her property to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, who had been living with her mother, continued to reside at Eagle House until the 27th of December, 1899, when the defendant took possession, and excluded the plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action.

In the course of the argument before us it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that, at any rate up to the date of the transfer in 1893 of the first mortgage to the defendant, interest on the mortgages had been duly paid by the mortgagor and his assigns within the meaning of 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28. That being so, twelve years had not elapsed since the last payment of interest when the defendant took possession of Eagle House. It is also clear that the mortgages are still in existence, and have not been merged or extinguished. That being so, the defendant is in a position to avail himself of the benefit of the statutes to which we have referred. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant did not take possession of the premises in his character of mortgagee; but, even if the defendant did not originally intend to take possession as mortgagee, it is quite open to him by his defence to justify the taking of possession in his capacity of mortgagee as against the plaintiff, who seeks to treat him as a trespasser. The next point taken on behalf of the plaintiff is that, inasmuch as she had acquired under the Statute of Limitations a good title against the defendant in his capacity other than that of mortgagee, he was barred as mortgagee by virtue of section 20 of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. But even if section 20 applies to any concurrent right other than one in respect of a future estate or interest, yet in the present case the section cannot apply. The defendant was not in the position of the mortgagor. The trusts upon which the lease, subject to the mortgages on it, was held by the trustees of the father's will were still existing. The defendant had no estate in possession other than his estate as mortgagee, and he had no right, apart from his right as mortgagee, to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover the land within the words of the section. In short, he never came within the operation of the section at all. Lastly, it was said on behalf of the plaintiff that the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28 only applies to proceedings between mortgagor and mortgagee. But the statute is not in terms limited to such proceedings. And it has been held in several cases not to be so limited. If the mortgage be an existing one and was created before the commencement of the possession of the person claiming to have acquired a title by such possession under the Statute of Limitations, then the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28 undoubtedly applies in favour of the mortgagee, although the person in possession may have acquired a good title as against the mortgagor and those claiming under the mortgagor: see Thornton v. France, 46 W. R. 56, [1897] 2 Q. B. 143, a decision of the Court of Appeal, where the earlier authorities are considered. In the present case the mortgages were executed before the commencement of the possession of the widow, and are valid and subsisting mortgages, and there are no circumstances existing which prevent the defendant from claiming the benefit of the statute as against the plaintiff. This point being decided in favour of the defendant the plaintiff's case fails, and we need not consider the other defences raised by the defendant. But we think it right to say that, if the defendant had not been a mortgagee, we should under the circumstances of the case have considered it necessary that a new trial should take place. The jury were not sufficiently or properly directed as to the circumstances and nature of the mother's occupation of the premises. Nor were they directed upon or told to consider the questions, first, whether the entries made and acts done by the defendant from time to time by the permission of the trustees on the premises did not amount to a continuation of the possession of the father, and secondly, whether the interest of the widow in the premises immediately after the father's death was not that of tenant at will, and was not reconstituted from time to time by the entries and acts of the defendant.

DE LASALLE v. GUILFORD. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Lease of house — Collateral warranty as to condition of drainage—Right of action for breach of warranty.

An action lies for breach of a collateral warranty, on the granting of a lease of a house, that the drainage is in good condition.

Application for a new trial or for judgment in an action tried before Bruce, J., and a special jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a warranty as to the sanitary condition of the drainage of a house which the plaintiff took on lease from the defendant.

There was an alternative cause of action for misrepresentation; and there was a further alternative cause of action for breach of covenant to repair the outside of the house after notice.

In February, 1899, the plaintiff entered into negotiations with the defendant for taking on lease a house belonging the defendant.

The plaintiff's case was that he caused particular inquiries to be made as to the sanitary condition of the house, and the defendant assured him that the drainage was in perfect order. Relying on the defendant's representations the plaintiff executed a tenancy agreement, and entered into possession of the house on the 25th of March, 1899. He found that the sanitary arrangements were in a very bad state, and he, his wife, and his daughter suffered considerably in health in consequence, and had to go to the seaside for change of air.

In April, 1900, a sanitary inspector was called in, and he discovered numerous defects in the sanitary arrangements, and alterations had to be made which involved the plaintiff in considerable loss.

At the trial the jury, in answer to questions left to them by the learned judge, found—(1) that there was a distinct representation by the defendant that the drains were in good order; (2) that the defendant did not give his word as to the perfect condition of the drains; (3) that there was no fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the defendant; (4) that there was no breach of covenant to repair, because the plaintiff had not given notice in accordance with the covenant. The jury assessed the damages at £75.

On further consideration, Bruce, J., gave judgment for the defendant, being of opinion that the jury had not found that there was a warranty, and that, even if there was a warranty, it was not collateral so as to entitle the plaintiff to maintain an action.

The plaintiff applied for a new trial or for judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—A. L. SMITH, M.R, read the following judgment: This is an action for damages by a tenant against his landlord for breach of a warranty that the drains at the time of the letting of the defendant's house to the plaintiff were in good condition, whereas they were not, whereby illness intervened and the plaintiff suffered damages, as the jury have found, to the extent of £75. There were alternative causes of action—one founded upon a false and fraudulent representation and the other upon a breach of covenant to repair the outside of the house after notice. But these two last causes failed, because as to the one the plaintiff could not prove fraud, and as to the other because he failed to prove that the notice required by the covenant had been given to the defendant. The jury found, however, the disputed facts relating to the alleged warranty in favour of the plaintiff, and the questions which now arise are—first, does what the jury have found to have been stated by the defendant, in the circumstances in which the statements were made, amount to a warranty in law, or only to a mere representation, in which case no action for damages can be maintained without proof of fraud? Secondly, if the statements found to have been made by the defendant amounted to a warranty, was such warranty a warranty collateral to the lease so as to be given in evidence and given effect to notwithstanding the lease?

Before considering these points it is necessary to see what it is that the jury have found to be the truth in this case as to the statements made by the defendant to the plaintiff's wife and daughter before the counterpart of the lease was handed over by the daughter to the defendant. The defendant's case was a flat denial that he had said anything about the drains. The jury acted upon the evidence of the wife and daughter, and, as these findings stand unimpeached, all that is left to the defendant to argue is that the statements made do not amount to a warranty but only to a representation, and that if they amount to a warranty it is not collateral to the lease and cannot be given effect to. Prior to the 28th of February, 1899, the plaintiff, who was anxious about drainage, as he had suffered from bad drains in his previous house, by his wife, on his behalf, had had interviews with the house agents about the drains of the defendant's house, and on the 21st of February, 1899, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows: "Mayfield, 21.2.99. Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 14th inst. with enclosure. (This was the draft agreement for tenancy for three years.) I shall be prepared to exchange the counterpart for the lease when executed, and shall be glad to hear from you accordingly in due course. Will you kindly inform me if the drains and all sanitary arrangements are in good order?" To this the defendant answered: "February 22, 1899. . . . As regards the drainage, that was tested and put into good order by me, including a new w.c. upstairs when Mr. Rawlings went out." This did not, as it will be seen, satisfy the plaintiff; for, although on the 28th of February, 1899, he sent his wife and daughter to the defendant, who took with them the counterpart executed by the plaintiff ready to be exchanged for the lease if further assurances about the drains were obtained, he gave particular instructions to them that the counterpart was not to be exchanged for the lease until they got from the defendant the necessary assurance. The wife stated: "I told the defendant that my husband before exchanging the agreement wanted a still further assurance as to the drains. I gave as my reason for this that we had before suffered from the drainage in the house in which we had been, and it made us more particular. I said my husband would like a certificate. He then said that he could give me his word for the perfect condition of the drains, that I need have no fear on the subject; and he repeated, 'I will give you my word, will that satisfy you?' I said I could not but be satisfied with his word, and accepted it. My daughter then said, 'We will exchange agreements, then; I will give you the agreement,' and she handed it to him." In cross-examination the wife said: "I had in the very first instance told Nightingales, the house agents, I would not take a house in which the drains could not be guaranteed." The plaintiff's daughter in her evidence stated: "When we reached the defendant's office (he is a solicitor) my mother first of all spoke on the subject of the drains, and was very emphatic about wishing to know if they were in thorough good order, and suggested that we should have the sanitary inspector's certificate. The defendant said it was quite unnecessary, that the drains were in perfect condition, and we could take his word for it. . . . 'I give you my word upon the subject.' . . . I then handed the agreement to him." As before stated, the defendant's evidence was a flat denial that he had ever said anything at all about the drains to the wife or her daughter. Now do these proved statements by the defendant to the wife and daughter, in the circumstances in which they were made, afford evidence of a warranty, or only evidence of a representation? Bruce, J., in a clear and accurate summing up undoubtedly directed the jury upon the question of warranty, also upon false representation, and also upon the breach of covenant. The questions he then put to the jury were these—viz., Was there a breach of covenant? Then, he said, comes the question—was there a warranty? Did he warrant and pledge himself that the drains were in perfect order? If he made the representation that the drains were in perfect order, did he do that falsely and fraudulently? The jury negatived fraud, and found no breach of covenant, on the ground that due notice had not been given thereunder. It will be seen from the shorthand notes that the jury, or some of them, for some reason had a difficulty about the word "perfect," though they unanimously found that the statement of the defendant was that the drains were in good order, and that they were not. Mr. Shearman, the learned counsel for the defendant, upon the verdict being given, said, "Then, my lord, it comes to this, that there is a verbal warranty, no fraudulent misrepresentation, and no breach of covenant." Bruce, J.—"Yes." Mr. Shearman.—"That raises a question of law." Bruce, J.—"I will hear you on that." In my judgment, having read through the shorthand notes of the summing up of Bruce, J., and what took place at the end of the summing up, I think that Mr. Shearman was quite accurate in what he said was the verdict. Afterwards, upon further consideration, Bruce, J., doubted whether there was a sufficient finding that there was "something which would amount to a warranty," and he arrived at the conclusion that even if there was it would not be collateral to the lease. To get over this doubt of Bruce, J., as to no sufficient finding of a warranty, the learned counsel on each side in this court have left it to us, assuming the jury did not in fact find a warranty, though I think they did, to say whether the true inference from the proved statements made is that there was a warranty or merely a representation by the defendant.

Now, what constitutes a warranty in law, or a mere representation? To create a warranty no special form of words is necessary. It must be a collateral undertaking forming part of the contract by agreement of the parties express or implied, and must be given during the course of the dealing which leads to the bargain, and should then enter into the bargain as part of it. It was laid down by Buller, J., as long ago as 1789 in Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51: "It was rightly held by Holt, L.C.J., in Crosse v. Gardner, Carth. 90, 3 Mod. 261, and Medina v. Stoughton, 1 Salk. 210, 1 Lord Raymond, 593, and has been uniformly adopted ever since, that an affirmation at the time of sale is a warranty provided it appear on evidence to have been so intended." And in determining whether it was so intended a decisive test is whether the vendor assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the vendor has no special knowledge and on which the buyer may be expected also to have an opinion and to exercise his judgment. In the former case it is a warranty, in the latter not. See Benjamin on Sales (3rd ed.), p. 607, whose statement upon the law, in my judgment, is accurate. That the above constitutes a warranty upon the sale of a chattel cannot be doubted, and why not upon the sale of real property or upon the granting and taking of a lease if it be collateral? I know of no authority which shows nor do I see any principle upon which it should be held that, the like conditions existing, such an affirmation does not constitute a warranty upon, as in this case, the granting of a lease. Now, in the present case, did the defendant assume to assert a fact, or merely to state an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which he had no special knowledge and upon which the plaintiff's wife on behalf of her husband might be expected also to have an opinion? What is it the defendant asserts? I paraphrase the evidence: "You need have no certificate of a sanitary inspector, it is quite unnecessary; the drains are in perfect condition, I give you my word upon the subject. Will that satisfy you? If so, hand me over the counterpart." What more deliberate and emphatic assertion of a fact could well be made during the course of the dealing which led up to the counterpart lease being handed over to the defendant? That the question asked and the answer given were seriously intended, to use the words of Wills, J., in Best v. Edwards, 60 J. P. 9, to be the basis of the contractual relation between the parties I cannot doubt. There is the evidence that the plaintiff would not take the lease unless the drains were guaranteed, and surely the statements made by the defendant were not made on the assumption that they were to be of no avail to the plaintiff, except they were made fraudulently. In my judgment everything necessary to establish a warranty has in this case been proved.

The next question is—Was the warranty collateral to the lease so that it might be given in evidence and given effect to? It appears to me in this case clear that the lease did not cover the whole ground, and that it did not contain the whole of the contract between the parties. The lease is entirely silent about the drains, though there is a covenant that the lessee during the term should do inside repairs, and the lessor the outside repairs, which would, I suppose, include the drains which happened to be inside or outside the house. There is nothing in the lease as to the then condition of the drains—i.e., at the time of the taking of the lease, which was the vital point in hand. Then why is not the warranty collateral to anything which is to be found in the lease? The present contract or warranty by the defendant was entirely independent of what was to happen during the tenancy. It was what induced the tenancy and in no way affected the terms of the tenancy during the three years which was all the lease dealt with. The warranty in no way contradicts the lease, and without the warranty the lease never would have been executed. Three cases were cited in which parol collateral agreements outside leases had been allowed in evidence and given effect to by the court—viz., Morgan v. Griffith, 19 W. R. 957, L. R. 6 Ex. 70;

Erskine v. Adeane, 21 W. R. 802, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 756, in this court, and Angell v. Duke, 23 W. R. 307, 548, L. R. 10 Q. B. 174. The first two cases related to parol agreements collateral to leases as to keeping down rabbits, and the last case to a parol collateral agreement to do repairs and to send in additional furniture. This last case was first decided in the Court of Queen's Bench upon demurrer upon the pleadings as they stood, when the parol agreement was held to be collateral and admissible in evidence, but when it came to the trial Blackburn, J., refused to admit the evidence about the additional furniture, and the learned judge gave the following reasons for so doing (reported 23 W. R. 548, 32 L. T. Rep. 320, at p. 321): "Here the lease expresses the whole of the terms; the defendant agrees to let, and the plaintiff to take, the house and furniture at a certain rent. There is said to have been an arrangement made beforehand during the negotiation that the defendant should let the plaintiff have more furniture for the same rent. How is this collateral? I cannot perceive that it is." In the present case, as above stated, the lease does not contain the whole terms of the bargain. In the rabbit cases the agreements were held collateral to the leases, and did not contradict the terms of the lease. It was argued by the learned counsel for the defendant that the collateral agreements in the rabbit cases were agreements that something should be done after the lease was taken, and that in the present case the agreement or warranty is that the drains were then in good order. This is true, but if in the rabbit cases the agreements were collateral and outside the leases, the leases not containing the whole terms and the collateral agreements not contradicting the leases, I cannot see why the warranty in this case is not collateral also. Then some cases were cited by the defendant's counsel to show that representations as to drains were never held to be warranties, but when examined I do not think they show this; for the representations in the cases cited were by no means such complete and emphatic statements of fact as were made in this case. And, indeed, upon principle why should there be any difference in the case of drains? First came the case of Green v. Symons, 13 Times L. R. 301, which, in my opinion, so far as it goes is an authority against the defendant, and not in his favour. The verbal warranty alleged was that the house was dry and that the drains were perfect. The jury found that there was a verbal warranty as to the house being dry, and that the house was not dry, but that the drains were not defective, and assessed damages at £50. Lawrance, J., who tried the case, entered judgment for the plaintiff for that amount. Upon appeal this was set aside, not upon the ground that if there had been a warranty the judgment should not have stood, but upon the ground that what was said was a mere representation without fraud, and was made without authority; and neither Lord Esher nor Lopes, L.J., nor Chitty, L.J., doubted that if there had been a warranty the action would have lain, for if it had been their opinion that it would not, it would have been a short end to the case. In Kennard v. Ashman, 10 Times L. R. 213, Wills, J., held that it was clear that there was no warranty that the house was well built, but the learned judge does not seem to me to have held that if there had been a warranty and it had been broken no action could have been maintained. On the contrary, in the case of Best v. Edwards that learned judge clearly thought that if there had been a warranty an action would have lain. His decision was upheld upon appeal, 10 Times L. R. 447, solely upon the facts of the case. In Longman v. Blount, 12 Times L. R. 520, Wright, J., held that a warranty contained in a letter that the house was in a perfect sanitary condition could not be given in evidence, and directed judgment for the defendant, and somewhat invited an appeal. This apparently was not done. I should require further argument to convince me that this direction was correct. The question about it being too late to bring this action because of the lease having been executed was settled adversely to the defendant in this court in the case of Palmer v. Johnson, 32 W. R. 293, 12 Q. B. D. 32, 13 Q. B. D. 351, 32 W. R. Dig. 221. In my opinion, even if the jury had not found a warranty, the true inference is that there was a warranty given in this case collateral to the lease, and therefore the judgment entered for the defendant must be set aside, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the £75, the amount found by the jury, and this appeal must be allowed.

In re KNOTT END RAILWAY ACT, 1898. (a.)

Railway—Judgment creditor—Line not open to traffic—Receiver—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 27), s. 4.

Where the line of a railway company was incomplete and unlikely to be open to traffic for a considerable time, the court declined to appoint a receiver of the company's undertaking, on the ground that there were no duties for him to perform.

Whether the court has jurisdiction under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, to appoint a receiver of the undertaking of a railway company, before the line is open to traffic, quære.

This was an appeal by the Knott End Railway Co. from an order of Farwell, J., appointing a receiver of the undertaking of the company.

The company was incorporated by an Act passed in 1898 to construct a light railway between Knott End and Pilling, in the county of Lancaster, and for other purposes.

This Act provided (inter alia) that the railway should be constructed and worked as a light railway subject to the provisions of Part V. of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868; that the capital of the company should be £50,000 in 10,000 shares of £5 each; and that if the railway should not be completed within five years from the 12th of August, 1898, the powers granted by the Act should cease except as to so much thereof as should then be completed.

The whole of the capital authorized by the Act was offered for subscription, but only 1,171 shares were subscribed for. The total amount paid up on such shares was about £5,835.

By an agreement dated the 4th of November, 1898, and made between the company and the contractor, Mr. Robert Worthington, the contractor agreed to construct and complete the railway.

By a supplemental agreement the consideration payable to the contractor was to be paid as to £6,000 in cash and as to £28,000 in fully-paid shares of the company. One thousand and fourteen shares of the company had been allotted to the contractor or his nominees.

The company proceeded to purchase lands and to construct the railway, but it had not yet been completed. The permanent way was formed and fenced but no rails had been laid. The land for the station at Knott End had not been acquired, and some purchases of land for the public way were not yet completed.

On the 9th of February, 1900, a firm of solicitors obtained judgment against the company for about £1,500, and issued execution. Under the execution about 250 tons of rails on the property of the company were seized and sold, but the judgment remained in part unsatisfied.

On the 15th of August, 1900, another judgment was obtained against the company for £2,982 15s. for debt, and £7 10s. for costs in the Queen's Bench Division. This judgment was still in force and unsatisfied. These latter judgment creditors then presented a petition for the appointment of a receiver of the undertaking of the railway company under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867.

Section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, is as follows: "The engines, tenders, . . . and effects constituting the rolling stock and plant used or provided by a company for the purpose of the traffic on their railway, or of their stations or workshops, shall not, after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic, be liable to be taken in execution at law or in equity where the judgment on which execution issues is recovered in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of this Act, or in an action not on a contract commenced after the passing of this Act; but the person who has recovered any such judgment may obtain the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager of the undertaking of the company, on application by petition in a summary way to the Court of Chancery . . .; and all money received by such receiver or manager shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed . . . in payment of the debts of the company . . ."

In the present case it was agreed that the company had no assets remaining on which execution could be levied.

Farwell, J., appointed a receiver.

The company appealed.

Phipson Beale, K.C., replied.

RIGBY, L.J.—This case raises an important question as to the construction of section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and as to the duty of the court under it. On the present occasion, for the purpose of this application, I think it is not necessary to lay down any final or complete rule as to the jurisdiction conferred on the court by section 4 under all circumstances. It appears to me sufficient to say that, under the existing circumstances of the present case, I can see nothing to justify the appointment of a receiver. Subject to what I have said as to not laying down any final rule, it is necessary to consider the terms of section 4 and the object with which it was passed. We all know that the holders of debentures of a railway company were subject to some restrictions and limitations to which the general creditors were not subject. A general creditor who had recovered judgment against a railway company for his debt could levy execution and seize the rolling stock of the company. The first part of section 4 prohibits the taking in execution of the rolling stock and plant of a railway company "after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic," but it leaves the remedies of the creditors before the railway is opened entirely unaffected. Whatever power they had before the Act, to seize the company's chattels they still retain. Then the second part of the section gives a new remedy in place of that which is taken away by the first part—viz., the appointment by the court of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager, of the undertaking of the company, on the application of a judgment creditor. In the present case an application was made by judgment creditors of the company for the appointment of a receiver. What are the duties of a receiver appointed under this section? He has to receive the profits of the company as a going concern, and to apply them, under the direction of the court, in payment of the debts of the company. It is not suggested that there are in the present case any outstanding debts due to the company or any income which the receiver would be entitled to receive. All that he could receive would be the profits of the railway as a going concern when it is open for traffic. If there were nothing else to be considered I should have thought the meaning was clear, that a receiver ought not to be appointed until the railway is open, or is on the point of being opened, for public traffic, because under those circumstances only would the appointment of a receiver be efficacious. But it has been argued that, though the two clauses of section 4—the first, which restricts the right of a creditor to levy execution, and the second, beginning with the word "but," which confers the power to appoint a receiver—are parts of one section, they are wholly independent of each other, and should be treated as if they were two distinct sections, and the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Manchester and Milford Railway Co. is cited as an authority in support of this view. I entirely dissent. No court can by its finding alter facts; it cannot make one section two. But, in my opinion, that judgment has no such effect as has been attributed to it. No doubt in that case Jessel, M.R., described the new right given by the latter part of section 4 as "wholly independent of the fact that the company had or had not rolling stock to be taken in execution," and as "an entirely new right given to all judgment creditors of railway companies." But what were the facts of the case? The railway had been opened for traffic, and the court was asked to appoint a manager of the undertaking. The appointment was objected to apparently on the ground that the petitioner had not been deprived of any right by the first part of section 4. The court said that the second part of the section applied, notwithstanding that the company had no rolling stock which could be taken in execution. But I think no one would have been more astonished than the learned judges who decided that case if they had been told that their language was to be wrested from its context and from the facts to which it applied, and to be interpreted as saying that the two parts of the section must be treated as two sections which have no relation to each other. All that the learned judges meant to say, I think, was this, that it was not necessary for a creditor to show that he had been deprived of a special or particular right by the first part of the section before he could have the benefit of the new general right which is conferred by the second part. I must not be understood as saying that there is jurisdiction under section 4 to appoint a receiver, unless the railway is open, or about to be opened, for traffic. I think there is reasonable ground for contending that the words which restrict the rights of judgment creditors after the railway is open for traffic apply equally to the appointment of a receiver. But what I do say is this, that, whether there is jurisdiction or not, it would not be right, or in accordance with the practice of the court, to appoint a receiver who in all probability would not have any duties to perform for some considerable time, and perhaps none at all, if the railway is never open for traffic. This alone is a sufficient ground for saying that a receiver ought not to be appointed in the present case; I cannot see that there would be anything for him to do until the railway is opened for traffic. And, indeed, my present view is that any judgment creditor of the company who, but for the appointment of a receiver, would have been entitled to seize any chattels belonging to the company, would be able by an application pro interesse suo to obtain leave from the court to seize those chattels, notwithstanding the appointment of a receiver. The only reason why such a creditor must obtain the leave of the court is that he must not interfere with the officer of the court without that leave. The rights of a judgment creditor are not affected by section 4 until the railway is open for traffic. If a receiver were in fact appointed and put in possession of chattels of the company, the court would, I think, on the application of a judgment creditor, order the receiver to relinquish possession. Under these circumstances I cannot see any use in appointing a receiver in the present case, and it would be contrary to the practice of the court to do so. In my opinion the order ought to be discharged.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I assent, for I understand that, according to the practice of the courts of equity, it would not be usual under the circumstances of the present case to appoint a receiver who would have no functions which he could usefully perform. I have not sufficient knowledge of the practice to enable me to form an independent judgment, and therefore I think I am right in accepting the view of my learned brethren, who are familiar with the practice, that the order ought to be discharged. But I think it is right that I should say a few words about the construction of section 4. That section is divided into two parts. The first part is for the protection of the rolling stock and plant provided by a railway company for its traffic, and the protection is given by depriving individual judgment creditors of the right of taking the rolling stock and plant in execution, either of law or in equity. It is quite plain from the express words of the section that this protection does not arise, and that the right to levy execution is not taken away until there is public traffic on the railway. Everything in the first part of the section is governed by the words "after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic." The right of individual creditors to levy execution having been thus taken away, the second part of the section goes on to give a new right, not to the individual creditor, but to the creditors in general. It is not a substituted right given to individual creditors, but any judgment creditor may obtain the appointment of a receiver. I understand the language of Jessel, M.R., in In re Manchester and Milford Railway Co., in exactly the same sense as does my brother Rigby, L.J.—viz., as meaning that the right which is conferred is a new right, and is independent of the exercise of the creditors' old right. From the first part of the section we see at once that the right of execution which is taken away is limited to a comparatively small subject-matter, whereas the new right conferred by the second part of the section applies to a much larger and wider subject-matter. For instance, the first part of the section does not take away any right of execution upon surplus lands of the company, whereas a receivership order would include surplus lands. Taking this view of the section, the next question is, whether there is jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in the present case. I do not think it is necessary to say more than that I must not be taken as expressing any opinion that no order for the appointment of a receiver can be made under the latter part of the section until the railway is open for traffic. But, assuming for the present purpose that there is jurisdiction before there is traffic on the railway, I will consider whether, apart from the practice of the courts of equity, the order would be a useless one, because, notwithstanding the making of the order, the rights of individual judgment creditors continue until there is traffic on the railway. In my judgment, if it is true that the new remedy is a remedy for all the creditors, it would seem to follow that the moment the new remedy is put in force the rights of individual creditors would be suspended, not because they are taken away by the express words of the first part of the section, but because they are superseded by the new remedy, which operates as an execution for the benefit of the whole class of creditors instead of individual creditors only. Could it be said for a moment that, supposing traffic on the railway had commenced, and the company had property liable to execution—for instance, surplus lands—a judgment creditor could, after the appointment of a receiver under the second part of section 4, issue an elegit against the surplus lands, because there is nothing in the first part of section 4 to take away his rights. In my view, if it is true that the appointment of a receiver is for the benefit of a class of traders, no member of the class ought to be allowed to exercise his individual rights. It is, however, as I understand, not according to the practice of the court to appoint a receiver unless there is an immediate prospect of there being something for him to receive, and it may be that it would not be his duty to protect the property of the company. But, speaking for myself, I am by no means satisfied that there is no jurisdiction under section 4 to appoint a receiver until the railway is open for traffic, and I am by no means satisfied that, if a receiver were appointed before traffic had begun, it would be possible for a judgment creditor to proceed with his execution notwithstanding the appointment.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I need not add anything about the construction of section 4, and I will assume that there is jurisdiction in this case to appoint a receiver. But what is it that a receiver when appointed has to do? Section 4 says that all money received by him "shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the court in payment of the debts of the company and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein."

That, I think, shows that the view of the Legislature was that the receiver when in possession of the railway would work it to a profit, so that the surplus earnings would go to pay the creditors. In the present case there is a railway which is far from completion; there is nothing for the receiver to distribute, or even to receive, in the shape of money. It has not been suggested that there are any outstanding debts or other moneys which he could receive. That being so, the first thing he would have to do would be to complete the railway, so that it might become a going concern. From what source are the funds for that purpose to come? The petitioning creditors are not prepared to undertake to supply them, so that it must be left to the company or to the contractor to find the money. I should in any case be very loth to appoint a receiver when there was nothing for him to do. But in this case I think the appointment of a receiver would be an obstacle to the completion of the line. The circumstances of the present case are peculiar. The contractor, who is to be paid partly in cash and partly in shares, has a strong interest in the completion of the line. A judgment creditor, in the exercise of his undoubted legal rights, has seized some rails which had been brought upon the company's land, and which, under the agreement between the company and the contractor, had become the property of the company, and since then the contractor has not unnaturally held his hand. Under these circumstances I think the appointment of a receiver would not tend to bring about the completion of the line, and I can see no use in making an appointment which would probably be an obstacle to its completion. I think, therefore, that this is not a case in which the jurisdiction, if it exists, should be exercised. And, if authority were needed in support of this view, I find it in the observations of Cotton, L.J., in In re East and West India Dock Co., 36 W. R. 849, 38 Ch. D. 576, where he said: "The Act does not require the court to make an order, but only gives the court power to make an order if the company is a company coming within that definition. If, therefore, the dock company had not made the railway, although it would still be within the definition, yet the court, if asked to make an order under the Act, might say, 'The company may be within the definition, but we are not compelled to make an order, and under the circumstances of the case we shall not make an order.'"

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contracting—Work ancillary to business of undertakers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 4.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the workman's employers, who were engineers, had contracted with a firm of cotton spinners to supply and fix a driving-wheel for a steam-engine on their factory, and that the workman was accidentally killed while engaged in the operation of lifting the wheel into its place.

Held, that the cotton spinners were not liable to pay compensation under section 4 of the Act, because the work of fixing the wheel was merely ancillary or incidental to, and was no part of or process in, their business.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Oldham County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman who had been accidentally killed in the course of his employment.

His employers were Whittaker & Sons, who were engineers. Whittaker & Sons had entered into a contract with Bagley & Wright, who were cotton spinners and manufacturers, to supply and fix a new driving-wheel for a steam engine on their factory.

The workman at the time of the accident was taking part in the operation of lifting the wheel into its place, which was performed by means of a hand-winch and pulleys.

The applicant claimed compensation alternatively from Whittaker & Sons under section 7 of the Act, and from Bagley & Wright under section 4.

The county court judge held that the applicant was not entitled to compensation under the Act. He was of opinion, firstly, that the operation of fixing the wheel was not "engineering work" within the meaning of section 7, because it was not performed by "machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power," and, secondly, that the case was not within section 4, because the work which the engineers had contracted to do was merely ancillary or incidental to, and was no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by Bagley & Wright.

The applicant appealed.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case the applicant claimed compensation alternatively from Whittaker & Sons, the engineers in whose employment the deceased workman was, and from Bagley & Wright, with whom the engineers had contracted to do the work in question. The county court judge held that the case did not come within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the applicant appeals. The claim against the engineers is not now seriously maintained. With regard to Bagley & Wright it is necessary for the applicant to bring them in under section 4. Down to the last clause of the section the applicant would seem to succeed in bringing them in. They were "undertakers" within the Act, and they had contracted with the engineers for the execution of the work in question. But the last clause says this: "This section shall not apply to any contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which is merely ancillary or incidental to and is no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by such undertakers respectively." The contract here was to supply and put up a new fly-wheel for a steam-engine which was used on Bagley & Wright's premises. The trade or business carried on by Bagley & Wright was that of cotton spinners. The county court judge held that putting up a new fly-wheel was merely ancillary and incidental to and was not a part of or a process in their trade or business. I think that the county court judge was right, and that Bagley & Wright cannot be brought within the Act.

SADGROVE v. HOLE. (a.)

Libel—Publication—Post-card—Privileged occasion.

The defendant employed an architect to draw up a specification and to take out the quantities for certain building work. The architect instructed the plaintiff, a quantities surveyor, to take out the quantities, and these were sent to certain builders in order that they might tender for the work. The defendant, having discovered mistakes in the quantities, sent post-cards to two of the builders stating that the quantities were wrong. The quantities surveyor thereupon brought an action for libel against the defendant.

Held, that there was no publication of and concerning the plaintiff until the cards reached the builders, as the plaintiff's name was not mentioned, and there was no evidence that anyone into whose hands the cards might fall prior to reaching the builders would know to whom the statements referred; further, that, as between the defendant and the builders, the occasion was privileged; and that the mere fact that the statements were made on post-cards did not avoid that privilege.

This was an appeal by the defendant in a libel action tried before Ridley, J., and a common jury.

The plaintiff, E. J. Sadgrove, was an architect and quantities surveyor, and the defendant, S. Hole, was managing director of Pike Brothers & Hole (Limited), provision merchants.

With a view to having certain alterations and additions made to one of the company's shops the defendant instructed Alfred Webb, an architect, to draw plans and drawings, and also to prepare a bill of quantities. Webb instructed the plaintiff to take out the quantities. This the plaintiff did, and on the 30th of July, 1900, sent copies to seven builders inviting them to tender for the work.

On the same day the defendant having seen one of the copies and having discovered that mistakes had been made in taking out the quantities, sent to one of the said builders a post-card on which he had written as follows: "Dear Sir,—The quantities sent you this morning by architect are entirely wrong. I have plans, &c., here, and you can give me prices on those. —Yours truly, S. Hole."

On the same date he also sent to another of the said builders a post-card on which he had written as follows: "Gentlemen,—There are great errors in the quantities posted to you this morning; if you will call here you can see plans and give me price of these. —Yours obediently, S. Hole."

The plaintiff alleged that the post-cards were libellous and reflected on him in regard to his business and calling as a quantities surveyor. The defendant pleaded that the words complained of did not bear the meaning put upon them by the plaintiff, and that they did not amount to defamatory matter, and further, that the publication of the post-cards to the two builders was privileged and made bonâ fide and without malice.

At the trial Ridley, J., held that the publication was not privileged, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £5, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendant now applied to have that verdict and judgment set aside and judgment entered for him, or for a new trial on the following grounds: (1) That the contents of the cards were not defamatory; (2) that there was no publication of or concerning the plaintiff; (3) that the occasion was privileged; (4) that there was no evidence of malice to go to the jury; (5) that the learned judge had misdirected the jury.

Firminger, for the appellant.—The post-cards did not constitute a libel. There was no mention of the plaintiff's name thereon, and if these cards had fallen into strangers' hands no one would have known to whom they referred, therefore there was no publication of or concerning the plaintiff. At the trial the defendant said in evidence that he did not know who had taken out the quantities and that he had never even heard of the plaintiff at the time he wrote the cards. There could, therefore, be no possible evidence of malice. The publication of the words on the post-cards was only published to the builders to whom they were sent, and such publication was on a privileged occasion. There was no express malice so as to avoid this privilege.

Kemp, K.C., and J. C. Earle, for the respondent.—The words on the post-cards are clearly libellous, and likely to injure the plaintiff in his profession, and the jury were right therefore in awarding him damages. These words clearly amount to saying that the plaintiff is an incompetent quantities surveyor. The builders' clerks in this case would in all probability know to whom these statements referred, and therefore the privilege is avoided, just as in the case of the telegraph clerks in the case of Williamson v. Freer, 22 W. R. 878, L. R. 9 C. P. 393. In that case it was held that a communication that would otherwise be privileged loses its privilege if made through the medium of the postal telegraph, the necessary communication of the libellous matter to the receiving and forwarding officials amounting to publication to parties to whom the sender was under no such obligation to make the communication as would confer privilege. This case was approved of and followed in Robinson v. Jones, 4 L. R. Ir. 391, 27 W. R. Dig. 115. In that case it was held that the transmission by post of an uncovered post-card, containing libellous matter, is a publication of the libel; and it is no defence to say that the writer had an interest in making, and the person addressed a corresponding interest in receiving, the communication, and that it was made bonâ fide, believing the contents to be true, without malice, and in the bonâ fide belief that the mode of communication used was reasonable.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I think this appeal must be allowed. The libel alleged in this case is contained in statements on two post-cards written by the defendant and sent respectively to two builders who had been invited to tender for certain work and alterations which the defendant desired to have carried out. On one of these post-cards were the following words: "Quantities sent you this morning are entirely wrong," and on the other post-card were these words: "There are great errors in quantities posted to you this morning." The plaintiff in the action, it appears, was not the architect referred to on these post-cards but was a quantities surveyor who had been employed by the architect to take out the quantities which were sent to the several builders who were invited to tender for the proposed work. The question we have to decide is whether these statements on the post-cards are libellous. For myself I must say that I cannot hold that they are incapable of constituting a libel, but in my opinion, whether they do so or not, they were written by the defendant on a privileged occasion. It has been argued by counsel on behalf of the plaintiff that the very fact that these statements were made on post-cards and not enclosed in envelopes destroys any privilege. Now in an action for libel it is necessary for the plaintiff, in order that he may succeed, to show that the defendant has published the libel of and concerning him the plaintiff. If a man writes a libellous statement on a post-card which clearly applies to a certain person, and sends it by post, that is a publication of that statement exactly as in the case of a telegram, and there is authority for saying this in the case of Williamson v. Freer.

But what evidence has the plaintiff in this case given of any publication of and concerning himself? None that I can see. He has given no evidence that any such publication was made before the post-cards were received by the builders to whom they were sent because there is no evidence that if these post-cards had fallen into the hands of other persons than those to whom they were sent such persons could have known to whom the statements referred.

Of course if the plaintiff's name had been mentioned on the post-cards then there would no doubt have been such a publication. The plaintiff's name, however, was not so mentioned. Therefore there was, in my opinion, no publication of a libel of and concerning the plaintiff until these post-cards were received by the builders to whom they were sent, and that occasion was, as I have already said, privileged. Then arises the question whether there is any evidence of express malice on the part of the defendant such as would avoid that privilege. As regards this point it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the mere fact that these statements were made on post-cards in itself is sufficient evidence of such malice. I do not think so. In my opinion there is no evidence in this case of any express malice, and I think, therefore, that we ought to order judgment to be entered for the defendant.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In order for the plaintiff in this case to succeed it is necessary for him to prove that the libel was published of and concerning himself. But this he has not done. I have not the least doubt that the defendant was acting within his rights in communicating with the builders as to the question of the quantities, and therefore as between himself and the builders the occasion was a privileged one; and in my opinion that privilege covers the libel unless there is what I may call a superfluous publication, to other persons than the two builders—namely, such persons as those who might obtain knowledge of the statements on the post-cards before they reached the builders to whom they were sent. In my opinion, if these post-cards had contained statements that were understood by such other persons to refer to the plaintiff, I do not think the privilege would cover such superfluous publication. But these post-cards are not written in such terms and are not primâ facie a publication of and concerning the plaintiff at all. They contain no reference to the plaintiff intelligible to any persons other than those to whom they are addressed. The plaintiff, therefore, has failed to prove that there is a publication of a libel of and concerning himself except to the builders, and in my opinion such publication is privileged. Then comes the question whether there is any evidence of express malice. I do not think there is. In my opinion the mere fact of the communication being made on a post-card is not per se evidence of express malice.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. WRIGHT. (a.)

Railway—Land over tunnel—Superfluous land—Title by adverse possession against railway company—Separate ownership of surface stratum and tunnel—Telegraph wires over surface.

Land situated over a tunnel, though not superfluous land within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act, is not necessary to the undertaking of a railway company, and a title by adverse possession can be acquired to it against the company, carrying with it all rights to the air above the surface stratum, and, subject to the company's rights in the tunnel, to the soil below; and the company is therefore not entitled to carry telegraph wires over land above a tunnel to which such a title has been acquired.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which an injunction was claimed to restrain the defendant from removing telegraph wires carried over a small piece of land in the township of Idle, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, situated over the "Thackley" Tunnel on the Leeds and Bradford Railway of the plaintiffs.

The piece of land in question, with others, was conveyed by a deed of statutory conveyance dated the 4th of December, 1847, to the Leeds and Bradford Railway Co. for the purposes of their undertaking.

The company shortly afterwards constructed the tunnel, which was perpendicularly under a portion of the piece of land.

In 1851 the undertaking of the Leeds and Bradford Railway Co. became vested in the plaintiffs, who have ever since used the tunnel for traffic; but neither railway company, except as hereinafter mentioned, ever occupied or claimed rights over the surface of the land.

By an indenture dated the 8th of June, 1859, the trustees of the vendor to the company conveyed the piece of land, with adjoining lands, to the defendant's predecessor in title, who took without notice of the previous conveyance to the company, and it had since been used for grazing purposes by the defendant and his predecessors.

About 1864 the Electric and International Telegraph Co. erected a line of posts and telegraph wires along the top of the tunnel, the wires being carried across the piece of land at a height of about 30ft., though no posts were erected on it; on the 15th of April, 1864, the Telegraph Co. entered into an agreement with the grantee under the conveyance of 1859 for the annual payment to him of 2s. 6d. in respect of the wires carried "over the land belonging to him situate in the vicinity of" the Thackley Tunnel.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

About 1868 the plaintiffs became entitled to the wires, and they continued to pay the 2s. 6d. to the defendant or his predecessors till 1897. In that year they discontinued the payment, and claimed to be entitled to carry the wires over the land without payment and to fence off the land; the defendant thereupon threatened to remove the wires, and eventually the present action was commenced in November, 1899. The wires had been slightly shifted from time to time, but were now over the part of the land perpendicularly over the tunnel.

The statement of claim asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant from removing or attempting to remove the wires; he pleaded possession, the Statutes of Limitation, and the acquiescence, laches, and delay of the plaintiffs, and also that if they had ever been entitled to the surface they had abandoned it and that it had accordingly become superfluous land within the meaning of the Leeds and Bradford Co.'s special Act, containing provisions similar to those of the Lands Clauses Act, and not having been sold had vested in the defendant or his predecessor; and he counterclaimed for an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from entering on or fencing off the land, or erecting or maintaining a fence there, and from permitting any telegraph lines or wires to remain over or along it, and for an order to remove them.

For the defendant, possession was proved, and for the plaintiffs their chief electrical engineer gave evidence as to the greater convenience of carrying wires over railway tunnels rather than through them.

Levett, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiffs.—The railway company took possession of the surface by making and using the tunnel, and have never abandoned possession. They could not have sold the surface, and did no act to limit their possession to the tunnel itself. There is no authority for the contention that land over a tunnel can be severed by the Statute of Limitations so as to give a title to the surface. There is no difference between artificial surfaces constructed on the "cut and cover" system and natural surfaces. Where another owner has rights under the surface, all that can be acquired is a mere grazing or similar right over the surface itself; and this is all the defendant has, if indeed he has more than a mere licence. In any case he has no right to the air many feet above the surface.

Norton, K.C., and Clayton, for the defendant.—A statutory title can be acquired against a railway company. If the defendant has rights over the surface he must be entitled to the air above; separate titles cannot be acquired to separate strata of air. The natural surface of a tunnel may be superfluous land; it is not like the artificial surface in the cases cited. And the railway company have acknowledged our title by the annual payment of 2s. 6d.

Levett in reply.—What the defendant claims is not a definite cubical part of the hereditament like a cellar or a floor of a building, and so no title can be acquired to it. If this land is superfluous the company will be obliged to sell the land above all its tunnels.

He referred to Shelford's Real Property Statutes, p. 119.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts, continued: There can be no doubt that if both parties in this case had been private individuals the possession which has been proved on the part of the defendant would have been sufficient to establish his title to the piece of land against the plaintiffs under the Statute of Limitations; and this title would have included the air above and the soil below, apart from the question of the tunnel. But then the plaintiffs in this case are a railway company, and it has been argued for the defendant that this land is superfluous land within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act. I am of opinion that it is not superfluous, and I think this is established by the case of In re Metropolitan District Railway Co. and Cosh; but I also think it is established by Norton v. London and North-Western Railway Co. and Bobbett v. South-Eastern Railway Co., and by the judgments of Lindley, L.J., and A. L. Smith, L.J., in Marshall v. Taylor, that a title may be acquired by a stranger to land of a railway company which is not superfluous and could not have been sold by the company though it is true that the other cases have been those of lands adjacent laterally to a railway, not situated over it; and I may refer to the analogous case of charity lands where it was held in Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts, 27 W. R. 602, 4 App. Cas. 324, that such a title could be acquired to lands of which the charity could not dispose. Then it was argued for the plaintiffs that the possession and use of the tunnel amounted to a possession of the surface, but I cannot accept that argument. In my opinion the defendant and his predecessor in title have acquired the surface with all above it and all below necessary for its proper enjoyment, subject to the plaintiffs' rights in the tunnel and in such part of the soil as is necessary for its due enjoyment as a tunnel; and I do not think it is necessary to draw a definite line as to where the property of the defendant as surface owner ends and the property of the railway company begins. The case of a cellar and various other hypothetical cases have been argued, and I do not say but that a question may hereafter arise whether a stranger can acquire a title to land necessary to the undertaking of a of a railway company, but this land, though no doubt possession of it is convenient for the railway, is not necessary to its undertaking. And lastly, I think the railway company have acknowledged the title of the defendant and his predecessors by the annual payment of 2s. 6d. For these reasons I must hold that the plaintiffs' claim for an injunction fails, and the action must be dismissed with costs, and an order made in the terms of the counterclaim, but this must not to be acted on for six months.

Settlement—Married Woman—Husband entitled jure mariti to wife's reversionary interest in personalty—Ante-nuptial agreement — Post-nuptial settlement—Recital—Voluntary settlement by husband—Fraud on creditors—Trustee in bankruptcy—Estoppel—Statute 13 Eliz. c. 5.

A husband entitled jure mariti to his wife's reversionary interest in personalty (subject only to the contingency of her surviving him before he had reduced it into possession, which did not happen), in 1873 joined with his wife, then an infant, in executing a post-nuptial deed of settlement. This settlement recited that, previously to the marriage in 1872, he had "agreed to make such settlement of the fortune of his said wife as is hereinafter contained," and contained a covenant by him with the trustees that, on the interest falling into possession, he and she, or the survivor, and all other necessary parties, would assign and transfer it to the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement, which were for her for life, and after her death, if the husband should not have been or become a bankrupt, for him until he should become a bankrupt, with remainder for the issue of the marriage in the usual way, the survivor of the husband and wife having a power of appointment among issue. The wife having died in 1877, the husband in 1897 appointed two-thirds of the trust funds to his sons and surrendered his life interest to them, and five months afterwards he was adjudicated a bankrupt. The reversionary interest had since fallen into possession.

Held, (1) that, even with such a recital as here, a parol contract before marriage cannot support a settlement made after marriage so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; (2) that the settlement here was a voluntary settlement, and, as it expressly provided that the husband's property should be withdrawn from his creditors in case he became a bankrupt, was fraudulent within 13 Eliz. c. 5; (3) that, even if the recital had been sufficiently precise to create an estoppel binding the husband, the trustee in bankruptcy, having a paramount right by statute overriding the title of the bankrupt and persons claiming under settlements made by him, was in a superior position to the bankrupt himself, and would not be bound by such an estoppel, but no such estoppel was raised; (4) that the fund, therefore, belonged to the trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of the creditors.

Adjourned summons.

Under the will of Henry Holland, dated the 26th of April, 1871, Charlotte Fanny Holland was entitled in remainder expectant on the death of the testator's widow to one-eighth share of the proceeds of sale of his residuary real and personal estate.

The testator died on the 12th of December, 1871.

On the 27th of August, 1872, Charlotte Fanny Holland, being then an infant, intermarried with Isidore M. Bourke.

On the 8th of February, 1873, a post-nuptial settlement was executed by deed made between Isidore M. Bourke and Charlotte Fanny, his wife, then an infant, of the first part, the trustees of the will of Henry Holland, who were also the guardians of Mrs. Bourke, of the second part, and Henry Holland and W. M. Bourke of the third part.

This deed contained the following recital: "And whereas the said parties hereto of the first part intermarried on the 27th of August, 1872, and previously to such marriage the said Isidore M. Bourke agreed to make such settlement of the fortune of his said wife as is hereinafter contained"; and then followed a covenant by the husband with the trustees that immediately upon the share and interest of and in the residuary estate and effects of the said Henry Holland, to which the husband and wife or the husband in his right or either of them then were or was or thereafter might become entitled, becoming an interest in possession, the husband and wife or the survivor and all other necessary parties would assign and transfer the said share to the trustees of the settlement upon the trusts thereinafter declared. The trusts of the settlement were for the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death, if the husband should not have been or become a bankrupt or assigned, &c., for the husband until he should become bankrupt or assign, &c., with remainder for the issue of the marriage in the usual way, the survivor of the husband and wife having a power of appointment amongst issue.

On the 14th of April, 1877, Mrs. Bourke died.

On the 25th of October, 1897, Isidore M. Bourke appointed two-thirds of the trust funds to two of his sons and surrendered his life interest to them.

On the 1st of March, 1898, a receiving order was made against Isidore M. Bourke, and on the 18th of March, 1898, he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

On the 11th of December, 1899, the testator's widow died, and the eighth share of residue given by his will to Mrs. Bourke fell into possession. The fund was claimed by the trustees and beneficiaries under the settlement of the 8th of February, 1873, and their claim was resisted by the official receiver as trustee of Isidore M. Bourke.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the trustees, explained the facts.

St. John Clerke, for the trustees and beneficiaries under the settlement of the 8th of February, 1873.—There was a good equitable assignment of the husband's interest in what, at the date of the settlement, was a reversionary chose in action in the hands of his wife, then an infant; the recital under seal of the ante-nuptial agreement is a complete equity as against the husband and operates as an estoppel against him and the official receiver, who is in no better position. For the legal force of such a recital see the judgment of Lord Selborne in Codrington v. Lindsay, 21 W. R. 182, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 578, at p. 588; Young v. Smith, L. R. 1 Eq. 180, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 44; Buckland v. Buckland, 48 W. R. 637, [1900] 2 Ch. 534. I submit that by the settlement of the 25th of October, 1897, anterior to his bankruptcy, the husband forfeited his life interest completely, but I admit that the whole question turns on whether the deed of the 8th of February, 1873, was a good settlement or not.

W. H. Upjohn, K.C., and A. Adams, for the official receiver.—This is a fraud on the bankruptcy laws. The question is not one of the recital effecting an estoppel, but whether that recital, even if valid, is enough to show a settlement for valuable consideration, and we submit that it is not. There was no agreement de præsenti but only an assignment in futuro, and the settlement is not enforceable against the covenanting husband or his trustee: Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. jun. 196, 2 Cox Ch. Cas. 235; Spurgeon v. Collier, 1 Eden 55; Warden v. Jones, 6 W. R. 180,

2 De G. & J. 76; Trowell v. Shenton, 26 W. R. 837, 8 Ch. D. 318; Freeman v. Pope, 18 W. R. 906, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 538; Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106. On grounds of public policy, having regard to the Statute of Frauds, effect ought not to be given to this recital; on the general policy of the law of bankruptcy and on the particular policy of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, even if the bankrupt is bound by this covenant, his trustee in bankruptcy cannot be held to be so bound. The assignment to the sons is void because it is within two years of the bankruptcy. The position of the trustee is not affected by the fact that he has not yet taken out letters of administration to the wife's estate: Smart v. Tranter, 38 W. R. 530, 43 Ch. D. 587.

St. John Clerke, in reply.—This is not a question under the Statute of Frauds, but a question whether a husband is to be assisted to get rid of his own covenant. But, in point of fact, the settlement does satisfy the statute. As to the policy of the law of bankruptcy, it is well established that the trustee only takes the right which the bankrupt could have had, and no more: Harris v. Truman, 30 W. R. 533, 9 Q. B. D. 264.

[FARWELL, J., refers to In re Walhampton Estate, 32 W. R. 874, 26 Ch. D. 391.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—FARWELL, J., having drawn the attention of counsel to In re Pearson, Ex parte Stephens, 25 W. R. 126, 3 Ch. D. 807, as a case of a voluntary settlement held to be fraudulent within the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5.,

St. John Clerke.—I distinguish In re Pearson as inconsistent with the general course of law and decisions like In re Detmold, Detmold v. Detmold, 37 W. R. 442, 40 Ch. D. 585, for the court should arrive at its conclusion as an inference of fact from all the circumstances before it; it is also distinguishable because there the husband could do what he liked with the property, while here it was his wife's reversionary chose in action: see Montefiore v. Behrens, L. R. 1 Eq. 171, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 44.

Adams.—This case is a settlement by the husband, and the husband alone, and is within In re Pearson.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts as above, said: The fund is claimed by the trustees and beneficiaries under the settlement of the 8th of February, 1873, and their claim is resisted by the official receiver as trustee of Isidore M. Bourke. It is conceded on behalf of the former that the settlement rests in fieri and cannot be enforced unless it can be supported by the consideration of marriage, and he relies on the recital of an ante-nuptial contract which I have already read. The first question that I have to determine is whether the settlement of the 8th of February, 1873, containing such a recital is sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. In my opinion it is now settled that in the absence of such a recital a parol contract before marriage cannot support a settlement made after marriage. The cases are conflicting, but this is, in my opinion, the conclusion on the balance of authorities. In Hodgson v. Hutchenson, 5 Vin. Abr. 522, placit 34, which was decided in 1712, it is reported as follows: "A father encourages the courtship of his son with another's daughter, who proposes by letter to give her £500 if the father would settle £100 per annum on the son, which is refused. The son and daughter marry privately, and after this letter is written; then he that refused consented, and he that consented refused. On a bill for performance of this agreement it was objected that these promises were within the Statute of Frauds, and that the letter being after the marriage should not bind; but decreed contra on circumstances of the father's privity and consent to the match and of the marriage, by afterwards approving of it. That it was out of the statute if no letter for the agreement is admitted by the answer; but this case doth not depend on parol evidence or admissions; for the letter after marriage, considering the transactions before, is sufficient. The offer to settle £100 per annum shall be in tail, with a power to the husband to charge it with £500 for younger children, being the mother's portion, and decreed accordingly: per Harcourt, Lord Keeper." The first ground on which this was decided is that where the agreement is admitted by the answer the statute cannot be pleaded, and this was correct at that time, although it is no longer law: Moore v. Edwards, 4 Ves. 23; Blagden v. Bradbear, 12 Ves. 466, at p. 471. The second ground is so concisely stated in the report that it is difficult to say what it really amounts to. Montacute v. Maxwell, as reported in 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 19 and Prec. in Chancery, 526, was a case of fraud, the reduction of the agreement into writing having been prevented by the fraud and practices of the party to be bound. In the report of the same case in 1 Strange 235, at p. 237, Parker, L.C., says: "But such a parol promise on marriage is sufficient consideration to support a settlement made agreeable to it after marriage. This has been frequently determined. So it is also sufficient consideration to establish a promise made in writing after marriage." Lord St. Leonards (on Powers 647) treats this as a mere dictum, and the editor of Eden's Reports, in a note at vol 1, p. 62, says there is no decision to warrant such a dictum. The report of this case in 1 P. Wms. 618, which was cited in Warden v. Jones, 6 W. R. 180, 2 De G. & J. 76, does not contain the second hearing of this case, in which this dictum is stated. In Taylor v. Beech, 1 Ves. sen. 297, the defendant pleaded the statute in bar to discovery, as well as to relief, and I read the case as confined to this—that the Lord Chancellor thought that there were circumstances which might raise an equity in the plaintiff's favour if full discovery was made, and that he would not shut out such circumstances by refusing discovery. In Surcombe v. Pinniger, 3 De G. M. & G. 571, at p. 575, there is a dictum of Turner, L.J.'s: "But it has been held in many cases that if there be a written agreement after marriage in pursuance of a parol agreement before marriage, this takes the case out of the statute." This dictum was not necessary for the decision, and the Lord Justice does not refer to any case except Taylor v. Beech, which he treats as a case of part performance by acts other than mere marriage. In Barkworth v. Young, 5 W. R. 156, 4 Drew. 1, Kindersley, V.C., decided that a statement of a parol agreement in an affidavit made after the marriage by the party to be charged was sufficient to satisfy the statute. At p. 12 he says: "The defendant objects that, supposing this was in every other respect a sufficient note or memorandum in writing, it was not made till after the marriage, and, therefore, is not good within the intent of the statute. And the opinion expressed by Sir W. Grant in Randall v. Morgan, 12 Ves. 67, is relied upon. Sir W. Grant's opinion is expressed in the form of a strong doubt, and unquestionably even the doubts of such a judge are entitled to the utmost consideration and deference. But, notwithstanding that doubt, it has been since held by Lord Langdale in De Beil v. Thomson, 3 Beav. 469, and by Lord Cottenham in the same case on appeal (see note in 12 Cl. & Fin. 64), that a written memorandum or note made after the marriage of a parol agreement made before the marriage would be sufficient within the statute; the former referring to Lord Harcourt's opinion in Hodgson v. Hutchenson, and the latter referring not only to that case, but also to Lord Hardwicke's decision in Taylor v. Beech, and to that of Lord Macclesfield in Montacute v. Maxwell. All these opinions must, I think, outweigh Sir W. Grant's doubt." I have already referred to two of the cases on which the Vice-Chancellor relied, and with regard to De Biel v. Thomson and Hammersley v. De Biel I would point out with all respect that Lord Langdale did not decide the case on the ground that a subsequent memorandum would satisfy the statute, but said that the subsequent letter was either a sufficient note to satisfy the statute or a sufficient adoption of an ante-nuptial contract purporting to have been entered into by his sons in writing on his behalf; and, further, that Lord Cottenham in Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551, at p. 572, expressly stated that his judgment in Hammersley v. De Biel turned on part performance by acts other than the mere marriage. Except so far, therefore, as the case in Vin. Abr. is an authority, I come to the conclusion that the Vice-Chancellor's judgment was not supported by express authority. On the other hand, in addition to a dictum of Sir William Grant's in Randall v. Morgan, there are three cases of the highest authority which, in my opinion, show that Barkworth v. Young cannot be supported. In Spurgeon v. Collier there was a settlement made after marriage; evidence was tendered of an antecedent parol agreement; the evidence failed, but Lord Northington (1 Eden, at p. 61) says: "Secondly, if proved, it would not better the case. It is admitted that, since the statute, though such promise was made, Dr. Alston could have no remedy. Then the settlement was voluntary, for it could not be compelled. It was made to a person having no right to demand it, for where there is no remedy there is no right. But, if such a parol agreement were to be allowed to give effect to a subsequent settlement, it would be the most dangerous breach of the statute and a violent blow to credit. For any man, on the marriage of a relation, might make such promise, of which an execution never could be compelled against the promisor, and the moment his circumstances failed he would execute a settlement pursuant to his promise and defraud all his creditors." I read this as a clear expression of the Lord Keeper's opinion that such an agreement, although followed by a settlement in pursuance of it, cannot satisfy the statute. In Warden v. Jones creditors filed a bill to set aside a settlement as fraudulent within the statute of Elizabeth. The Lord Chancellor assumed the existence of an antecedent parol agreement, and decided that it was not sufficient to satisfy the statute so as to give consideration to the settlement made after marriage in pursuance of such agreement. Finally, in Trowell v. Shenton, Sir George Jessel says (8 Ch. D., at p. 324): "Some observations were made during the argument as to the effect of a subsequent acknowledgment in writing of a contract, and Barkworth v. Young was referred to in support of the contention that the settlement was for value, though there was no ratification till after the marriage. The answer to this is given by Warden v. Jones, which is subsequent in date to Barkworth v. Young, and therefore, so far as the two are inconsistent, overrules it. Lord Cranworth, there referring to a post-nuptial settlement reciting that it was made in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement, says at p. 85: 'Lord Thurlow decided in Dundas v. Dutens, that such a settlement is good, and on that decision I will only remark that if it be a correct view of the law the whole policy of the statute is defeated. It cannot be enough merely to say in writing that there was a previous parol agreement. It must be proved that there was such an agreement, and to let in such proof is precisely what the statute meant to forbid.' In that short passage the Lord Chancellor disposed of all the other authorities." And at p. 326 of the same report, Cotton, L.J., says: "It was urged that, though no action could be maintained for breach of the agreement, yet the settlement was not to be treated as voluntary. Warden v. Jones appears to me to decide the exact contrary of this contention. The consideration was held to be insufficient in that case, because the Statute of Frauds provided 'that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall be in writing, signed,' &c. Here the question does not turn on the Statute of Frauds, but on Lord Tenterden's Act; but if in one case it is held that a parol contract before marriage cannot support a settlement made after marriage, so here a settlement cannot be supported by an infant's contract of which there is no written confirmation." See also Sugden on Powers, 647-650.

In both of the last cases the court expressly pointed out that there was no recital of any ante-nuptial agreement, and the next question that I have to consider is whether the existence of such a recital makes any difference. In my opinion it does not. The decision of the courts that a post-nuptial settlement is not supported by an ante-nuptial parol agreement involves the proposition that no post-nuptial settlement can by itself satisfy the statute. It is the date of execution, not the contents of the document, that is material. Recitals may in some cases raise a case of estoppel, but they cannot affect the construction of a statute, nor can the same document be at one and the same time an agreement within and an agreement not within the statute, according as it is impeached by a settlor or his creditors. The question, What is an agreement sufficient to satisfy the statute? must be answered in the same way in all cases. Further, I come to the same conclusion on the construction of the statute. Section 4 enacts "that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." An agreement or memorandum or note thereof to satisfy the statute must, in my opinion, be reduced into writing and signed before the marriage. True that the statute does not render the agreement void or illegal, but it renders written evidence of it indispensable: Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467, at p. 488. An agreement which a man cannot be compelled to perform is a voluntary agreement. He cannot be compelled to perform the ante-nuptial agreement, because it is parol, nor the post-nuptial, because it is founded on a past consideration, and fails, therefore, to possess that essential part of a contract—the consideration for value—for it is well settled that a past consideration will not support a present promise, and the contract in consideration of marriage differs from contracts for sale, within sub-sections 4 and 17 of the statute, as to which it has been held that the agreement must be signed before action (Lucas v. Dixon, 37 W. R. 370, 22 Q. B. D. 357), because the marriage is performed once for all and is irrevocable. But in contracts for sale the consideration continues, for, if the whole purchase-money has not been paid, the balance unpaid remains a consideration at the date of the contract, and if the whole has been paid, the purchaser can recover it back if the contract is repudiated. I do not forget that the post-nuptial agreement here is under seal, but this is immaterial for the present purpose, for equity will not aid a voluntary covenant by specific performance (Jefferys v. Jefferys, Cr. & Ph. 138). and Mr. Clerke is claiming the fund in specie, not damages for breach of covenant.

Is there, then, any authority that prevents my holding in accordance with my own opinion? It is very doubtful whether Dundas v. Dutens, amounts to more than a dictum. It is certainly a mere dictum as reported in Vesey. "If the husband made an agreement that he would settle, and then in fraud of that agreement got married, would not he be bound by it? I thought there was a case in point for that. What the settlement might be if made upon himself after marriage is another question. But in Eq. Cas. Ab." (which I apprehend is the case of Montacute v. Maxwell, which I have referred to), "where there was an agreement before marriage, and the father drew the man in and was privy to his having married without any execution, and then refused to execute, relief was given. If in this case there was an agreement before marriage, and afterwards he drew her in to be married, and then refused to perform it, it appears to me to be that kind of fraud against which this court will relieve. If there is a parol agreement for a settlement upon marriage, after marriage a suit upon the ground of part performance would not do, because the statute is expressed in that manner; but is there any case, where in the settlement the parties recite an agreement before marriage, in which it has been considered as within the statute?" And Sir William Grant so treats it in Randall v. Morgan, and although Lord Ellenborough calls it a decision in Shaw v. Jakeman, 4 East 201, he refers to the report in Vesey, where it is not more than a dictum. In 2 Cox Ch. Cas. 235 it is reported as a decision; but I think Vesey's report, supported as it is by Sir William Grant, is the more trustworthy. I have considered this in detail, because, if Lord Thurlow decided the point, Lord Cranworth's dictum could not overrule it, and it would, of course, be binding on me. But I think that it is only dictum, and that it is outweighed by the dicta of Lord Cranworth in Warden v. Jones, 2 De G. & J., at p. 85. "This most reasonable construction of the statute is consistent with the decision of Lord Cottenham in Lassence v. Tierney, and though the precise question does not arise in the case now before me, I have thought it right to advert to these authorities, in order that it may not be thought I decide the present case merely on the ground that it is distinguishable from Dundas v. Dutens. I incline to think that, even if this settlement had contained a statement that it was made in pursuance of a previous ante-nuptial parol agreement, I should still have considered it, as I now consider it, void against creditors." This was approved by the Court of Appeal in Trowell v. Shenton and by Lord St. Leonards in his book on Powers, 650. Mr. Clerke placed great reliance on a passage in Lord Selborne's judgment in Codrington v. Lindsay, 21 W. R. 182, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 578. "What, then, are the considerations for the settlement of the Bank of Bengal shares, and the £6,213 Consols, and £4,562 reduced stock, expressed on the face of the deed of the 31st of March, 1850? First, I find in it an express recital that upon the treaty for the marriage it was agreed (which I take to mean between the plaintiff's father and her husband) that as well the two several sums of £6,213 Consols and £4,562 reduced stock (which had been then actually transferred into the names of the trustees of the deed), as also all the interest of the plaintiff or of her husband in her right under the settlement of the 17th of August, 1824 (i.e., her interest in the 80,000 S.B.) should be settled upon the trusts and in the manner thereinafter mentioned. This recital cannot, as against any person not a party to it, alter the consideration or the true character of the deed, or supply the want of other evidence of a binding ante-nuptial contract: Warden v. Jones. But I apprehend it is good evidence as between the father and the husband, at all events, of the terms of and the considerations for their agreement inter se." In that case, as well as in Battersbee v. Farrington, there was an express recital of an ante-nuptial contract contained in the post-nuptial settlement. The true meaning of Lord Selborne's statement is illustrated by Sir Thomas Plumer's judgment in Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst, at p. 113: "On the first question (which I am not now to decide) the distinction, I apprehend, is that against all persons claiming under the settlor the recital is conclusive; but it would be difficult to maintain that a recital in a post-nuptial settlement of ante-nuptial articles, of the existence of which there is no distinct proof, would be binding on creditors. Such a doctrine would give to every trader a power of excluding his creditors by a recital in a deed to which they are not parties. In this instance there appears no motive for the recital if untrue; a recital in a deed executed before the party engaged in trade, when he was not indebted, and twenty years prior to his death." The meaning is that, although the post-nuptial settlement does not satisfy the statute, the recital of an ante-nuptial contract may bind the party making it and volunteers claiming under him by estoppel, and Mr. Clerke has accordingly argued that the trustee in bankruptcy stands in no better position than the bankrupt, and is as much bound by estoppel as the bankrupt himself would be. Now, it is no doubt true as a general proposition that the trustee in bankruptcy stands in the bankrupt's shoes, but this is subject to several exceptions. It is only necessary here to mention three—(1) under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act; (2) under the statutes of Elizabeth; and (3) in cases of fraud. In the first two cases the trustee has a paramount right by statute which overrides the title of the bankrupt and persons claiming under settlements made by him. The third exception is not peculiar to the trustee in bankruptcy, but is of more general application. It is conceded that the first exception is excluded in the present case, both by the terms of the section itself and by the periods that have elapsed. I will deal with the second exception presently. The third exception may be stated in Baron Martin's words in Horton v. Westminster Improvement Commissioners, 7 Exch. 780, at p. 791: "The meaning of estoppel is this—that the parties agree for the purpose of a particular transaction to state certain facts as true, and that, so far as regards that transaction, there shall be no question about them. But the whole matter is opened when the statement is made for the purpose of concealing an illegal contract, for persons cannot be allowed to escape from the law by making a false statement." Again, in Doe v. Lloyd, 5 Bing. N. C. 741, the heir-at-law of a grantor was allowed on this ground to impeach the validity of his ancestor's deed. To return to the second exception; the statute 13 Eliz. avoids voluntary settlements made with a view to defeat or defraud creditors. When the husband entered into the covenant of the 8th of February, 1873, he was entitled jure mariti to the property in question, which was a reversionary interest in personalty, subject only to the contingency of his wife's surviving him before he had reduced it into possession. By that settlement he expressly provided that his property should be withdrawn from his creditors in case he became a bankrupt. It is therefore fraudulent within the statute of Elizabeth, according to the case of In re Pearson, Ex parte Stephens, the authority of which is not affected by In re Detmold, Detmold v. Detmold, which was the case of a marriage settlement, while In re Pearson was a voluntary settlement, and is therefore on all fours with the present case. Mr. Clerke argued that In re Pearson stood alone, and was wrongly decided, but I am not aware that it has ever been doubted, and it is right that I should follow it. He also cited Montefiore v. Behrens, but the reasoning on which the Master of the Rolls proceeded in that case is inapplicable to the present; he put it on the ground that the fund was the wife's property, and that she was entitled to enforce her equity to a settlement. But here there was no such right in the wife, because the property was a contingent reversionary interest in personalty (see Osborn v. Morgan, 9 Hare 432), and she was dead long before the fund fell into possession, and the right is, of course, personal to her. I am of opinion, therefore, that the trustees in bankruptcy would not be bound by estoppel if any such arose. But I am further of opinion that the recital is not sufficiently precise to create an estoppel. It is quite consistent with the existence of a mere parol agreement; for a pleader might insert the very words of the recital in his defence, and yet plead that such agreement was not in writing, so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Even if the recital had been of an agreement in writing, it would have been open to the trustee in bankruptcy to adduce evidence to show that it was untrue, and, if it were untrue, it would be fraudulent within Baron Martin's judgment cited above. It has not been argued that the deed of the 25th of October, 1897, has any independent validity or effect, and the other points made on this deed and otherwise in the case do not arise in the view that I take of the matter. I therefore declare that the official receiver is (subject to procuring letters of administration to the estate of Charlotte Fanny Bourke) entitled to her share in the testator's estate.

TAYLOR v. HOWARD. (a.)

Will—Annuity to wife "so long as she remains unmarried"—Sum not exhausted—Death of wife unmarried—Duration.

Where a testator desired his executor to set aside £200 and thereout pay the testator's wife the sum of £3 monthly so long as she remained unmarried or until the sum of £200 became exhausted, the payment to cease on her marrying again, and where the wife died without remarrying before the sum was exhausted,

Held, that her executrix was entitled to the balance.

Rishton v. Cobb, 5 My. & Cr. 145, at p. 152, followed.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executrix of the widow of one William Howard, who, by his will dated the 3rd of February, 1899, appointed the defendant executor and trustee thereof, and, after making sundry bequests, provided as follows: "I desire my said executor and trustee to set aside £200, and thereout pay to my said wife, the said Amelia Howard, the sum of £3 monthly so long as she remains unmarried or until the said sum of £200 becomes exhausted, the said payment of £3 monthly to cease on my said wife marrying again."

The testator died on the 8th of May, 1899, and his wife on the 31st of May, 1900, without having married again.

The sum of £200 not having been exhausted, the plaintiff took out this summons to have it determined whether she was entitled to the balance.

S. Dickinson, for the plaintiff.—The interest of the wife was not determined by her death, but would only have been determined by the act of marriage: see the dictum of Lord Cottenham in Rishton v. Cobb, 5 My. & Cr. 145, at p. 152, "Her interest would not have been determinable by her death, but (independently of the forfeiture upon alienation) only by her ceasing to be single and unmarried. This is different from a gift of dividends during widowhood. The state of widowhood must determine with the life of the widow; but the gift, so long as the legatee shall remain single and unmarried, must be considered as requiring the act of marriage to determine the interest."

G. E. Fryer, for the defendant.—The observations of Lord Selborne in In re Boddington, 32 W. R. 448, 25 Ch. D. 685, at p. 689, show that the dictum in Rishton v. Cobb cannot be supported.

FARWELL, J.—I understand Lord Selborne to mean that Rishton v. Cobb can be supported on the ground stated by Lord Cottenham in that case. The Court of Appeal did not, and in my opinion could not, overrule it, and it is binding on me. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to the balance of the £200.

SMITH v. BOON. (a.)

Highway—Light locomotive—Excessive speed of driving on highway—"Having regard to the traffic on the highway"—Motor tricycle—Light Locomotives on Highways Order, 1896, art. 4 (1).

Article 4 (1) of the Light Locomotives on Highways Order, 1896, provides that a person driving or in charge of a light locomotive when used on a highway shall "not drive the light locomotive at any speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic on the highway."

Held, that, in order to constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary to prove that any vehicle or person was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected by the speed at which the accused was driving the light locomotive.

Case stated by justices of Surrey sitting at Kingston-upon-Thames.

An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant, charging that on the 20th of November, 1900, at 10.45 a.m., he drove a light locomotive at a speed greater than was reasonable and proper having regard to the traffic on a certain highway, to wit, High-street, Esher.

It was proved by a police-constable that at the time and on the day in question the appellant drove his motor tricycle at about eighteen miles an hour on the above highway. The police-constable admitted that he "guessed" the rate of speed and stated that he saw a Carter Paterson's van and a butcher's cart on the highway. Another witness said that he could not count twenty during the time it took the appellant to drive 300 yards. He thought the appellant was driving twenty miles an hour. Both witnesses admitted that the traffic on the highway was neither interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, nor affected by reason of the speed at which the appellant drove his motor tricycle.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant denied that he was driving at the before-mentioned speed, and stated that he was driving at a speed of eight miles an hour. There was no evidence before the justices that any vehicle or person using the highway was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected by reason of the speed at which the motor tricycle was driven, and it was contended by the appellant that in the absence of such evidence the offence charged was not made out.

The justices found as a fact that the appellant was driving his motor tricycle at a speed of from eighteen to twenty miles an hour, and decided that such speed was excessive having regard to the traffic on the highway, and that the appellant's contention was ill-founded in law. They fined the appellant £5.

Roger Wallace, K.C. (Samuel Fleming with him), for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in finding that the speed at which the appellant drove the motor tricycle was greater than was reasonable or proper having regard to the traffic on the highway because there was no evidence that anyone was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected by the speed at which the appellant was driving the motor tricycle: see Stinson v. Browning, 14 W. R. 395, 35 L. J. M. C. 152, and Hill v. Somerset, 51 J. P. 742.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The justices were right in convicting the appellant. They found that the motor tricycle was going at a speed of eighteen to twenty miles an hour. That is a question of fact. They then decided that that speed was excessive having regard to the traffic on the highway. The appellant contends that there must be direct evidence that some person was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected by the speed at which he was driving his motor tricycle. I understand that contention to mean that there must be some direct evidence that some trap has been forced off the highway or some poor old woman crossing the road has been obliged to turn back hurriedly—in fact, that there must be something amounting to a risk of accident, if not actual accident, before there can be a conviction. The words of the regulation "having regard to the traffic on the highway" mean the traffic on the road, and not the traffic within a few yards of the locomotive. The magistrates were justified in considering that a speed of eighteen to twenty miles in High-street, Esher, was excessive having regard to the traffic on that road.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in an action tried before Kennedy, J., sitting without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, a firm of jobbers on the London Stock Exchange, to recover from the defendant, an outside broker, the sum of £186 as damages for breach of contract in refusing to take delivery of 210 Louisville shares under the following circumstances:

The defendant had dealt with a firm of brokers who had been declared defaulters on the Stock Exchange before the transaction was completed.

The defendant, who was not a member of the Stock Exchange, had for some time prior to the date of the contract sued on—the 12th of December, 1899—been employing Messrs. E. Preston & Co., members of the London Stock Exchange, as his brokers.

They had opened for him on the 12th of December 210 Louisville shares and had received instructions to carry over for him to the end December account.

Messrs. E. Preston & Co. accordingly bought from the plaintiffs for the end of December account, but having other orders to purchase Louisvilles, they lumped the orders together and purchased in all 360 Louisvilles, and of these they apportioned or intended to apportion to the defendant in their books 210, to the delivery of which under their contract with the plaintiffs they would have become entitled on the 29th of December.

On the 15th of December, in consequence of the failure of certain clients (other than the defendant) to fulfil their obligations, Preston & Co. failed, and were declared defaulters.

On the 16th and 18th of December, Mr. L. Gibbs, a member of the plaintiffs' firm, saw the defendant in regard to the shares. The latter told Mr. Gibbs that his account with Preston & Co. was closed when the firm failed.

On the 29th of December Mr. Gibbs tendered 210 Louisvilles to the defendant and was refused acceptance. The shares were then sold on the Stock Exchange and the plaintiffs thereupon sued the defendant for £186, the difference between the contract price and the selling price on that day.

The plaintiffs asserted a right to sue the defendant as the undisclosed principal of Preston & Co. upon the contract made by that firm with the plaintiffs in respect of 210 out of the 360 Louisville shares which formed the subject of their contract. They alleged a custom on the Stock Exchange by which a broker, who was instructed by two or more clients to purchase shares in the same undertaking to be carried over from time to time, lumped the orders together and purchased the shares in his own name from a jobber; and they contended that this custom created a contractual relationship between the jobber and the broker's clients so as to enable the former to sue the latter in the event of the broker's failure to meet his liabilities. The defendant denied this right altogether and said, further, that the effect of rule 177 of the Stock Exchange rules and regulations was that the "hammer" price fixed on the failure of Preston & Co., was binding between him and the plaintiffs, in which case, as there had then been no fall in the price of the shares since the contract, nothing would have been due from the defendant to the plaintiffs.

Kennedy, J., in giving judgment, said that with regard to rule 177 in his opinion it only affected members of the Stock Exchange, and the defendant could not, therefore, take advantage of it, and this view of the construction and effect of the rule was subsequently approved of by the Court of Appeal in the case of Levitt & Thornton v. Hamblet, 17 Times L. R. 307. But the learned judge held that there was no privity of contract between the defendant and the plaintiffs and that the alleged custom of the Stock Exchange, even if it could be shown to have any existence, could not avail the plaintiffs in this action. He therefore entered judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and G. A. H. Branson, for the plaintiffs.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and E. Morten, for the defendant.

[A considerable discussion took place as to whether the custom had been sufficiently proved at the trial, and ultimately Mr. Rufus Isaacs said he would prefer to admit that it had not been proved. He asked in these circumstances that the case might be remitted to the Commercial Court to be retried. Mr. Herbert Reed asked their lordships not to do this.]

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I have not the slightest doubt in this case that the custom necessary to be proved for the plaintiffs to succeed was not proved at the trial, assuming, that is, that it exists, and I see no reason why it should not, for it seems to me a very reasonable one. I have not therefore to say that it could not be proved, but simply that it was not proved. The plaintiffs appealed against the judgment of Kennedy, J., who, so far as I can read his judgment, has not found the custom proved. In these circumstances I and my learned brothers think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, but the court expressly desires to state that in dismissing this appeal it is not to prejudice the point being raised again in another action as to the existence or non-existence of this custom upon the Stock Exchange as regards dealing in blocks of shares similar to the blocks in the present case. We decide this case, therefore, on the ground that the alleged custom has not been proved, and desire to say nothing to prejudice the raising again of the question of existence or non-existence of the custom, though not in this action.

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Order on insurance company—Appeal—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 5; Sched. II. (4).

There is no appeal to the Court of Appeal from the refusal of a county court judge to make an order on an insurance company under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Appeal from an order of the judge of the Dudley County Court in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation met with an accident while in the employment of John Henry Whittaker & Co., who had insured against liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act with the Life and Health Assurance Association.

After the applicant had obtained an award under the Act, the employers became bankrupt.

The applicant thereupon took out a summons under section 5 of the Act calling upon the insurance company to show cause why they should not pay the sum due to him under the award into the Post Office Savings Bank.

The county court judge refused to make an order against the insurance company, on the ground that there had been a breach of a condition in the policy by the employers which avoided it.

The applicant appealed.

J. R. Atkin, for the insurance company, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay.—The only jurisdiction which the Court of Appeal has over matters under the Workmen's Compensation Act is given by Schedule II., par. 4. The schedule begins thus: "The following provisions shall apply for settling any matter which under this Act is to be settled by arbitration." And par. 4 says, "The Arbitration Act, 1889, shall not apply to any arbitration under this Act; but an arbitrator may, if he thinks fit, submit any question of law for the decision of the county court judge, and the decision of the judge on any question of law, either on such submission, or in any case where he himself settles the matter under this Act, shall be final, unless within the time and in accordance with the conditions prescribed by rules of the Supreme Court either party appeals to the Court of Appeal." This gives an appeal on questions of law raised as to the liability of an employer to make compensation, but it does not give an appeal on questions as to the liability of an insurance company under section 5. Rules 51, 52, and 53 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, provide the machinery for giving effect to section 5. Rule 53 says that the procedure on a summons under the section shall be the same as if the applicant had issued a garnishee summons against the insurers. This brings into play rules 5-13 of ord. 26*a* of the County Court Rules. A garnishee proceeding cannot be said to be a "matter which under this Act is to be settled by arbitration." The schedule does not cover this case, and therefore no appeal lies.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. Tindal Atkinson, for the applicant.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case everything in dispute between the workman and his masters has been adjudicated upon by an award made in the workman's favour, and the workman is now proceeding under section 5, which provides a sort of equitable execution. Any dispute that arises under this section is a dispute between the workman and a third party. Now Schedule II. begins by saying that the provisions contained therein "shall apply for settling any matter which under this Act is to be settled by arbitration." Paragraph 4 provides that there may be an appeal from the decision of the county court judge on questions of law. That must mean an appeal on questions of law arising in matters which under the Act are to be settled by arbitration. In my opinion matters to be settled under the Act by arbitration are disputes between workmen and masters, and this dispute between a workman and a third party is not the subject-matter of arbitration under the Act. It follows that no appeal is given in this case by the schedule, and if not given by the schedule, there is no appeal at all.

COLLINS, L.J.—Section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act says that any question as to the liability to pay compensation under the Act is to be settled by arbitration in accordance with Schedule II. Schedule II. gives, under certain circumstances, an appeal to this court on questions of law. The present application does not raise any question as to liability to pay compensation, it is rather an application ancillary to the recovery of an amount as to which the liability has been ascertained. It is not necessary to say whether an appeal may not lie to the Divisional Court. But there is no appeal to this court.

O'Brien v. O'Brien, [1896] 2 I. R. 459, not followed.

By the will dated the 10th of November, 1853, of Frances Bilham, who died on the 23rd of December, 1857, the testatrix gave one-third of the income of a money fund to her daughter Mary for her life, and after her death one-third of the capital to the children of such daughter whom she might leave her surviving who had attained or who should attain twenty-one, share and share alike. The testatrix made a similar gift to her daughter Charlotte and her children, and also to her daughter Emily and her children. There followed a gift over in these terms: "And in case of the decease of any or either of my said three daughters without leaving any lawful issue them or her surviving who then had attained or hereafter live to attain the age of twenty-one years, then I give the dividends and interest of the share of the said stocks and moneys hereby given to my said daughter so dying unto my surviving daughters in like manner as the dividends and interest hereinafter given to them for their respective lives. And after their decease I give the captital, stock, and moneys aforesaid unto and amongst the children of my said surviving daughters who may then have attained or shall thereafter live to attain the age of twenty-one years, such children taking amongst them the share in such stock and moneys only in which their parent had an interest." Then there was an ultimate gift over on the death of all her daughters without any of them having lawful issue who should have attained or should live to attain twenty-one in favour of her brother's children.

Charlotte died on the 1st of January, 1888, leaving two children, both of whom attained twenty-one, but died on the 8th of August, 1895, and the 5th of August, 1900, respectively, both testate.

Mary died on the 25th of October, 1899, leaving two children, both of whom survive and have attained twenty-one.

Emily died on the 9th of December, 1900, without leaving any children her surviving, but one daughter died in her lifetime having attained twenty-one.

The question raised by the summons was, who was entitled to the one-third share whereof the dividends and interest were given by the will to Emily for life?

Borthwick, for persons interested under the residuary gift.

Crossfield, for the children of Mary.

Alfred Whitaker, for the representatives of the two children of Charlotte.

Bovill, for the representatives of the daughter of Emily.

(a.) Reported by H. CLAUGHTON SCOTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

JOYCE, J., after stating the facts, proceeded: Whatever the effect might have been of this will in the absence of the ultimate gift over, it is clear, having regard if necessary to the ultimate gift, that the word "surviving" with respect to daughters in the gift over cannot be read in its literal or natural sense: Waite v. Littlewood, 21 W. R. 131, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 70; Wake v. Varah, 24 W. R. 21, 621, 2 Ch. D. 348. But the shares being all settled, the actual decision of the Court of Appeal in Lucena v. Lucena, 7 Ch. D. 255, does not apply.

There was no actually surviving daughter of the testatrix at the date of the death of Emily, and the only one who survived by her children or issue was Mary. The case is precisely that put by Cotton, L.J., in Lucena v. Lucena, 26 W. R. 254, 7 Ch. D. 255, at p. 270. Under the circumstances of the present case it is, I think, immaterial whether the survivorship be by children or issue. The decision of the Irish Court in the case of O'Brien v. O'Brien, [1896] 2 I. R. 459, was very properly pressed upon me. The very voluminous judgments in that case contain many passages the reasoning of which I am unable to follow, and with other passages I cannot agree. By deciding in accordance with the opinion of Cotton, L.J., as expressed in the report of Lucena v. Lucena, 7 Ch. D., at p. 270, I am doing less violence to the words the testatrix has used than I should do if I followed O'Brien v. O'Brien and read "surviving" merely as "others," without considering whether the other daughters did or not survive in any sense of the word. The result is that in my judgment the children of Mary are alone entitled to the one-third of which Emily received the income during her life.

PRIOR v. MOORE. (a.)

Will—Longest period allowed by law — Lives of all persons living at date of testator's death—Uncertainty —Perpetuity.

A trust to endure until the period of twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of all persons living at the death of the settlor is void, on account of the uncertainty of its duration.

Adjourned summons.

Martha Mary Moore, by her will dated the 27th of September, 1897, bequeathed the sum of £500 New Consols upon trust to apply the dividends thereof in maintaining and keeping in a state of proper repair, condition, and protection the tomb of her brother in Central Africa "for the longest period allowed by law —that is to say, until the period of twenty-one years from the death of the last survivor of all persons who shall be living at my death," and subject to that trust the testatrix directed that the sum should fall into and devolve as part of her residuary estate.

She died on the 3rd of January, 1898, and her will was proved by the executors and trustees thereof on the 22nd of February in the same year.

The present summons was taken out by the trustees of the will against the legatee for the determination of several questions, including the question whether the above-mentioned legacy was valid and effectual.

Hughes, K.C., and S. Dickinson, for the trustees.—This gift is not void as a perpetuity, nor for uncertainty, nor as against public policy. The rule against perpetuities was not settled by Thellusson v. Woodford, 11 Ves. 112, and was not really decided until Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Cl. & Fin. 372, at p. 423. It has always been considered that any number of lives may be taken. Pownall v. Graham, 33 Beav. 242, shows that the gift is not void for uncertainty.

Younger, K.C., and H. Fellows, for the defendant, the residuary legatee.—The gift is not only void for uncertainty, but also as offending against the rule against perpetuities: Thellusson v. Woodford. In re Dean, 41 Ch. D. 552, 37 W. R. Dig. 206, shows that the rule against perpetuities must be taken as a whole, and the lives referred to must be those of specified persons. [JOYCE, J., referred to Pettingall v. Pettingall, 11 L. J. Ch. 176.]

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., and Method, for another defendant, referred to Pirbright v. Salway, (1896) W. N. 86.

Hughes, K.C., replied.

JOYCE, J.—I need not go into the question whether or not this bequest is void for perpetuity, because I am of opinion that it is void for uncertainty, and I so hold.

REX v. GROOM AND OTHERS (JUSTICES OF HARWICH). (a.)

Licensing law — General annual licensing meeting — Adjournment beyond September — Certiorari — Aggrieved person—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 3—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), s. 11.

Licensing justices, in counties other than Middlesex and Surrey, have no power to hold a meeting, or an adjourned meeting, for the purpose of hearing original applications for the grant or renewal of licences after September.

Section 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870, which enables the justices to adjourn a meeting or an adjourned meeting beyond September where "the applicant for the grant or renewal of a certificate has, through inadvertence or misadventure, failed to comply with any of the requirements" of the Act, does not enable them to adjourn an application for an alehouse licence.

A brewer having licensed premises in the district within which a licence has been granted, who has opposed the grant of the licence and the order confirming the same, is a person aggrieved by such order, and is entitled to a writ of certiorari ex debito justitiæ.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash an order of justices confirming an alehouse licence.

At the adjourned general annual licensing meeting for the borough of Harwich, held on the 25th of September, 1900, an application was made by one White for the grant of an alehouse licence in respect of an hotel which it was proposed to build.

The notice to the superintendent of police of the district, which by section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872, is required to be served twenty-one days before the application is made, was served upon the superintendent two days late, owing, as it appeared, to the sudden illness of the person entrusted with the duty of serving it.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The justices adjourned the application until the 23rd of October, in order that a fresh notice might be served.

When the application was renewed on the 23rd of October Messrs. Cobbold & Co. and Messrs. Daniel & Sons opposed the application, and raised the objection that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear applications for licences after the 30th of September.

The objection was overruled. Whereupon the representatives of Messrs. Cobbold & Co. and Messrs. Daniel & Sons left the court.

On the 6th of November the licence was confirmed by the confirming justices, before whom the same objection was taken, which was again overruled.

Messrs. Cobbold & Co. and Messrs. Daniel & Sons then moved for and obtained the present rule.

Messrs. Cobbold & Co. and Messrs. Daniel & Sons were brewers and owned licensed premises within the district in which the house in respect of which the application was made was situated.

C. E. Jones showed cause.—The writ of certiorari is not one granted as of right, and it is necessary for the applicants to show that they are persons aggrieved by the decision which is sought to be quashed. The justices have power to adjourn applications for licences after September. It is true that section 3 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, provides that the general annual licensing meetings and all adjournments thereof are to be held in counties other than Middlesex and Surrey in the months of August and September, but that provision is directory only. Moreover, the justices have power to adjourn by virtue of section 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870, which provides that "where an applicant for the grant or renewal of a certificate has, through inadvertence or misadventure, failed to comply with any of the preliminary requirements of the principal Act or this Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, the justices may" postpone the consideration of the application to an adjourned meeting: Reg. v. Justices of Denbigh, 59 J. P. 708; Reg. v. Justices of Anglesea, 59 J. P. 743, 44 W. R. Dig. 89; Reg. v. Nicholson, 48 W. R. 52, [1899] 2 Q. B. 455; and Webber v. Justices of Birkenhead, 61 J. P. 664.

Rawlinson, K.C. (E. Wild with him), in support of the rule.—Having regard to section 3 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, an adjourned meeting for granting licences cannot be held after September: Reg. v. Justices of West Riding, 18 W. R. 259, L. R. 5 Q. B. 33. Section 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870, does not apply to alehouse licences, but only to certificates granted under the Acts of 1869 and 1870. The applicants for the rule have ample interest in the subject-matter of the decision, being not only residents in the district but proprietors of licensed premises situated close to the premises in respect of which the licence was sought.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I have come with great regret to the conclusion that we are obliged to make this rule absolute. I confess that if I could have seen my way to decide against persons who are only rivals in trade and who, having taken an objection of a highly technical character, namely, that a notice which did not affect them was served two days too late, then walked out of the room, I say, if I could have decided against them I should certainly have done so. But if I were to decide that this meeting could be adjourned in order that a fresh notice might be given for an October meeting, it would be taken to be a decision of this court that an adjourned meeting for receiving an original notice can be held in the month of October. Speaking for myself, although I have always felt great difficulty in expressing an opinion on the licensing Acts in the condition in which they now are, I think that that would be going too far.

Now it is quite clear, I think, that the language of the statute of 1828 does contemplate with regard to alehouses, by section 3, that the general annual licensing meeting and every adjournment thereof shall be held in the months of August and September in counties other than Middlesex and Surrey. Therefore there is a primâ facie direction that the work is to be got through during that time.

Now it is contended that there is a power to adjourn an adjourned meeting, apart from what I will call the inadvertence clause, under section 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870. It seems to me that we have this to guide us. If it had been competent to the magistrates to sit in October, it would not have been necessary to give the very specific directions that were given in the case of Reg. v. Justices of West Riding. There it was laid down in consequence of these provisions that the magistrates must so adjust their meetings that a notice can be given of twenty-one days for the adjournment, or, in other words, it is to be a meeting at which an original notice can be given. I think that that does show that the provision as to the period for holding the meetings is more than a mere direction. It is a statutory enactment as to the holding of an adjournment. Therefore, apart from any other section, I should come to the conclusion that a meeting—we will call it an adjourned meeting, if you like—to receive a new notice could not be held in the month of October.

Then comes section 11 of the Act of 1870. That section allows an adjournment on such terms as the justices think proper in the case of an application for the grant or renewal of a certificate. If I could have seen my way to hold that that section was attracted to the Alehouse Act, 1828, I should have been glad to have come to the conclusion that that power was also given. It is quite true that by section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872, the notices to be given under the earlier Acts are to be given in pursuance of the provisions of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. But it seems to me that that is only an alteration of the notices, and if it were intended to make section 11 apply to every case, we should not have found the words "grant or renewal of the certificate," which are the words with which the section begins.

Then, in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Denbigh, which at first sight seemed to be an authority, there is first the doubt (it is a very short report) as to whether or not the court did not think it came within section 42 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1872, being a question of renewal; and, secondly, it is possible that as the proceedings were by mandamus the court may have thought that that made a difference. That is the view taken by Ridley, J., in the case of Webber v. Justices of Birkenhead, to which we have also been referred.

On the question of the person aggrieved, that there was no real grievance by this notice not being served I have no doubt. But that is not the way in which we must consider whether a person is aggrieved. The person aggrieved means the person who has an interest in the decision which is given, which entitles him to come and ask for a certiorari. Now this point was taken by the brewers at the October meeting, and was overruled. It was taken again at the confirming meeting, and was overruled. It would be too strong, after the case of Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, 18 W. R. 166, L. R. 5 Q. B. 87, 466, to say that the person in that case was not entitled to get certiorari.

STIFF (Appellant) v. BILLINGTON (Respondent). (a.)

Game—"Entering or being, in the daytime, upon any land in search or pursuit of game"—Game Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32), s. 30.

By section 30 of the Game Act, 1831, it is unlawful for any person to trespass by entering or being, in the daytime, upon any land in search or pursuit of game.

The appellant, having been convicted under this section, on appeal contended that the conviction was bad, because he went upon the land for the purpose of raising a question of right, and no evidence was offered that he had gone upon the land with intent to search for or kill game at the time.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that the justices were right in convicting, and that the words "search" and "pursuit" in the section could not be limited to searching and pursuing with an intent to kill at the time.

Case stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under section 30 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging him with trespassing on the 30th of September, 1900, by unlawfully being in the daytime upon certain land in the occupation of Henry Gates in search of game.

The respondent was in the employ of Mr. Abraham Barford, who was the owner of sporting rights over certain lands at Sandon, Bedfordshire. The appellant was a keeper in the employment of Mr. Robert Standish Sievier, who was the tenant of and had the right of sporting over the adjoining land. The appellant was seen to come from Mr. Sievier's land on to Mr. Barford's, having with him a retriever dog. The appellant beat the hedge on Mr. Barford's land and the dog searched the whole length of the land. The appellant said he was acting under his master's orders, and he believed that his master wanted him to be caught. Mr. Barford bred pheasants for the purpose of his shooting, and though no nests had been seen on the land in question this season pheasants and game were on the land. The land comprised about sixty acres, divided into four plots. It was a detached portion of Mr. Barford's shooting and was surrounded on three sides by Mr. Sievier's shooting and on the other side by a railway, beyond which Mr. Barford had other shooting. One portion of this land, containing about four acres, was sown with mustard, but it was so sown by the farmer who was the tenant of the land and not by Mr. Barford, who had the sporting rights. The appellant gave evidence, admitting that he went upon the land in question, and stated that he acted upon instructions. He had a retriever dog with him, but denied that he beat the hedge or that his dog hunted.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that there was no evidence that the appellant was in search of game; that it was necessary to prove that he was searching for game for the purpose of killing or taking it; and that the appellant had gone on the land for the purpose of raising the question whether the respondent's employer was entitled to plant the land with mustard for the purpose of attracting pheasants from the adjoining land. No evidence was given by the appellant in support of this last contention.

The justices found as facts: (1) That the appellant trespassed upon the land, and that there was game on the land; (2) that he trespassed in search of game; (3) that there was no evidence of a bonâ fide claim of right; and (4) that, if it was material, he acted under the instruction of his employer. They therefore convicted the appellant.

Section 30 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, provides: "And whereas, after the commencement of this Act game will become an article which may be legally bought and sold, and it is therefore just and reasonable to provide some more summary means than now by law exists for protecting the same from trespassers; be it therefore enacted that if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being, in the daytime, upon any land in search or pursuit of game . . . such person shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, be liable to a fine not exceeding £2." It was also provided that any man tried for such an offence could raise any defence which he could raise in a civil action.

H. M. Sturges, for the appellent.—Before the appellant can be convicted of the offence laid against him under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, the respondent must prove that he was searching for game for the purpose of killing it or reducing it into possession. There is no evidence that he was searching for game either for the one purpose or the other, and, moreover, these proceedings were taken solely with the object of raising a bonâ fide question of right—namely, whether a man has a right to sow mustard seed on his land in order to attract pheasants from his neighbour's land upon his own. I submit the justices ought not to have convicted the appellant, as the the words "search" and "pursuit" in the section are limited to searching and pursuing game on another man's land with an intent to kill at the time.

The following cases were cited: Reg. v. Garnham, 8 Cox Cr. Cas. 451; Reg. v. Head, 1 F. & F. 350; Burrows v. Gillingham, 57 J. P. 423; Philpot v Bugler, 54 J. P. 646; Horn v. Raine, 67 L. J. Q. B. 533, 46 W. R. Dig. 62.

Stimson, for the respondent, was not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case we have nothing to do with Mr. Sievier's laudable efforts to settle the question whether a man has a right to sow mustard seed in order to attract his neighbour's pheasants to come upon his land. The magistrates have found that the appellant trespassed on the land; that there was game on the land; and that the appellant trespassed in search of game. We have been asked to say that the words "search" and "pursuit" in section 30 of the Act of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, are limited to searching and pursuing game with an intent to kill at the time. I think it would be very dangerous for the court to lay down any such limiting rule as to the meaning of those words in the section. The magistrates have found that Stiff was trespassing on the land; that there was game on the land; and that Stiff was there in search of game. On these findings I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to say that the magistrates were wrong in deciding as they have done. The appeal must be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

HAWKINS (Appellant) v. EDWARDS (Respondent). (a.)

Local government — Hackney carriage — Standing or plying for hire—Licensed carriage sent from yard to execute booked order only—Number-plate covered over —Bye-law—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), ss. 38, 68.

A "hackney carriage" within the meaning of section 38 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, is a carriage which is in fact used by the proprietor from time to time for the purpose of standing or plying for hire in any street within prescribed boundaries.

Held, therefore (dismissing the appeal), that the appellant had rightly been convicted for sending out a licensed hackney carriage from his yard to execute only a booked order, without showing the number-plate as required by the bye-law, as, in the opinion of the court, the words of the section, "every wheeled carriage used in standing or plying for hire," were not limited to the period of time during which such carriage was actually standing or plying for hire in the streets, as a hackney carriage remained subject to the bye-laws applicable thereto at all times, so long as the licence was in force.

Appeal by case stated from a decision of justices of Birmingham convicting the appellant under an information preferred by the respondent charging him with that he, being the owner of a hackney carriage with a plate containing the number of the licence fixed thereon, unlawfully and negligently suffered the number-plate of such duly licensed hackney carriage to be concealed from public view when such carriage was being driven for hire, contrary to a bye-law and the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847.

It was proved before the justices that on the 26th of November, 1900, Deeley, who was in the employ of the appellant, drove a carriage which was licensed as a hackney carriage, No. 396, along the Horsefair to the New Street Railway Station, the number-plate outside the carriage being covered over by a piece of black board, which was made to slide into a groove so that the number when the board was over it was not visible. There was a passenger in the carriage. Deeley was not licensed as a driver, and he was called as a witness by the appellant and proved that he received a specific written order from the appellant's manager to take the carriage direct from the appellant's yard to a certain house in Gough-road, Edgbaston, there to call to pick up and take a gentleman who had previously ordered the carriage from there to the New Street Station, and that he (Deeley) had in pursuance of such order gone straight from the appellant's yard to the house and there picked up the gentleman without standing on or plying for hire in any street from the time of leaving the appellant's yard till he was found driving along the Horsefair with the number-plate covered up, the same having been so covered up all the time since the carriage left the yard.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the question was whether the appellant's carriage at the time of, and under the circumstances proved as existing at the time of the alleged offence, was there and then a hackney carriage within the meaning of the said bye-law and sections, and it was argued on the appellant's behalf that on the facts proved the said carriage was not at the time of the alleged offence being used in standing or plying for hire in any street within the prescribed distance, nor was it a carriage standing upon any street within the prescribed distance within the meaning of section 38 of the Towns Police Causes Act, 1847, and that therefore the appellant was entitled to have the case dismissed.

It was contended by the respondent that a carriage when licensed remains subject to the bye-laws during the continuance of the licence; that a proprietor cannot by covering up the number-plate withdraw the carriage from the operation of the bye-laws; and that such a construction would render the bye-laws nugatory and would interfere with the due control by the local authority.

The justices convicted the appellant.

The bye-law in question provided that "every proprietor of a hackney carriage shall cause the number of the licence granted to him in respect of such carriage to be painted or marked" on two separate plates. "He shall cause the first of such plates to be fixed on the outside and the second of such plates on the inside of such carriage in such a position and manner that the number thereon shall be at all time distinctly and plainly visible and legible. He shall not wilfully or negligently cause or suffer any such plate or the number on any such plate to be in any or by any means concealed from public view or to be inverted at any time while such carriage may stand, ply, or be driven for hire."

Section 68 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, under which this bye-law was made, provides that the borough may make bye-laws "for regulating the conduct of proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages, plying within the prescribed distance in their several employments," and for "regulating the manner in which the number of each carriage, corresponding with the number of its licence, shall be displayed."

Section 38 of the same Act provides that "every wheeled carriage, whatever may be its form or construction, used in standing or plying for hire in any street within the prescribed distance, and every carriage standing upon any street within the prescribed distance, having thereon any numbered plate required by this Act to be fixed upon a hackney carriage, or having thereon any plate resembling or intended to resemble any such plate as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of this Act."

William Wills (with whom was Bethune), for the appellant.—The carriage at the time of the alleged offence was not a hackney carriage within the meaning of that term in section 38 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, because it was not at the time being used "in standing or plying for hire in a street," nor was it standing, plying, or being driven for hire within the meaning of the bye-law. "Driving for hire" must mean in the sense in which a cabman takes his horse out to drive any chance customer who may call him. It is unreasonable to put a construction on the Act or bye-law which would prevent a proprietor using a licensed cab for doing exceptional services—as, for instance, sending it to take a person to the railway station at an early hour.

He referred to Case v. Storey, 17 W. R. 802, L. R. 4 Ex. 319; Clarke v. Stanford, 19 W. R. 846, L. R. 6 Q. B. 357.

Hugo Young, K.C., and R. T. M. Berkeley, for the respondent.—Assuming that the appellant's carriage is a hackney carriage, it comes within the bye-law. A carriage becomes a hackney carriage within the meaning of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, when it is used from time to time for the purpose of standing or plying for hire; if, therefore, a man elects to turn his carriage into a hackney carriage, it remains a hackney carriage so long as the licence is in force, and the fact that it was sent out to execute a booked order only, and not to ply for a chance fare, cannot change its character. The control of the local authority is all-important. They have in the case of hackney carriages powers as to disinfection and the like, and if the appellant's contention is right, the moment a hackney carriage enters the proprietor's yard, the number having been removed, the carriage would cease to be a hackney carriage and the inspector would have no right to inspect it.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The general object of the bye-law is to protect the public and give inspectors authority to inspect all hackney carriages within their district. When a man elects to have the privileges attaching to a hackney carriage and takes out a licence in respect thereof, he elects to devote that carriage to the services indicated in the bye-law. If, therefore, the carriage in question was at the time a hackney carriage the conviction must stand, for it is clear that the bye-law applies and the conviction was right. But it was said by the appellant that a licensed carriage was not a "hackney carriage" within the meaning of the Act unless it was "standing or plying for hire in the street," and as the driver of the carriage in question was doing neither one nor the other when charged, the bye-law under which he was said to have committed the alleged offence was not applicable.

Now, in my opinion, the view the justices have taken of the words in section 38 of the Act of 1847 is the right one, for I think that every wheeled carriage that is in fact used from time to time for standing and plying for hire is a hackney carriage within the meaning of that section, and that the words "used in standing or plying for hire" are not limited, as the appellant would have us hold, to the actual time during which such carriage happens to be standing or plying for hire in the street. For these reasons I think the conviction appealed from must be affirmed.

REX v. ROBERTS, ESQ. (AUDITOR).
Ex parte KYLE. (a.)

Weights and measures—Inspector—Resolution by local authority to forego stamping and verification fees—Surcharge by auditor of such fees to inspector—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 47—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 13.

A local authority has no power, under section 13 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889—which section repealed section 47 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878—to order an inspector not to collect the fees specified in the first schedule "for the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and weighing instruments by inspectors of local authorities."

In this case a rule nisi had been granted calling upon Mr. T. H. K. Roberts, the auditor appointed by the Local Government Board to audit the accounts of the county councils in the Eastern Counties Audit District, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove a surcharge of £1 11s. 4d. made by him upon the audit of the accounts of Thomas Kyle, an inspector of weights and measures for the county of Buckingham, for the year ending the 31st of March, 1900.

Section 13 of the Act of 1889 provides as follows: "An inspector of weights and measures may take in respect of the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and weighing instruments the fees specified in the first schedule to this Act, and no others, and no discount shall be allowed, and such inspector shall at all times, not less than once a quarter, as the local authority direct, account for and pay over to the local authority, or as they direct, all fees so taken." In the first schedule to the Act there is a list of charges headed "Fees to be taken on the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and weighing instruments by inspectors of local authorities."

The Bucks County Council, considering that it was in the public interest that the stamping and verifying of weights and measures in their district should be carried out as promptly as possible, passed a resolution to the effect that no fees should be charged by their inspector, Thomas Kyle, who accordingly ceased to collect them, and in the forthcoming balance-sheet no such fees appeared. When the balance-sheets were audited by the Local Government auditor, Mr. Roberts, he drew attention to this omission, and in order to raise the question, whether a local authority had power to forego the fees chargeable under the Weights and Measures Act, surcharged the inspector with a test item of £1 11s. 4d.

The inspector then applied for and obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari calling upon the auditor to show cause why this surcharge should not be quashed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., showed cause on behalf of the auditor.

Macmorran, K.C., and McIntyre supported the rule.—Inspectors are appointed by the local authority under section 43 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and by section 47 the local authority has power to fix the maximum fees which might be taken by the inspector. That section was repealed by section 13 of the Act of 1889, and instead of the maximum fees being fixed by the local authority from time to time as previously, they were now to be a fixed sum. This, however, did not deprive the local authority of the power to remit fees altogether if they were of opinion that the charging of fees was against public policy, on the ground, for example, that it was an obstacle in the way of small tradesmen in bringing up their weights and scales to have them tested. The section was in terms permissive only, and it was clear that the local authority ought to have a discretion in the matter.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We have nothing to do with the policy pursued by the county council in this case. It may be a wise and prudent matter not to insist on payment of fees for the stamping of weights and measures, but our only duty is to interpret the Act of Parliament and see whether the county council has power to remit these fees by instructing their inspector not to take them. In this case it appears that under the resolution of the county council the inspector took no fees for verifying the weights and measures. Then came the audit, and the auditor found no amounts entered as having been received on account of such fees. If the inspector had not paid over money received by him, he would certainly be surcharged, but as a matter of fact no fees having been collected, the auditor proceeded to surcharge the inspector with the amount that he ought to have collected. The important question is: Has the county council under the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, any power to order their inspector to exact no fees? Now in 1878, by the Weights and Measures Act (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), it was provided by section 47 that an inspector under the Act might take in respect of the verification and stamping of weights and measures such fees, not exceeding those specified in the fifth schedule to the Act, as the authority appointing him from time to time might fix. This section and the schedule were repealed by section 13 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, by which the inspector of weights and measures may take in respect of the verification and stamping of weights and measures the fees specified in the first schedule to that Act and no others, and Mr. Macmorran contended that the only effect of that section is to make the standard of fees uniform all over the country and not to take away from the county council the power of omitting those fees altogether. I have been anxious to see whether there was any independent power in the local authority to remit the fees, but Mr. Macmorran has been bound to admit that their power rested alone on section 47 of the Act of 1878, which has now been repealed, and section 13 of the Act of 1889 has been substituted for it, and section 13 has omitted to give them any power to remit the fees, but says that the inspector may take certain fees fixed by the schedule, and no others. Then it is argued that the whole section is optional, because it says the inspector "may" take certain fees, and no others, and that the local authority had, therefore, a discretion whether fees should be taken at all, but if fees were taken, they must be such fees only as are provided in the schedule.

I think, however, that we cannot accede to that contention looking at section 47 of the earlier Act and section 13 of the later one. "May" often means "shall," and I think in the present case it would be difficult to frame any section in which "may" would not be the more appropriate word than "shall." I think, therefore, the option of remitting the fees was taken away from the local authority by section 13.

The only point which remains is that the inspector cannot be surcharged with fees which he never received, but looking at the provisions as to audit in section 247 of the Public Health Act, 1875, I do not think this is a point of substance, for the fees would come within the words "or money which ought to have been brought into account by him." For these reasons the rule must be discharged.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (ON THE RELATION OF THE BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL) AND THE BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. COPELAND. (a.)

Highway—"Drain"—Pouring water from highway on to adjoining land—Easement—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 67.

A pipe whereby rain-water from the surface of a highway is poured on adjoining land is not a "drain" such as is contemplated by section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835.

A right of way over a highway is not a dominant tenement to which an easement to pour rain-water through a pipe from the highway on to adjoining land can be attached.

This was an action tried before Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from stopping up or obstructing an ancient watercourse or flow of water passing from the public highway leading from West Wickham to Beckenham, in the county of Kent, over land of the defendant lying between such highway and West Wickham station, in the parish of West Wickham, and from causing an obstruction to the said highway.

The plaintiffs also claimed damages for the obstruction of and injury to the highway.

The Bromley Rural District Council was the highway authority for the parish of West Wickham, and the aforesaid public highway was under the highway jurisdiction of the said council.

The defendant was the owner of certain lands in the said parish adjacent to the said road and lying between such road and the railway station at West Wickham.

The defendant bought his land about two years prior to the date of this action and caused to be built thereon two houses with gardens which were occupied by his tenants.

At the time the defendant purchased the land there was a pipe or channel passing from the said highway through a hedge and bank that divided the road from the defendant's land.

From the evidence it appeared that at this point there were two old catch-pits, one on either side of the road, connected by an old pipe or culvert under the road.

There was a falling gradient from the south towards the road at this point and a rising gradient from the road towards the north-west, and consequently this point was the lowest in that part of the road.

Prior to 1868 the water from the highway and the gradients found its way into the two old catch-pits and from the western catch-pit by means of the pipe under the highway into the eastern catch-pit and thence to the aforesaid pipe in the bank.

In 1868 the old catch-pit on the west was enlarged, a new catch-pit put on the east side, and these catch-pits were connected by an iron pipe and from the eastern catch-pit stone pipes were put in through the bank.

The defendant obstructed this channel and prevented the flow of rain and storm waters from the highway over his land, contending that there was no watercourse or right of flow over his land, whereas the plaintiffs claimed that there was always an ancient watercourse and natural outlet for the rain and storm waters from the highway over the defendant's land.

The plaintiffs now brought an action claiming an injunction and damages as above stated.

Section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), provides as follows: "And be it further enacted that the said surveyor . . . shall have power to make, scour, cleanse, and keep open all ditches, gutters, drains, or watercourses, and also to make and lay such trunks, tunnels, plats, or bridges as he shall deem necessary in and through any lands or grounds adjoining or lying near to any highway, upon paying the owner or occupier of such lands or grounds, provided they are not waste or common, for the damages which he shall sustain thereby . . ."

Bray, K.C., and Clarke Williams, for the plaintiffs.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

—The plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction asked for. There is ample evidence of the existence of an easement through the pipe on the defendant's land. There is a legal statutory origin and a legal common law origin for this easement in favour of the plaintiffs. Under section 67 of the Highway Act, 1855, a surveyor of highways had power to make drains through adjoining grounds upon payment of compensation to the owners. The very object of the section is to give the surveyor authority to make a drain to carry off the water. This pipe was in fact a drain, and it must be assumed, considering the long uninterrupted user of it, that some arrangement was made between the adjoining owner and the relators or their predecessors. Croft v. Rickmansworth Highway Board, 57 L. J. Ch. 589, 39 Ch. D. 272, 37 W. R. Dig. 84, is no authority against the plaintiffs' contention. The plaintiffs are also entitled at common law by prescription to an injunction on the ground that the public, as the occupiers of the road, have for more than the statutory period enjoyed the privilege of pouring water out of this pipe, and a legal origin ought to be presumed. In dealing with this common law right the two halves of the road must be dealt with differently, because, presumably, the half of the road on the defendant's side belongs to the defendant, and the other half to the owner of the land on the other side. The owner of the land on the other side could claim an easement—if he proved it—to pour water through a pipe in the defendant's land under the road and so on through the bank on to the land on the other side of the bank. That right may be acquired either by his own acts or by the acts of his tenants or occupiers: Ivimey v. Stocker, 14 W. R. 743, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 396. The highway authorities are in the position of occupiers of the roadway for certain purposes. In Rangeley v. Midland Railway Co., 16 W. R 547, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 306, Lord Cairns says, at p. 311, "A public road or highway is not an easement, it is a dedication to the public of the occupation of the surface of the land for the purpose of passing and repassing." In the present case this highway was in the occupation of the highway authority, not as an ordinary tenant, but as possessing a qualified but permanent occupation which is sufficient to found an easement.

G. B. Rashleigh, for the defendant.—The injunction asked for should not be granted. The defendant was lawfully entitled to do what he did. Firstly, the Prescription Act, 1832, does not apply to rights in gross: Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming and Others, 14 W. R. 13, 19 C. B. N. S. 687. Secondly, an owner of land has a right to protect himself from flood-water not brought there by his own act, although by so doing he injures someone else: Nield v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 23 W. R. 60, L. R. 10 Ex. 4. Thirdly, a highway authority may not make use of their rights over the road in such a way as to deprive the adjoining owner of the reasonable use of his land: Vestry of St. Mary, Newington v. Jacobs, 20 W. R. 249, L. R. 7 Q. B. 47. Fourthly, section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, only gives the highway authority a right to carry the water from the highway by a proper drain through the adjoining land, but not to pour it on to such land. The easement claimed is not an easement which the surveyor of highways could have acquired, and therefore not an easement which became vested in the plaintiffs.

Counsel referred to section 11 of the Highway Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61); section 4 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77); and section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73).

Cur. adv. vult.

April 3.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment: In this case the Attorney-General, acting on the relation of the Bromley Rural District Council, and the Bromley Rural District Council have brought an action against the defendant in respect of the interference of the flow of water through a certain pipe which had been put through the bank of the defendant's land. It was not denied that the defendant had obstructed the flow, and the only question for my determination is whether the Attorney-General, on the relation of the plaintiff board, or the plaintiffs' board themselves are entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the flow of water through the pipe in question.

The point of law raised is somewhat novel. It will be convenient in the first instance that I should state the facts which gave rise to it.

There is in the district of the Bromley Rural District Council a road which passes from the Swan Inn at West Wickham north-west in the direction of Beckenham. It is not disputed the road was an ancient highway. The road near the point as to which the question arises passes to the south-west of West Wickham station and runs approximately parallel to the railway, which is in a cutting some little distance to the east. I find upon the evidence before me that prior to the year 1868 there were at the point E on the ordnance plan which was produced in evidence in this case two old catch-pits, one on either side of the road connected by an old pipe or culvert under the road. There is a falling gradient from the south for a distance of upwards of a quarter of a mile to the point E, about one in twenty-five, and a rising gradient from the point E towards the north-west, having a fall of about 1 in 400. The point E is in consequence the lowest point in the road at that part having gradients rising from it in each direction. In addition the natural lie of some part of the land on the west is towards the road.

Prior to the year 1868 the water collecting on the road and running down each gradient in both directions and collecting at the point E would find its way into the two old catch-pits and from the western catch-pit by means of the pipe under the road to the eastern, and then to an old cut in the bank.

In the year 1868 the old catch-pit on the west was enlarged, a new catch-pit put on the east side, and the catch-pits were connected by an iron pipe and from the eastern catch-pit stone pipes of 12in. diameter were put in through the bank. Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence before me to show the existence of an easement for the pouring of water through the pipe on the land of the defendant, assuming the plaintiffs are entitled to claim such an easement.

I have now to consider whether the Bromley Rural District Council or the Attorney-General on their relation can enforce, as against the defendant, the right to continue the flow of water through the pipe in question. It is urged by the plaintiffs that, inasmuch as under the 67th section of the Highway Act, 1835, a surveyor of highways could make drains through adjoining grounds upon payment of compensation to the owners, that this pipe through the bank was in fact a drain, and that I must assume, after the uninterrupted user of so many years, that there had been some arrangement between the adjoining owner and the relators or their predecessors under that section.

This section formed the subject of discussion in the Court of Appeal in the case of Croft v. Rickmansworth Highway Board. That case is not decisive of the point raised before me inasmuch as no question of prescription there arose, but I think that the judgments in the Court of Appeal do show that the only rights which could be lawfully acquired by a surveyor of highways are rights which come within the words of the section. I am of opinion that this pipe through the hedge is not a drain within the meaning of that section. It is true it may be said to drain the water off from the road, but on the other hand it is only a means whereby water is poured from the road on to the surface of the adjoining land, and, in my opinion, it is not a drain such as is contemplated by that section—namely, a drain or watercourse for the conveyance of water to some proper outlet. In addition to claiming by virtue of this section the plaintiffs also base their claim upon common law prescription, on the ground that the public, as the occupiers of the road, had for more than the statutory period enjoyed the privilege of pouring out the water from the pipes, and a passage from the judgment of Lord Cairns in the case of Rangeley v. Midland Railway Co. was cited as supporting the view that a right of way is not an easement and therefore the surface of the road was in occupation of the persons using the road. In my opinion this contention of the plaintiffs cannot be supported. In order to found a claim to an easement of this character there must be a dominant tenement to which the easement can be attached. I can find no authority for the suggestion that a right of way can be considered to be such a dominant tenement for the purpose of having such a right attached to it and there seems to me to be great difficulty in coming to such a conclusion. I think that the relators have not on either ground acquired a legal right to have this particular pipe maintained and, thereby, to discharge the water upon the defendants' land, and for these reasons I am of opinion that the action fails.

FITZPATRICK v. EVANS & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Mine—Person employed by contractor in coal mine—Conditions of employment—Liability of mine owner—"Workman"—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58)—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90) s. 10—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 8.

By section 8 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, the expression "workman" means any person to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applies; and by section 10 of that Act of 1875, a "workman" means "any person who, being a labourer, . . . miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour . . . has entered into or works under a contract with an employer," whether the contract be express or implied.

By the special rules of a colliery, framed under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1875, conditions of employment were made, No. 5 of which was for "drawers and persons working under contractors only," and was as follows: "Every drawer employed by any miner, and every workman or other person employed by a contractor at the colliery, shall, at the request of such miner or contractor, obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and such drawer, workman, or other person shall, in consideration of being employed at the works, be bound, both as between himself and the miner or contractor, and between himself and the owner, by the terms of these conditions."

M. entered into a contract with the owners of the colliery to sink a shaft in their coal mine and to provide the labour for doing so. F., a workman, was engaged by M., and, while engaged upon the said work, was killed by an accident, and the father of the deceased then brought an action against the colliery owners under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, to recover damages for his death.

Held, that, although the above condition created a privity of contract between the mine owners and the deceased workman of the contractor, it was only collateral and in addition to the contract he entered into with M., and that it did not make him a servant or workman of the mine owners within the meaning of section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875; and that, therefore, the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, did not apply.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of his Honour Deputy Judge W. H. Butler, sitting at the county court of St. Helens and Widnes, Lancashire.

The action was brought by one Terence Fitzpatrick under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages from the defendants, colliery proprietors at Haydock, near St. Helens, Lancashire, for the death of his son, John Fitzpatrick, who was killed during sinking operations at one of the defendants' pits.

The defendant company had entered into a contract with one Morris, "a sinker," who entered into a verbal contract to sink and wall the shaft of the said pit at so much a yard, and to provide all the labour and engine winders. The deceased was employed by Morris as a workman, and was paid by him.

The following conditions of employment—so far as material to this case—were issued in the defendants' colliery:—

"Record book of persons employed on the conditions undermentioned:

"Conditions of employment at the collieries and works of Richard Evans & Co. (Limited) . . . for all persons employed at the collieries or works, directly or indirectly.

"The owners of the said colliery and works are hereinafter called the 'employer.' . . .

3. "All other usual and customary terms and regulations which obtain or exist with respect to the employment of workmen and all other persons employed at the colliery, whether expressed in writing or not, shall be and remain in full force and effect as part of the contract between the employer and the workmen or other persons employed.

"For miners and contractors only:

4. "Every miner and contractor employed at the colliery shall, upon engaging any drawer, workman, or other person to work under him, and before employing such drawer, workman, or other person, require such drawer, workman, or other person to obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and inform such drawer, workman, or other person that they are the conditions under which persons are employed at the colliery, and such miner, drawer, workman, and other person respectively shall be bound by such conditions.

"For drawers and persons working under contractors only:

5. "Every drawer employed by any miner, and every workman or other person employed by a contractor at the colliery, shall, at the request of such miner or contractor, obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and such drawer, workman, or other person shall, in consideration of being employed at the works, be bound both as between himself and the miner or contractor, and between himself and the owner, by the terms of these conditions."

At the trial in the county court it was objected on behalf of the defendants that the deceased was not in their employ. Morris, the sinker, in giving evidence said that by his contract with the defendants he had to provide all the labour, and that the deceased was employed and paid by him, and was under his direction and control; and further, that one Cook, the certificated manager of the mine, had no control over the deceased except under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. He also said that if Cook had given him, the contractor, an order relating to the work he would have obeyed the order and would expect his men to do the same. The jury found that the deceased was a workman in the employment of the defendants, and that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and they awarded the plaintiff damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendants now appealed on the ground that the deceased was not a workman in their employment within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and that there was no evidence of such employment or of negligence.

Ruegg, K.C., and S. H. Leonard, for the appellants.—This action was ill-founded. The deceased was employed and paid by the contractor, and was his servant, and not the servant of the defendants. This case comes within the decision in Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal and Fire Brick Co. (Limited), [1898] 2 Q. B. 588, 47 W. R. Dig. 125. Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is necessary that great control must be exercised by the inspector over the work in a mine, but that does not create the relationship of master and servant between the proprietor and the workmen employed by the contractor.

Lush, for the respondent.—Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co. is distinguishable from the present case because by virtue of the control exercised by the defendants, under the conditions of employment, over the deceased the relationship of master and servant arose. The true test of that relationship is control, not payment of wages.

WILLS, J.—This case is not by any means an easy one, and it is one that is, perhaps, on the border line. I think that no substantial distinction can be drawn between this case and that of Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co., except the one upon which Mr. Lush has argued with so much ability, and the question is, as he truly says, whether there is any evidence to go to the jury that the relationship of master and servant existed between the mine owner and the deceased. I should like to dispose at once of the only piece of parol evidence which was relied on—namely, the answer that was given by Morris, the contractor, that if Cook, the manager of the mine, had given him an order relating to the work he would have obeyed such order, and would expect the men under him to obey it. I really think that that comes to nothing if it is properly looked at. No instance was given in which any order had been given which either he or his workmen had obeyed or disobeyed. Probably the same answer would be given by any subcontractor under any ordinary building contract as to the orders of the building owner or the architect.

It is a constant practice in contracts of this kind to reserve power to the persons who are ultimately interested in the work which is being done to interfere, more or less, and to control, to a great extent, both what shall be done and also the manner in which it is to be done, and it cannot be supposed in such cases that the relationship of master and servant exists. There is no evidence that the deceased was the servant of the mine owner. The conditions contained in the "Record book of persons employed on the conditions undermentioned" are no evidence at all which will affect the deceased in the character of workman or servant other than of the contractor. The real relation between the parties in this action depends upon the printed conditions, and the interpretation of these conditions is a question for us, and we must look at them as a whole. I do not think that the words under "conditions of employment"—namely, "the owners of the said colliery and works are hereinafter called the employer," are material. The only part which is useful for the present case is the 5th clause, which relates to persons working under the contractor only. Now, under that clause the deceased, and all other persons in his position, must be presumed to have knowledge of the conditions, because, by clause 4, the contractor is bound to require every person working under him to obtain a copy of such conditions and to inform him that they are the conditions under which persons are employed at the colliery and that he is bound by such conditions. Therefore when persons enter into the employment of the contractor—not of the mine owner—they must be presumed to have knowledge of these conditions and to know that, in consideration of being employed at the work, they are bound by the terms of such conditions. Well that, undoubtedly, establishes a privity of contract between the mine owners and the workmen of the contractor. We have no doubt there was a contract between the deceased and the mine owners—the only question is, what was its nature? The deceased bound himself, in consideration of being employed by Morris, to abide by the rules which are laid down for the safety of the mine and for the guidance of the persons employed there, whether they be workmen or other persons employed in the mine. That is a consideration which is ample, because the mine owner could have prevented his being employed by the contractor if the deceased had not bound himself by those conditions.

Condition 3 shows what the workmen are to be bound by—namely, "All other usual and customary terms and regulations which obtain or exist with respect to the employment of workmen and all other persons employed at the colliery, whether expressed in writing or not, shall be and remain in full force and effect as part of the contract between the employer and the workmen or other persons employed." The question is, does that condition make the deceased a servant of the mine owner? I do not think it does so. That condition applies whether the workman is or is not a servant of the mine owner and therefore it does not seem to throw any additional light upon whether the deceased was a servant of the mine owner or the contractor. Primâ facie a man is not a servant of two masters. There is no evidence in this case to put aside that conclusion or to show that the deceased, although he was bound to observe all the conditions which are laid down for the guidance of persons employed at the mine, was a servant of anybody except the contractor. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the judgment was wrong.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole point really turns upon the special clauses in the book of conditions under which the deceased was employed. The fifth clause shows that, in addition to the contract the deceased entered into with the contractor, he, also, entered into a collateral contract with the mine owner. The only question that we have to consider is whether that collateral contract is a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour within section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. It is a matter of some little difficulty, but it seems to me that although there was a contract between the deceased and the defendants it was not a contract of service within the meaning of that Act. There is an expression of opinion in the judgment of Rigby, L.J., in the case of Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co. which is important as showing that if there is the element of privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant it would generally negative some other contract with some other party. He uses that expression with reference to the "butty colliery case" where it appeared that the intermediate contractor was not a sub-contractor but a "butty-man," and that this was known to be a mere mode of doing piece-work. What I understand the learned judge to mean is that when you have privity of contract it is an extremely important element because in all probability it negatives any contract with anyone else. It seems to me that the case is analogous to the case where a man employs another to decorate his house and says, "I will not have any workman in the house unless he engages to behave himself properly and not to go over my carpets with his dirty boots on." That would be a perfectly good arrangement, but it would not constitute the workman the servant of the owner of the house. Therefore, though there was a contract between the deceased and the defendants it was not a contract of service.

PEARL ASSURANCE CO. v. SCOTTISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. (a.)

Friendly societies — Industrial insurance companies— Transfer of members — Notice to society whence a member is sought to be transferred—Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26), s. 4 (2).

It is provided by section 4 (2) of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act, 1896, that, where a member of, or person insured with, a collecting society or industrial assurance company is sought to be transferred to any other such society or company, the society to which the member or person is sought to be transferred shall, within seven days of his application for admission to that society or company, give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred, and, by section 14 (1) (c), failure to give such notice is made an offence under the Act.

A person insured with an industrial assurance company applied, through an agent, for admission to a collecting society. At the time of the application he was still insured in the company.

Held, that he was a person who was sought to be transferred to the society, and that the society, having failed to give the notices required by section 4 (2) of the abovementioned Act, was guilty of an offence under section 14 (1) (c).

Case stated by an alderman of the City of London.

An information was preferred by the appellant company against the respondent society for that they did not within seven days from the application of one William Perkins, a person insured with the appellant company, for admission to the respondent society, give notice in writing of the application to the appellant company from which William Perkins was sought to be transferred, and that the default had continued up to the date of the information.

There was a second information which alleged against the respondent society a similar offence in respect of Rebecca Perkins, the wife of William Perkins.

The appellant company was an industrial assurance company, within the meaning of the above Act, and the respondent society was a collecting society and was duly registered under the Friendly Societies Acts.

Perkins, who was called as a witness at the hearing of the information, stated that he and his wife had been insured in the office of the appellant company about two years, and that a collector named Jones, whom he had known as a collector for the appellant company had in or about the month of June, 1900, asked him to transfer to the respondent society. He assented to this and signed a proposal form in the respondent society and gave up to the collector Jones his books and policies in the appellant company, receiving in lieu thereof policies in the respondent society. The policies issued by the respondent society were in different form to those issued by the appellant company.

At the time this transaction took place Jones had left the appellant company and was a collector of the respondent society.

It was stated by a witness that when he was conversing with Perkins at his house the assistant superintendent of the respondent society, accompanied by Jones, came in and stated to the witness that Perkins' insurance had been transferred to the respondent society.

No notice was given by the respondent society to the appellant company within the meaning of section 4 (2).

The two policies on the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Perkins in the appellant company continued in existence up to the day when the informations were heard, and the appellant company admitted that it was not their wish or intention to cancel the policies.

every workman or other person employed by a contractor at the colliery, shall, at the request of such miner or contractor, obtain a copy of these conditions from the officer whose duty it is to provide such copies, and such drawer, workman, or other person shall, in consideration of being employed at the works, be bound both as between himself and the miner or contractor, and between himself and the owner, by the terms of these conditions."

At the trial in the county court it was objected on behalf of the defendants that the deceased was not in their employ. Morris, the sinker, in giving evidence said that by his contract with the defendants he had to provide all the labour, and that the deceased was employed and paid by him, and was under his direction and control; and further, that one Cook, the certificated manager of the mine, had no control over the deceased except under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. He also said that if Cook had given him, the contractor, an order relating to the work he would have obeyed the order and would expect his men to do the same. The jury found that the deceased was a workman in the employment of the defendants, and that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and they awarded the plaintiff damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendants now appealed on the ground that the deceased was not a workman in their employment within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and that there was no evidence of such employment or of negligence.

Ruegg, K.C., and S. H. Leonard, for the appellants.—This action was ill-founded. The deceased was employed and paid by the contractor, and was his servant, and not the servant of the defendants. This case comes within the decision in Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal and Fire Brick Co. (Limited), [1898] 2 Q. B. 588, 47 W. R. Dig. 125. Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is necessary that great control must be exercised by the inspector over the work in a mine, but that does not create the relationship of master and servant between the proprietor and the workmen employed by the contractor.

Lush, for the respondent.—Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co. is distinguishable from the present case because by virtue of the control exercised by the defendants, under the conditions of employment, over the deceased the relationship of master and servant arose. The true test of that relationship is control, not payment of wages.

WILLS, J.—This case is not by any means an easy one, and it is one that is, perhaps, on the border line. I think that no substantial distinction can be drawn between this case and that of Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co., except the one upon which Mr. Lush has argued with so much ability, and the question is, as he truly says, whether there is any evidence to go to the jury that the relationship of master and servant existed between the mine owner and the deceased. I should like to dispose at once of the only piece of parol evidence which was relied on—namely, the answer that was given by Morris, the contractor, that if Cook, the manager of the mine, had given him an order relating to the work he would have obeyed such order, and would expect the men under him to obey it. I really think that that comes to nothing if it is properly looked at. No instance was given in which any order had been given which either he or his workmen had obeyed or disobeyed. Probably the same answer would be given by any subcontractor under any ordinary building contract as to the orders of the building owner or the architect.

It is a constant practice in contracts of this kind to reserve power to the persons who are ultimately interested in the work which is being done to interfere, more or less, and to control, to a great extent, both what shall be done and also the manner in which it is to be done, and it cannot be supposed in such cases that the relationship of master and servant exists. There is no evidence that the deceased was the servant of the mine owner. The conditions contained in the "Record book of persons employed on the conditions undermentioned" are no evidence at all which will affect the deceased in the character of workman or servant other than of the contractor. The real relation between the parties in this action depends upon the printed conditions, and the interpretation of these conditions is a question for us, and we must look at them as a whole. I do not think that the words under "conditions of employment"—namely, "the owners of the said colliery and works are hereinafter called the employer," are material. The only part which is useful for the present case is the 5th clause, which relates to persons working under the contractor only. Now, under that clause the deceased, and all other persons in his position, must be presumed to have knowledge of the conditions, because, by clause 4, the contractor is bound to require every person working under him to obtain a copy of such conditions and to inform him that they are the conditions under which persons are employed at the colliery and that he is bound by such conditions. Therefore when persons enter into the employment of the contractor—not of the mine owner—they must be presumed to have knowledge of these conditions and to know that, in consideration of being employed at the work, they are bound by the terms of such conditions. Well that, undoubtedly, establishes a privity of contract between the mine owners and the workmen of the contractor. We have no doubt there was a contract between the deceased and the mine owners—the only question is, what was its nature? The deceased bound himself, in consideration of being employed by Morris, to abide by the rules which are laid down for the safety of the mine and for the guidance of the persons employed there, whether they be workmen or other persons employed in the mine. That is a consideration which is ample, because the mine owner could have prevented his being employed by the contractor if the deceased had not bound himself by those conditions.

Condition 3 shows what the workmen are to be bound by—namely, "All other usual and customary terms and regulations which obtain or exist with respect to the employment of workmen and all other persons employed at the colliery, whether expressed in writing or not, shall be and remain in full force and effect as part of the contract between the employer and the workmen or other persons employed." The question is, does that condition make the deceased a servant of the mine owner? I do not think it does so. That condition applies whether the workman is or is not a servant of the mine owner and therefore it does not seem to throw any additional light upon whether the deceased was a servant of the mine owner or the contractor. Primâ facie a man is not a servant of two masters. There is no evidence in this case to put aside that conclusion or to show that the deceased, although he was bound to observe all the conditions which are laid down for the guidance of persons employed at the mine, was a servant of anybody except the contractor. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the judgment was wrong.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole point really turns upon the special clauses in the book of conditions under which the deceased was employed. The fifth clause shows that, in addition to the contract the deceased entered into with the contractor, he, also, entered into a collateral contract with the mine owner. The only question that we have to consider is whether that collateral contract is a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour within section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. It is a matter of some little difficulty, but it seems to me that although there was a contract between the deceased and the defendants it was not a contract of service within the meaning of that Act. There is an expression of opinion in the judgment of Rigby, L.J., in the case of Marrow v. Flimby and Broughton Moor Coal, &c., Co. which is important as showing that if there is the element of privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant it would generally negative some other contract with some other party. He uses that expression with reference to the "butty colliery case" where it appeared that the intermediate contractor was not a sub-contractor but a "butty-man," and that this was known to be a mere mode of doing piece-work. What I understand the learned judge to mean is that when you have privity of contract it is an extremely important element because in all probability it negatives any contract with anyone else. It seems to me that the case is analogous to the case where a man employs another to decorate his house and says, "I will not have any workman in the house unless he engages to behave himself properly and not to go over my carpets with his dirty boots on." That would be a perfectly good arrangement, but it would not constitute the workman the servant of the owner of the house. Therefore, though there was a contract between the deceased and the defendants it was not a contract of service.

PEARL ASSURANCE CO. v. SCOTTISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. (a.)

Friendly societies — Industrial insurance companies — Transfer of members — Notice to society whence a member is sought to be transferred — Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26), s. 4 (2).

It is provided by section 4 (2) of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act, 1896, that, where a member of, or person insured with, a collecting society or industrial assurance company is sought to be transferred to any other such society or company, the society to which the member or person is sought to be transferred shall, within seven days of his application for admission to that society or company, give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred, and, by section 14 (1) (c), failure to give such notice is made an offence under the Act.

A person insured with an industrial assurance company applied, through an agent, for admission to a collecting society. At the time of the application he was still insured in the company.

Held, that he was a person who was sought to be transferred to the society, and that the society, having failed to give the notices required by section 4 (2) of the above-mentioned Act, was guilty of an offence under section 14 (1) (c).

Case stated by an alderman of the City of London.

An information was preferred by the appellant company against the respondent society for that they did not within seven days from the application of one William Perkins, a person insured with the appellant company, for admission to the respondent society, give notice in writing of the application to the appellant company from which William Perkins was sought to be transferred, and that the default had continued up to the date of the information.

There was a second information which alleged against the respondent society a similar offence in respect of Rebecca Perkins, the wife of William Perkins.

The appellant company was an industrial assurance company, within the meaning of the above Act, and the respondent society was a collecting society and was duly registered under the Friendly Societies Acts.

Perkins, who was called as a witness at the hearing of the information, stated that he and his wife had been insured in the office of the appellant company about two years, and that a collector named Jones, whom he had known as a collector for the appellant company had in or about the month of June, 1900, asked him to transfer to the respondent society. He assented to this and signed a proposal form in the respondent society and gave up to the collector Jones his books and policies in the appellant company, receiving in lieu thereof policies in the respondent society. The policies issued by the respondent society were in different form to those issued by the appellant company.

At the time this transaction took place Jones had left the appellant company and was a collector of the respondent society.

It was stated by a witness that when he was conversing with Perkins at his house the assistant superintendent of the respondent society, accompanied by Jones, came in and stated to the witness that Perkins' insurance had been transferred to the respondent society.

No notice was given by the respondent society to the appellant company within the meaning of section 4 (2).

The two policies on the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Perkins in the appellant company continued in existence up to the day when the informations were heard, and the appellant company admitted that it was not their wish or intention to cancel the policies.

The alderman held that as the policies in the appellant company and those in the respondent company were co-existent there could be no transfer or seeking to transfer within the meaning of section 4 (2), and dismissed the information.

which the county court judge has held that there must be shown an affirmative title on the part of the claimant in the interpleader, nevertheless, if the goods are trust goods, there is no sort of title to them in the execution creditor. He had no right, when trading with Mather, to seek by execution to get satisfaction out of trust property of a debt incurred by Mather with him. The whole basis of the decisions, of which Dowse v. Gorton is the last and most final, is that assets, as they are acquired, whether by an executor, administrator, or a trustee, who, in conformity with his trust, is carrying on a business, are not the property of the administrator, executor, or trustee, but form part of the trust property, to which those to whom the executor, administrator, or trustee in trading incurs debts have no right to look in the sense of being able to seize them under an execution, because they are the goods —not of the trader—but of the trust. I will refer to two passages in the judgment of a case which seems to illustrate that point very well—namely, In re Morgan, Pillgrem v. Pillgrem, 29 W. R. 733, 18 Ch. D. 93. In that case the business of a testator had been carried on by his executor in conformity with the testator's directions, and a creditor whose debt was incurred by the executor in the course of that trading sought to enforce rights against property which had originally been the property of the testator, but which had passed to the executor in the course of carrying on the business. Fry, J., before whom the case was first heard, said (18 Ch. D., at p. 101): "The argument in support of the summons has almost gone the length of suggesting that trust property in the hands of a trustee may be seized by his execution creditor. In my judgment nothing is plainer than this—that the property which can be taken under an execution is only that property to which the execution debtor is beneficially entitled, and that no property of which he is only a trustee can be taken." The case went to the Court of Appeal, and in giving judgment there Jessel, M.R., said (18 Ch. D., at p. 104): "At a subsequent period he (the creditor) issued execution against the chattels of his debtor, and among other chattels were the leasehold premises, and, in order to enable the sheriff to seize, the lease was handed to him. I asked the counsel if the sheriff could seize trust property for the debt of the trustee, and it was admitted that he could not. The result was that the execution gave the creditor no better title than he had before; therefore he got no title to the lease under the execution, and therefore he has no legal title to the property, and as to his equitable interest he must be postponed to the cestuis que trust." That the creditor's only right in a case of this kind is to sue personally the executor, administrator, or trustee is, I think, decided by the case of Dowse v. Gorton. The point is made clearer if one turns to the judgment delivered in the Court of Appeal. Lindley, L.J., says, In re Gorton (40 Ch. D., at p. 542): "Now, let us look at the rights of those who have dealt with the executors after his death. The right of those is to sue the executors. I believe there are some very exceptional cases in which subsequent creditors can get the assets, and I think there is authority for saying that funeral expenses can be got out of the assets; but with those exceptions the right of subsequent creditors is to sue the executors. They have nothing to do with the assets of the testator at all." The House of Lords, when the case came before them, though they varied the order of the Court of Appeal, in no way dissented from that decision. Furthermore, there is a case of Evans v. Evans, 35 W. R. 586, 34 Ch. D. 597, which was cited to the learned county court judge, in which an attempt was made in a court of equity, by a creditor who, like the present execution creditor, had a claim against the administratrix of an estate, who was carrying on the business of the estate, to get a sort of charge upon goods which were in the possession of the administratrix in the course of the trading, and which that same creditor had supplied and had not been paid for. In the course of his judgment in that case Cotton, L.J., says: "The creditor cannot have any direct claim against the intestate's estate. He cannot have anything higher than a right to be substituted to the right of the administratrix to indemnity. Where a business is carried on by a trustee with proper authority, and he buys for the business goods for the price of which he is personally liable, the cestuis que trust cannot say to the trustee: 'These goods belong to us, and we will take them without regard to your right to indemnity.' But have the creditors any claim against the goods on that ground? The goods now in question were acquired for the purposes of the business, and went into the business. The infant child of the intestate claims them as belonging to the estate, and, in my opinion, he has a right so to claim them, subject to the right of the widow to be indemnified out of them against all claims in respect of them so far as she has not lost such right by being a debtor to the estate, and whether she has lost that right is a question depending on the result of the general account."

It appears to me to be clear that, on the facts of the present case—which are really undisputed—the goods which were seized come within these decisions; and, so far as common law is concerned they became as they came in assets of the trust estate; for it is clear both from Abbott v. Parfitt, 19 W. R. 718, L. R. 6 Q. B. 346, referred to by Lord Herschell in Dowse v. Gorton, and from Moseley v. Rendell, 19 W. R. 619, L. R. 6 Q. B. 338, that where an executor or administrator is rightly carrying on his testator's business the assets acquired in the course of trading as they come in become assets of the testator. If that is so, something also follows in equity which it appears to me the county court judge has overlooked. While there can be no right of a creditor created in the course of the trading to treat as goods of the trustee goods which form part of the trust estate, still it seems to be equally clear that the trustee has a right and an interest in the goods, because he has a right to an indemnity in the nature of a lien upon them. It necessarily follows, as it seems to me, that the trustee has a right to prevent anybody from carrying away the goods, and to say to everybody, including the cestuis que trust, "I am entitled to an indemnity out of these goods and have, therefore, a pecuniary interest in them." If when the accounts are taken it turns out that he has received from the trust estate more than the amount of the liabilities which he has properly incurred in trading, he then will have to give way to the cestui que trust, for there is nothing in respect of which he need be indemnified, but until those accounts are taken he is entitled to a lien over the assets. A lien—putting aside the question of bankruptcy—has always been held to be a sufficient title in a person who holds property not his own to hold it as against the world until the lien is satisfied or discharged, or proved not be exist. We are bound to give effect to the equitable rights of a trustee who, properly and in conformity with the obligation of his trust, is carrying on a business for the benefit of the trust estate. I will again refer to Dowse v. Gorton, which, when properly read, seems to me to cover most of the points in the present case. Lord Herschell says ([1891] A. C., at p. 199): "I think it is clear that where a business has been carried on under such an authority as was conferred upon the executors by the will of this testator, they (the executors) would be entitled to a general indemnity out of the estate as against all persons claiming under the will." So also Lord Macnaghten (at p. 203) says: "Creditors of a deceased trader whose business has been continued by his executors, when they come for an administration decree, must treat the continuance of the business either as proper or improper. If the business has been properly continued as between the executors and the creditors (i.e., the creditors of the old estate of the testator), or if the creditors choose to treat it so, which comes to the same thing, the executors are entitled to be indemnified against all liabilities properly incurred in carrying it on."

But perhaps the fullest and clearest exposition of the rights of Mather in this case, in whose shoes, subject to the bankruptcy point to which I am presently coming, the trustee stands, is given by Jessel, M.R., in In re Johnson, Shearman v. Robinson, decided in 1880. He says (15 Ch. D., at p. 552): "I understand the doctrine to be this, that where a trustee is authorized by a testator, or by a settlor—for it makes no difference—to carry on a business with certain funds which he gives to the trustee for that purpose, the creditor who trusts the executor has a right to say, 'I had the personal liability of the man I trusted and I have also a right to be put in his place against the assets; that is, I have a right to the benefit of indemnity or lien which he has against the assets devoted to the purposes of the trade.' The first right is his general right by contract; because he trusted the trustee or executor he has a personal right to sue him and to get judgment and make him a bankrupt. The second right is a mere corollary to those numerous cases in equity in which persons are allowed to follow trust assets. The trust assets having been devoted to carrying on the trade, it would not be right that the cestui que trust should get the benefit of the trade without paying the liabilities; therefore the court says to him, 'You shall not set up a trustee who may be a man of straw and make him a bankrupt to avoid the responsibility of the assets for carrying on the trade'; the court puts the creditor, so to speak, as I understand it, in the place of the trustee."

Therefore the case stands thus: The trustee Mather has a right at any moment, and with regard to any of the assets of the trust estate, to say, "These shall not be taken away from me. I have a right to an indemnity personal to myself, and to that extent also I have a right of indemnity, indirectly, on behalf of the creditors of the estate, who can only get at the assets through me." He, therefore, clearly has much more than the interest of a bare trustee in these assets. He has by the well-established rules of equity a direct personal interest in maintaining his lien over them.

The only question left appears to me to be this: Will this equitable right be sufficient to enable Mather to succeed as against the execution creditor in an interpleader issue? It must be conceded that the execution creditor himself had no right, but it is also clear that in interpleader proceedings the claimant must show that he has a definite title in himself to the goods. Supposing, then, that we are dealing with Mather, had he such a definite title or interest? I think he had. It has been held in more than one case that in interpleader cases, now at any rate, the law is bound to recognize equitable rights. The first case I know of, though there may be others, is Rusden v. Pope, 16 W. R. 1122, L. R. 3 Ex. 269. Then there is the case of Duncan v. Cashin, 23 W. R. 561, L. R. 10 C. P. 554, in which the late Lord Esher emphatically lays down, at p. 558, the duty to look at the equities in interpleader issues. The most recent authority is a decision of Mathew and Wills, JJ., in Usher v. Martin, 24 Q. B. D. 272, 38 W. R. Dig. 20, in which they distinguished the case of Richards v. Jenkins, 35 W. R. 355, 18 Q. B. D. 451, in the Court of Appeal, which at first sight seems to be to the contrary effect.

In the county court judge's judgment in the present case something is said about the form of the judgment being against Mather as trustee. I cannot quite understand that, though there may be something which explains it. I think I ought to assume in favour of the execution creditor that he has a perfectly good judgment, and I do so assume. Now there comes the question, Assuming that Mather had this right of title, as Jessel, M.R., calls it, what is the position of the trustee in bankruptcy—the claimant? Section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is plain and explicit that Mather's trust property did not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy. It is not property which is divisible among his creditors, that is clear. But, on the other hand, it is equally clear to me that here, if I rightly construe the decisions of equity, there is—to use the expression of a great master of equity, Sir George Jessel, M.R.—an actual interest in the nature of a lien or right of indemnity over this property, and if judgment should pass for the execution creditor away go the goods and the property, and the trustee's right of lien is defeated. I think it has always been held, and has always been treated, as part of the law of bankruptcy that if a person is found in possession of goods of which he may be described as the trustee in one sense, but over which he has a lien—for instance, as a factor—although the goods were never held to pass under section 44 or the corresponding section of earlier Bankruptcy Acts, the trustee in bankruptcy was not bound to part with those goods until it had been shown that the lien had been satisfied. In such cases the trustee has a right to see that the lien is maintained in the interest of the creditors of the estate. In this connection I will quote from Williams on Bankruptcy (7th ed.), p. 177, where he says: "Thirdly, there is the class of trusts where the bankrupt trustee has not the absolute or general property, but only a special property—for example, where the property is vested in the bankrupt as an agent, such as a factor intrusted with goods to sell for his principal, or a banker intrusted with bills for collection. Such property, if distinguishable from the mass of the bankrupt's property, does not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy, but the trustee has a right to enforce any lien or other right on the goods or other property in his possession which the bankrupt factor would have had against his principal had he remained solvent."

It appears to me that in equity the carrying on of a business of this kind gives an equitable lien, and I do not see why the trustee in bankruptcy ought not to have the benefit of that lien. Though no doubt the property cannot be said to be property divisible among the creditors, being trust property, yet it ought to be said that it is property in which the trustee has an interest in the nature of a lien, and every trade creditor who has a right to prove against Mather's estate in respect of debts incurred by Mather in the course of carrying on the business has also, through Mather, a right to the satisfaction of his debt by means of the lien which Mather had over what is no doubt in one sense trust property. It seems to me, therefore, that that lien has passed to the trustee in bankruptcy, and I think that judgment should be given in his favour. It follows from what I have said that the trustee cannot deal with these assets, because the cestuis que trust will have a right to have them brought into account. All we decide is that the trustee in bankruptcy of Mather has established such a right against the defendant—the execution creditor—as entitles him to succeed in the interpleader issue.

RICHARDES v. YATES. (a.)

Administration — Creditor administrator — Right of retainer—Form of administration bond—"Not unduly prefer."

An administrator may retain his own debt as against debts of equal degree, notwithstanding that the administration bond provides for a due course of administration "rateably and proportionably and according to the priority required by law, and not unduly preferring his own debt."

Nunn v. Barlow, 1 Sim. & St. 588, and Davies v. Parry, 47 W. R. 429, [1899] 1 Ch. 602, considered and followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

The intestate Belham, who died on the 26th of October, 1898, was at the time of his death indebted to the plaintiff and the defendant in respect of certain contracts which he had entered into with them respectively.

The defendant took out letters of administration to the estate, and entered into the usual administration bond as settled in In the Goods of Brackenbury, 25 W. R. 698, 2 P. D. 272. The bond provided (inter alia) that the administrator should well and truly administer the estate and effects of the deceased "according to law—that is to say, do pay all and singular the debts which he did owe at his decease in a due course of administration rateably and proportionably and according to the priority required by law, and not unduly preferring his own debt or the debts of any other of the creditors of the deceased by reason of his being an administrator as aforesaid."

The plaintiff took out an originating summons for the administration of Belham's estate, and an administration order was made by Kekewich, J., directing accounts and inquiries. The master certified the total debts at £3,350, of which £957 was due to the defendant, and the personal estate outstanding he certified at £966 14s. 6d.

The defendant claimed to exercise his right of retainer upon the authority of the decision of Romer, J., in the case of Davies v. Parry, 47 W. R. 429, [1899] 1 Ch. 602, that a bond in the form of that in the present case gave a creditor administrator the power of preferring so long as he did not do it unduly, the bond leaving it open to the administrator to retain his own debt so long as he did not do so unduly.

On the 11th of March, 1901, the plaintiff moved in the Probate Division before Barnes, J., asking that the bond might be varied by striking out the word "unduly," or otherwise to alter it so as to carry out the intention of the court, or that in the alternative the grant of administration to the defendant might be revoked and administration re-issued to some other person. Barnes, J., refused the motion, holding that he could not alter the bond, as the court could not make a new contract with the administrator. His lordship considered himself bound by Davies v. Parry, though he expressed some doubt as to the correctness of the decision, and that as the creditor administrator had not acted improperly the court would not revoke the grant.

The matter was then brought before Joyce, J., upon the further consideration of the administration action, and the learned judge declared that the defendant as administrator of a deceased intestate was entitled to retain out of the assets of the deceased the amount of the debt owing to him. His lordship considered himself bound by Davies v. Parry, with which he agreed. From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Griffith-Jones and Morgan Griffith-Jones, for the appellant.

Ingpen, K.C., and Whinney, for the respondent.

RIGBY, L.J., said he was of opinion that the decision of the learned judge below was right. No doubt there were cases in which one could wish the law were simpler, but as the law stood a person who obtained the right to administer had a right to retain a debt due to him. If the assets were sufficient for payment of debts no question could arise, but where this was not the case the rule often resulted in no debts being paid except that of the administrator. His lordship agreed that Joyce, J., was right in holding that the right of the administrator must prevail.

COLLINS, L.J., was of the same opinion, and said that the question was in substance decided by Nunn v. Barlow, 1 Sim. & St. 588, and followed by other decisions. The ordinary administration decree directs the debts to be paid rateably and according to law, and the usual administration bond does but write at large what the ordinary administration decree directs. To pay debts "rateably" is a duty imposed by the decree, and the case of Nunn v. Barlow decides that the right of retainer is not incompatible with an administration decree. That seems to dispose of the remarks of Barnes, J., on the case of Davies v. Parry. The words in the usual administration bond add nothing to the law. Unless the bond can be construed as a waiver by the administrator of his retainer the right to retain remains. In the present case the administrator had not renounced his rights and consequently he still had the right to retain.

STIRLING, L.J., was of the same opinion and said: Romer, J., in Davies v. Parry refers to the terms of the administration bond which impose on the administrator the duty to pay debts rateably and according to law not unduly preferring his own debt. On that he remarks that the administrator is not prohibited from preferring his own debt so long as he does not do it unduly. What does that mean? Clearly that he is not to pay his own debt in priority to debts of a higher degree. The right of retainer is given to an administrator by reason of his being both creditor and administrator and therefore unable to sue himself. In the present case there had been no undue preference, and the decision below must be affirmed.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN MASTERS AND THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compensation—Interest in land—Taken or injuriously affected—Right of lessee of minerals to sink pits—Reasonable approval of lessor—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

The owner of land on which there was a colliery demised by lease for a term of years the colliery, with its buildings, pits, and shafts, and also the minerals in and under the adjoining land. The lease contained a proviso that the lessee might at any time during the term, on giving notice, sink a pit or pits on any part of the land the surface of which was not demised, but so that the position of such pit or pits should be subject to the reasonable approval of the lessor, his heirs or assigns. The lessor afterwards agreed to sell a portion of the surface to a railway company, and the company gave notice to the lessee to treat in respect of any interest which he might have in such portion. On the same day the lessee gave the lessor notice of his intention to sink a pit in that portion of the land.

Held, that the lessee, under the proviso in the lease, had an interest in the land taken by the company, for the loss of which he was entitled to compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Darling and Bucknill, JJ.) on a special case stated in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (ante, p. 29, [1900] 2 Q. B. 677).

By a lease dated the 24th of June, 1891, Colonel Vaughan Lee, who was the freeholder of certain land in the county of Glamorgan, demised to Thomas James Masters for a term of sixty years the portion of that land which was coloured yellow on the plan annexed to the lease and the colliery buildings thereon and the pits and shafts then open thereon, and also the minerals lying in and under the whole of the land. And it was provided that the lessee should have the right at any time during the term, on giving notice, to sink a pit or pits on any part of the land other than that coloured yellow, but so that the position of such pit or pits should be subject to the reasonable approval of the lessor, his heirs or assigns, or his or their agent for the time being.

On the 25th of May, 1898, the Great Western Railway Co., having previously agreed to purchase from Colonel Vaughan Lee the surface of five and a-half acres of the land other than that coloured yellow, gave notice to Masters to treat in respect of any interest which he might have in the land which they had so agreed to purchase.

On the same day Masters gave notice under the lease to the agent of Colonel Vaughan Lee of his intention to sink a new pit upon part of the land specified in the notice to treat.

The lessor never gave the required leave to sink a pit, and the railway company entered upon the land.

Masters claimed compensation in respect of his interest in the land taken by the company, and the matter was referred to arbitration under section 68 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act.

The arbitrator awarded the claimant £8,900 as compensation for the loss of his right to sink a pit or pits on the land taken by the company.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts and the arguments are fully set out ante, p. 29.

The question was whether the qualified right conferred on the claimant by the lease, to sink a pit in land the surface of which was not demised to him, gave him an interest in that land which was the subject of compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the claimant.

The railway company appealed.

Cripps, K.C., James Fox, and MacSwinney, for the claimant.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The question in this appeal is whether the award which the arbitrator has made in favour of Masters against the railway company for £8,900 ought to be set aside, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to award anything at all.

The short facts of the case are these: In 1891, Colonel Vaughan Lee, who was the owner of a considerable piece of property in Wales, leased the minerals to Masters. Masters spent a large sum of money on the colliery, and no doubt he acquired a very valuable right, and he had sixty years in which to work the minerals. He had then only one shaft from which to work the minerals, but by the lease he was entitled to make other shafts in order that he might more advantageously work the minerals under different parts of the land. In 1898 the Great Western Railway Co. entered into an agreement with Colonel Vaughan Lee to purchase 5½ acres of the surface of this land, and, having constructive notice of the lease to Masters and of the provision in that lease whereby Masters had the right of sinking other shafts, they gave him notice to treat—that is to say, to sell to them whatever interest he might have in the 5½ acres which they were taking or had taken. There can be no doubt that he had this interest in the 5½ acres—viz., the right to sink shafts therein for the purpose of winning the minerals, and, on the matter going to arbitration, the arbitrator awarded him £8,900 as compensation for that right having been taken away from him by the railway company.

The point is now taken that the arbitrator had no jurisdiction to award Masters anything at all, and that is sought to be made out in this way. It is said that he had not an unfettered right to make a shaft in this 5½ acres. The clause in the lease which gives him the power to sink a pit or pits on any part of the land, other than that of which the surface was demised to him, ends with this proviso, "but so that the position of such pit or pits be subject to the reasonable approval of the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, or his or their agent for the time being." It is said therefore that his right was fettered with this, that the lessor might disapprove on reasonable, or the lessor's assignees might disapprove on reasonable grounds. No evidence was given to show that the lessor had any reasonable grounds for disapproving. Then had the Great Western Railway Co? I will assume in their favour that they are "assigns" within the meaning of the clause, but can it be reasonable on their part that, because they are a railway company taking the surface of land with notice of a man's right to dig and sink shafts in that land, they should lay their line on the surface and then say to him that for that reason he shall not sink any shafts; and, further, that they will put him to the cost of £8,900 to go elsewhere? I cannot imagine anything more unreasonable. Under the circumstances I think that the arbitrator was justified in saying that the right was unfettered, because neither the lessor nor the railway company could on any reasonable grounds refuse Masters leave to sink a shaft, and that he had jurisdiction to award the amount of compensation which he thought Masters was entitled to. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the railway company took subject to the burden of the conditions in the lease, and I will assume in their favour that they are entitled to the benefit of the limitation upon the burden, that they are to be the persons subject to whose reasonable approval a pit is to be sunk in any particular position. That narrows the point down to this, whether the purchasers of a piece of the lessor's land, by setting up that the purposes for which they intend to use it are such as to make it exceedingly undesirable, not to say impossible, that a pit should be sunk in it, are thereby ipso facto entitled to take the land free from the obligation of paying anything whatever to compensate the lessee for the loss of the right he might otherwise have to sink a pit in their land. It is obvious that such a principle of immunity would have the effect of wiping out the whole obligation of the lessor's covenant. The lessor might the next day sell every acre of the land in respect of which he had undertaken this obligation for building or other purposes, which would render it exceedingly undesirable that a pit should be sunk there. The case cannot be decided by any such consideration as that. The railway company are purchasing land which, as it stands, has no railway upon it, and steps are being taken whereby all rights injuriously affected, by their taking the land compulsorily, are to be assessed. The lessee at this moment has the right reserved by the covenant, and the arbitrator has to assess the value of this right whether any steps have been taken to enforce it or not. He has to consider whether the land taken by the company is in such a position as to make it necessary or desirable for the lessee to sink a pit there. He has also to consider the question whether the owner of the land, when he knows where the lessee desires to make the pit, could reasonably refuse to give his assent. Having taken these matters into consideration he is to assess the value of the lessee's right. That is precisely what the arbitrator has done here, and it is fair to suppose that he has given due weight to the views of the company. It seems to me that the decision of the court below is perfectly right, and I desire to express my entire concurrence with the reasoning of the judgment of Darling, J.

Decision of Farwell, J. (ante, p. 428), confirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported ante, p. 428).

The facts are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below.

Shortly stated, a motion was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other shareholders of the defendant company to restrain the defendant company from carrying into effect an agreement or agreements made, or about to be made, by the defendant company, whereby, in consideration of the guarantee of the issue of 60,000 shares of the company (part of an issue of 80,000 shares of £1 each offered by the company to its shareholders), the company agreed to give to the persons or person giving such guarantee an option to the 30th of June, 1901, on 15,000 unissued shares of £1 each of the company at the price of £2 10s. per share; or, in the alternative, an injunction to restrain the defendant company from applying or agreeing to apply any of its shares or capital money directly or indirectly in the payment of a commission or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing, or agreeing to subscribe, for all or any part of an issue of 80,000 shares of £1 each of the defendant company offered to its shareholders in accordance with the terms of a notice signed by the secretary of the defendant company, and dated the 1st of February, 1901.

The shares in question stood in fact at a much higher price than £2 10s. each.

Farwell, J., held that such an allotment would be an application of shares in payment of commission, discount, or allowance in consideration of underwriting, and was prohibited by section 8 (2) of the Companies Act, 1900.

The defendant company appealed.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case an action has been brought to restrain a limited company from carrying out a scheme which is plainly shown to us in all its bearings on the documents that have been put in evidence. It appears that the company has been down to the present time a prosperous company, so that there is no doubt whatever that at present, as things exist, the shares are worth a good deal more than the normal amount, which is £1 per share. Now the plan proposed by the company was out of the unissued capital of about £112,000 to issue £80,000 for the purpose of assisting certain affiliated companies in a way a little unusual, perhaps, but not denied, so far as that goes, to be within the powers of the company. Those 80,000 shares were to be offered in the first place to the existing shareholders in the company, but the company was not minded to enter upon a transaction of this magnitude without having security against the possibility of the existing shareholders not taking up all the shares; and accordingly they entered into what is called an underwriting transaction, getting certain persons, who may or may not have been shareholders in the company, to enter into an underwriting agreement which comes in effect to this, that they would take up certain of the shares at the price at which they were offered to the shareholders, and were to have in addition the option of taking at the same price 15,000 other shares, a most valuable option if the shares went on increasing in value, so that £2 10s. a share, the price which would have to be paid, would really mean less than the market value. That option involves, on the other hand, a great limitation on the rights of the company, and in proportion as it was valuable to the underwriters it would be onerous as regards the company. Under the underwriting agreement the company were, if called upon in accordance with the conditions imposed, bound to allot to the underwriters the whole 15,000, and the question now is whether on the construction of section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, that is or is not permissible under the circumstances. Now we are relieved from many minor points by the frank admission that whatever else takes place the company cannot claim the benefit of sub-section 1 of section 8. Whether this was an offer of shares to the public for subscription or whether it was not the company could not claim the benefit of sub-section 1 without pointing to an article of association which entitled them to pay commission and the amount or rate per cent. That must be set forth in the articles of association—that is to say, the power of the directors to pay commission is limited to an amount or rate not greater than that prescribed by the articles. There is no such article here fixing the amount or rate, and whether or not this was an offer to the public for subscription, that clause alone would prevent the company claiming the advantage—for it is an advantage—of sub-section 1. It is also admitted, and must necessarily have been admitted, that sub-section 3 can have no application here, and really the only question left for us is to consider the effect and meaning of the prohibitive sub-section 2. It has been urged that the construction of that sub-section is very difficult. I cannot myself see the difficulty. It appears to me that the section is about as plain as a section can well be made. "Save as aforesaid"—that means leaving untouched any effect that can be properly given to sub-section 1—and it is admitted that no effect can be given to it in this case—"no company shall apply any of its shares or capital money"—I pause there to consider the words "shall apply any of its shares." How can it be said that there is any doubt whatever as to the meaning of those words? "Apply" means what it says and nothing else. "No company shall apply any of its shares"—we have not got to consider the case of capital money here because the case is one of shares—"either directly or indirectly"—which are words frequently inserted for the purpose of obviating any doubt—"in payment of any commission, discount, or allowance to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe whether absolutely or conditionally for any shares of the company." I stop there because those are the important words. No doubt the company agreed to allot shares in consideration of the underwriters applying conditionally or unconditionally for other shares in the company. They agreed to allot 15,000 shares in consideration of the underwriters subscribing for other shares. A great deal of ingenuity has been spent in saying that that is a difficult section. No doubt it is difficult if we are to wrest it out of its plain meaning. It is very difficult to say that is what it must mean, but I avoid that difficulty by applying the plain primâ facie meaning to it and nothing else. They say the Legislature must have meant "shall apply the shares up to the nominal value." I find nothing about the nominal value of the shares. Companies find very often to their loss that their shares are not in any way valued by the nominal amount, and what has been issued in pounds as the nominal amount may only be worth pence. It less frequently happens that what has been issued at £1 becomes worth a great deal more, but in any case the share is worth to the company what it will bring. That is the value of the thing. If it will bring more than £1, the nominal amount, then that is the value to the company, and if they apply a share which nominally only amounts to £1 but is really worth we will say several pounds, they apply several pounds' worth of their property, and that they are prohibited from doing if the result will be that a commission or profit accrues to the underwriters for subscribing for other shares in the company. That appears to me to be the plain, straightforward, and undoubted meaning of the sub-section, that they are not to get rid of their shares or apply them in allowing such a claim as the present to be put forward by the underwriters, they saying "In consideration of our paying £2 10s. you will allot to us shares which we, before we exercise the option, shall have satisfied ourselves will be worth more than the £2 10s.," which really means "You will enable us to make out of this transaction a profit or commission" — commission need not be expressed either in percentages or in definite amounts; if it is plain that a profit will be realizable then I think it amounts to "commission, discount, or allowance"; it amounts to money worth which it is contemplated that the underwriter will get, and the mode in which it is to be got is by applying the shares. How the company can apply the shares in any way more clearly than by allotting them I do not know, and when it allots them it applies, not the nominal value, but the shares themselves, and that is what the sub-section prohibits. I do not think it necessary to enter any further into the details of this matter at all, it being conceded that sub-section 2 is the only one that needs to be interpreted, and the interpretation of that being simply in obedience to the plain language and meaning of the words; that is all that I at any rate think it necessary to say in support of our view here. That is the view that has been taken by the learned judge in the court below, and the result will be that the appeal will be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I think that if the underwriters in the exercise of their option ask for these shares, and an allotment is made to them by the company, that that will be an allotment in consideration of the underwriters subscribing or agreeing to subscribe for shares of the company, and I do not think it is the less so because the allotment may be at a premium. I think that such an allotment is plainly and manifestly an application of the shares within the meaning of the word "apply" in sub-section 2. It was not really argued but that if you take the literal meaning of the words it is obvious there was an application of the shares within the meaning of this sub-section 2, but it was said that you ought not to read "apply" in its natural sense, and that you ought to read it as if the words had run "Save as aforesaid no company shall apply the proceeds of the issue of its shares so far as the same are capital or any capital moneys," and so on. I do not see any reason for modifying the meaning of the word "apply." The reason that is suggested for so doing is that it is said that the sub-section of the Act of Parliament is really directed against the misappropriation of capital. I do not at all know that that is so. On the contrary, when I find this distinction drawn between shares and capital money, I am rather led to the contrary conclusion. I think that it is quite possible that the very object of the Legislature in so wording the sub-section was to prevent the payment of these commissions for placing shares by giving options of this description, but whether that is so or not I have not to decide. I merely have to decide on what seems to me to be the perfectly plain meaning of the words of the sub-section.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The matter really lies within a very narrow compass. It was admitted that neither sub-section 1 nor sub-section 3 of section 8 applies to the case. [His lordship read sub-section 2 and continued:] Now, that being so, let me put this question: Can a company having £1 shares issue or allot any of those shares partly in consideration of £2 10s. and partly in consideration of an agreement to subscribe for other shares in the company? I think not. That is an application of the shares partly in consideration of an agreement to subscribe for other shares of the company which is struck at, as it appears to me, by this section of the Act. It is quite true that the whole consideration is not the agreement to subscribe, but none the less it appears to me to be within the section, and if there was any doubt upon it it would seem to me to be removed by the specified instances one of which is, "whether the shares be so applied by being added to the purchase-money of any property acquired by the company or otherwise." If I am right in that conclusion, then it seems to me that this agreement is beyond the powers of the company, and is prohibited by this section. It begins with an agreement on the part of the underwriter to subscribe for certain shares, and then it proceeds "in consideration of my undertaking as above-mentioned"—viz., the agreement to subscribe—"I am to have the right at any time to to take up and have allotted to me shares at the issue price of £2 10s." That seems to me an agreement on the part of the company to do the very thing to which I have just referred. I think the judgment of Farwell, J., was perfectly correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

DEBENHAM v. SAWBRIDGE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Defect of title—Conveyance—Compensation—Rescission.

Certain freehold hereditaments were sold by the court in a partition action, subject to a condition that, if any error or misstatement should appear to have been made in the particulars or conditions of sale, such error or misstatement was not to annul the sale or to entitle the purchaser to be discharged from his purchase, and that a compensation should be made to the purchaser, and the amount of such compensation was to be settled by the judge in chambers More than a year after the conveyance to the purchaser it was discovered that a certain part of the hereditaments belonged to a third party, whose interest the purchaser bought out.

Held, that the purchaser was not entitled either to compensation under the condition or to the rescission of his contract.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff F. B. Debenham claimed a declaration that C. W. Sawbridge or the other defendants to the action were liable to make compensation to him for certain errors and misstatements in certain particulars of sale relating to No. 21, Mason's-yard, Duke-street, St. James's, or in the alternative to have an indenture of sale dated the 21st of October, 1897, set aside by reason of common mistake.

The facts of the case were as follow:

In the year 1895 a partition action was commenced by an infant, E. H. Norton, against certain defendants for the sale of certain lands comprised in a settlement dated the 2nd of February, 1843.

The judgment in the said action, dated the 25th of January, 1896, directed the usual inquiry as to the parties interested in the said hereditaments, and in case it should be certified that all the parties interested were parties and that the defendants were interested to the extent of one moiety or upward, it was ordered that the said hereditaments be sold with the approbation of the judge and that the money to arise from such sale be paid into court to the credit of the action.

By his certificate made in the action, and bearing date the 23rd of March, 1897, the master, inter alia, certified that the defendant C. W. Sawbridge was the sole surviving trustee of the hereditaments the subject-matter of the action, and that the legal estate in the said hereditaments was vested in him, and that the following persons were absolutely and beneficially interested in the said hereditaments, and for the estates and interests and in the shares and proportions following—namely, the defendant, Frances Jane Norton to one sixth share, the said Edward Henry Norton to three sixth shares, but as to one of such sixths subject to the tenancy by the curtesy of the defendant James Hysom; the defendant Jane Ellen Norton, to one-sixth share, and the defendant Rosalie Norton to one sixth share; and that they were so interested as tenants in common.

On the 9th of July, 1897, the premises were put up for sale. They were described in the particulars as "freehold stabling, situate and being Nos. 21 and 22 on the south side of the Mason's Yard, Duke-street, St. James's-square," and as comprising, inter alia,

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"dwelling over No. 21 containing on the first floor a sitting-room fitted with range and cupboards in recesses and a back landing with iron door in party wall communicating with No. 22, and a coal cupboard under stairs. On the second floor a front room and a back room or kitchen with range and cupboard sink and pan. . . . Let to Mr. William Rice, trading as Messrs. Smith & Co., Job Masters, by lease dated the 3rd of May, 1897 for a term of 15¼ years from the 25th of March, 1897, determinable by lessee at the end of the first eight years on giving six months' notice."

At the foot of the particulars it was stated: "An abstract or copy of the lease will be produced at the sale and may be previously inspected at the office of the vendor's solicitors." The plan on the said particulars contained an express reference to 21, Mason's-yard on the first and second floors.

The conditions of sale, inter alia, provided as follows:

"(4) The purchaser is at the time of sale to pay a deposit of 10 per cent. on the amount of his purchase-money.

"(5) The master will after the said sale proceed to certify the result. The certificate will in due course be signed and filed and become binding without further notice or expense to the purchaser. . . .

"(7) The title shall absolutely commence with the settlement the subject of the action.

"(8) The purchaser is . . . to pay the balance of his purchase-money . . . into court to the credit of the action . . . to an account to be entitled 'Proceeds of sale of property comprised in the settlement dated the 23rd of February, 1843,' on or before the 29th day of September, 1897. . . . Upon payment of the purchase-money . . . the purchaser is to be entitled to the rents and profits as from the said 29th day of September, 1897.

"(9) If any error or misstatement shall appear to have been made in the particulars of sale or these conditions such error or misstatement is not to annul the sale or entitle the purchaser to be discharged from his purchase, and a compensation is to be made to or by the purchaser as the case may be, and the amount of compensation is to be settled by the judge at chambers.

"(10) The property for sale is described in the existing lease, and no question shall be permitted as to the identity or quantity of the premises described therein and in the particulars of sale with the premises described in the previous documents abstracted, although the descriptions are not exactly the same. The property is sold subject to such tenancy, tenant's rights, and rights of way, wall, fence, light, and water, and other easements, if any, and public outgoings, as may affect the same, and the purchaser shall be taken to have had notice thereof and of the state of the premises, though not expressly mentioned, and any previous tenancy appearing on the title shall be considered at an end.

"(11) The sale being under an order of the court, no person beneficially or equitably interested shall be required in that character to join the sale and assurance, neither shall the vendor be bound to produce evidence relating to the dealings of any such party not in the possession or power of the vendor, and the assuring party, or parties, will be bound to convey only as trustee, or trustees, and all facts or matters admitted, proved, stated, or proceeded on in the above-mentioned action, or certified by the master, shall be deemed thereby conclusively evidenced."

During the preparation of these particulars the conveyancing counsel to the court had raised a doubt as to whether the premises No. 21 belonged to the property comprised in the settlement. The views of the conveyancing counsel of the court on the point and the steps taken in the proceedings before the masters will be found set out at length in the judgment. Finally Rice was induced to accept a new lease of all the property proposed to be included in the sale. The conditions and particulars were then resettled in the form given above. At the sale the plaintiff purchased the premises for the sum of £3,810, and paid the deposit mentioned to the credit of the action. The purchaser made a requisition as to the object of granting the new lease concurrent with the old one, and the answer was "The lease was granted with the sanction of the court in the action."

On the 29th of September, 1897, the plaintiff paid the balance of the purchase-money to the credit of the action and by an indenture dated the 21st of October, 1897, and made between Sawbridge of the one part and the plaintiff of the other, after reciting, inter alia, that the "hereditaments hereinafter described and intended to be hereby conveyed being the said hereditaments comprised in and conveyed by the said indenture of settlement were on the 9th day of July, 1897, put up for sale by public auction with the approbation of the judge to whose court the said action is attached," the hereditaments were conveyed to the plaintiff by Sawbridge, who was therein expressed to convey as trustee. Prior to the execution of the conveyance the plaintiff examined the title and the documents of title, and the fullest information was given to him and his legal advisers.

On the 1st of November, 1897, the plaintiff signed a consent in writing, whereby he admitted that he had received a conveyance of the hereditaments mentioned in the particulars of sale, and consented to the application of the purchase money in any manner that the court might authorize. In pursuance of such consent, the costs of the action of Norton v. Norton were paid out of the said purchase-money, and the residue of the said purchase-money was, after providing for duty, distributed as to three equal sixth parts thereof to the defendants Frances Jane Norton, Jane Ellen Norton, and Rosalie Norton, and as to two other equal sixth parts by carrying over the same to the separate account of E. H. Norton, who shortly afterwards died, and then by paying the same to his personal representative, E. Norton, and as to the remaining one sixth by carrying over the same to the credit of Constance E. Hysom, deceased, to which the plaintiff in the partition action was entitled, subject to an estate by the curtesy of J. Hysom. The court at the time of the present action had no power to deal with this share except for the purpose of dealing with it in accordance with the rights of the parties as shown by the title of the account. Shortly after the 14th of November, 1843, the plaintiff ascertained that an action had been commenced by Earl Beauchamp against the said William Rice to recover possession of the building over No. 21, Mason's-yard, and obtained leave to defend the said action. In the course of the action he ascertained that legal estate in the dwelling in question over 21, Mason's-yard was never comprised in the settlement of the 23rd of February, 1843, but that at the date thereof was vested in a predecessor in title of Lord Beauchamp, and at the date of the sale by auction the property therein was vested in Lord Beauchamp; and, further, that there was a cellar under No. 21, Mason's-yard, and that the same was never comprised in the said settlement, and that at the date of the said sale the property therein was vested in third parties. The plaintiff compromised the action on the terms of (1) paying the said earl £300 by way of purchase-money for the said dwelling over No. 21, Mason's-yard; (2) paying £35 for the said earl's costs; (3) paying £15 for the costs of the said W. Rice; (4) paying his own costs amounting to £25.

The plaintiff then commenced the present action against the said C. W. Sawbridge, F. J. Norton, J. E. Norton, R. Norton, and J. Hysom.

Separate defences were delivered on behalf of Sawbridge, Jane E. Norton, and J. Hysom. The last two defendants denied that there had been any common mistake between the parties.

At the hearing of the action the various steps taken in chambers in connection with the sale were carefully considered, as well as the instructions laid before the conveyancing counsel of the court and his opinions thereon. The effect of this examination appears in the judgment. It was admitted that everyone concerned in the sale had acted in perfect good faith throughout.

Levett, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff's rights as to compensation rest on condition 9. That condition is not affected by condition 10, and still applies: Manson v. Thacker, 26 W. R. 604, 7 Ch. D. 620; In re Turner v. Skelton, 28 W. R. 312, 13 Ch. D. 130; Palmer v. Johnson, 13 Q. B. D. 351, 32 W. R. Dig. 221; Clayton v. Leech, 37 W. R. 663, 41 Ch. D. 103. If this has been a common mistake between the parties the fact is not altered by condition 10. Besides, on a sale by the court such a condition as condition 10 ought not to be enforced: Else v. Else, 20 W. R. 286, L. R. 13 Eq. 196; In re Bannister, Broad v. Munton, 27 W. R. 547, 826, 12 Ch. D. 131.

Norton, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for defendant Sawbridge.—Condition 9 does not apply to a want of title on the part of the vendor: May v. Platt, 48 W. R. 617, [1900] 1 Ch. 616; Cann v. Cann, 3 Sim. 447; Clare v. Lamb, 23 W. R. 389, L. R. 10 C. P. 334; Thomas v. Powell, 2 Cox Ch. Cas. 394; Soper v. Arnold, 36 W. R. 207, 37 Ch. D. 96; In re Clifford, Jones v. Clifford, 24 W. R. 979, 3 Ch. D. 779; Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sen. 126. If the plaintiff is entitled to compensation at all he ought to ask for it in the partition action. Sawbridge is not a necessary party to these proceedings at all. The plaintiff is too late for rectification; he is not entitled to compensation, as the purchase-money has been distributed. The conditions under which the property was sold were perfectly fair.

Rowden, K.C., W. M. Cann, and H. Newson, for the beneficiaries, defendants.—The plaintiff is not entitled to compensation: Clayton v. Leech. Condition 9 has no application to a defect of title: Ex parte Riches, 27 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 313. If the plaintiff had discovered the defect of title prior to completion specific performance with compensation would not have been enforced: Clare v. Lamb. Everything was perfectly fair on the defendants' part, and it will be a hard case on them if they are called upon to pay back the money. [BYRNE, J., referred to In re Beyfus and Master's Contract, 37 W. R. 261, 39 Ch. D. 110; Nunn v. Hancock, 19 W. R. 1041, 6 Ch. D. 850.]

Levett, K.C., in reply.—The vendors did not exhibit in regard to the negotiations the openness which the court requires as between vendor and purchaser. It was not right to use the name of the court for the purpose of making an evasive answer. Such cases as Clare v. Lamb, Thomas v. Powell, and Cann v. Cann were common law actions founded on the doctrine of failure of consideration and had no connection with the question of mistake. In Soper v. Arnold there was no mistake of fact, it was a mistake of opinion. [He referred to May v. Platt; Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 925, 29 W. R. Dig. 232; Bingham v. Bingham, and to the remarks of Lindley, L.J., therein on Huddersfield Bank v. Lister, 43 W. R. 567, [1895] 2 Ch. 273, at p. 281.] The mistake here is not one of title, but of fact.

Cur. adv. vult.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the facts relative to the sale of the premises to the plaintiff): On the 14th of November, 1898, an action was commenced by Earl Beauchamp against Rice, the tenant, to recover possession of the rooms over No. 21, and proceedings were ultimately put an end to by Rice paying six years' arrears of rent to the earl, and by the plaintiff, the purchaser, buying the rooms in question for £300, he also paying £75 for costs. It is not now in dispute that the rooms in question did not, at the time of the sale, form part of the property the subject of the partition action, but belonged to Earl Beauchamp. It has also, since conveyance, been discovered that there is a cellar underneath No. 21, forming part of a range of cellarage, entered only from a trap-door situate in the mews some distance away from No. 21, and not divided from the rest of the cellarage under the other houses, and, although it is not exactly known to whom the cellarage belongs, it is pretty clear that it does not form part of the property the subject of the action of Norton v. Norton. The existence of the cellar was unknown to any of the parties to the action and to the purchaser until some time after the conveyance had been executed; and there was no suspicion of its existence in the minds of the master, the conveyancing counsel to the court, the solicitors acting in the matter, or to any one concerned at any time prior to the completion of the sale. The only entrance to the rooms over No. 21, except through the iron door in the party wall between Nos. 21 and 22, is from a passage, the access to which is obtained by means of a staircase behind No. 17 in the mews, the passage running past the level of the rooms over several sets of stabling from which such rooms are entered. There is no communication between the coach-houses on the ground floor of No. 21 and the rooms above. The action is brought to obtain compensation under the ninth condition of sale from the defendant Sawbridge, the trustee, for alleged errors and misstatements in the particulars and conditions in respect of the dwelling rooms over and the cellar under No. 21; or, alternatively, from the other defendants as beneficiaries. Alternatively, it it is sought to set aside the conveyance on the ground of common mistake. It is absolutely clear that there has been no fraud or intentional deception on the part of any one, and that every one concerned in the conduct of the sale and in the preparation of the particulars and conditions has acted with perfect good faith throughout. Every step taken before the Master, and all the instructions put before the conveyancing counsel to the court, with his opinions, have been carefully examined before me, as also have the abstract, requisitions on title, and answers. It appears to me that all concerned in the sale believed, and had reasonable ground for believing, that a good title could be made to the dwelling-rooms in question subject to a doubt which might be fairly provided against by condition. The draft particulars of sale, with abstract of title and instructions, were duly laid before the conveyancing counsel. I think these instructions are most clear and reflect credit upon the gentleman who prepared them. There was a considerable difficulty in identifying the property the subject-matter of the action, so far as regards No. 21, and particularly in reference to the dwelling-rooms over the coach-houses. It would take too long, and would serve no useful purpose, to go through every detail, but I must mention two matters. Mr.

William Rice, the tenant, was in occupation, by his manager, of the whole of lots 21 and 22, including all the rooms over. He held also several other tenements in Mason's-yard. He had taken from the trustees of one Smith, in 1890, assignments of several leasehold properties in Mason's-yard, including that comprised in a lease dated the 31st of August, 1870, made between the predecessors in title of the parties to the action of Norton v. Norton and William Seymour whereby certain property was demised to Seymour for 21 years from the 24th of June, 1870, at the rent of £200 a year.

The parcels in this lease expressly include the rooms over No. 22, and make no mention of rooms over No. 21, but they do appear to include part, if not all, of the ground floor of that tenement. There is a small plan on this lease, not, however, incorporated in the description, which appears to include part, but not the whole, of the site of No. 21. The term granted by this lease having come to an end in June, 1891, a fresh lease was granted to Rice, dated the 26th of June, 1891, of premises by the same description as in the former lease, for twenty-one years from the 24th of June, 1891, at a rent of £200 a year. There was no plan upon this lease. Rice never paid rent to any person for the rooms over No. 21 (unless the rent of £200 a year included rent for them) and he had so informed the vendor's solicitors. There were other matters, all of which are fully detailed in the instructions before mentioned, for rendering it a matter of serious doubt whether any portion of No. 21, but especially whether the rooms over, were the vendor's property; and, in advising the conveyancing, counsel says: "Upon the whole, on the above carefully-prepared statement, I am of opinion that the coach-house and harness-room in question" (that is, No. 21) "are most probably part of the trust estate, but not the rooms over the same, with any certainty, and that an adverse claim might at any time arise to them for some years to come; the conditions and particulars of sale must be accordingly." In the particulars as then settled a note appears: "Note. The dwelling rooms over the eastern coach-houses, harness-room, and way thereto, and the five-stall stable, do not certainly form part of this property for sale. . . ." I need not read it, but amongst the conditions as originally settled was one (No. 7) mentioning the fact that there was some doubt as to the exact extent of the property comprised in the title as mentioned in the particulars of sale, and providing that, as to such part of the property as to which there was any such doubt, the purchaser should accept a conveyance from the vendor so far only as he could make the same. Condition 10, as originally settled, provided for a declaration by the tenant that the premises for sale had been held, in conformity with the title, as deduced, for twenty years, and precluding any question as to identity or quantity. The matter subsequently came before the master, when he directed that an endeavour should be made to arrange with Mr. Rice to take a new lease at the old rent of all the property proposed to be included in the sale, and, after this course had been approved in conference with the conveyancing counsel, negotiations were entered into, resulting in an acceptance by the tenant of a new lease, dated the 3rd of May, 1897, by a description clearly including the whole of the property. The master then considered that the grant of the new lease would probably enable counsel to modify condition 7, and the statement in the particulars as to its being uncertain whether parts of the property were included, and he expressed a view that it was desirable they should be modified, if possible. The solicitors to the parties having the conduct of the sale did not see their way to getting the declarations mentioned in condition 10, or in the observation in the margin of the former instructions. The rate-books had been examined by the solicitor to see if Earl Beauchamp was entered as owner of the rooms, but it was discovered that in 1885, a time when the lease of 1870 was running, Earl Beauchamp was entered as owner of No. 18, described as a coach-house, but not as owner of any other premises in the yard. These fresh facts were clearly stated in further instructions laid before the conveyancing counsel, who then resettled particulars and conditions of sale in their present form, and added to his former opinion: "On my further instructions I am able to withdraw this observation" (an observation that he thought the attention of the chief clerk should be drawn to his very special instructions and his notes thereon, and in accordance with which the particulars and conditions had been settled) "and have resettled the particulars and conditions in accordance therewith, and as suggested by the master, in which suggestion I cordially agree, and the sale may proceed upon this." This opinion is dated the 14th of May, 1897, and the sale then took place in due course. An abstract was furnished and examined, requisitions were made and answered, and the title was accepted, after which the sale was duly completed. The only requisition calling for notice is part of the seventh, which is: "What was the object of granting this lease (referring to the lease of 1897) for a concurrent term with the then subsisting lease of 1870?" (meaning 1891). To which the reply was: "The lease was granted with the sanction of the court in the action." The purchaser was apparently satisfied with the answer. It also appears that a letter was written to Mr. Rice, the tenant, making some inquiry as to his tenancy, but this was never received, or replied to, and a clerk was also sent to inquire of him, but the clerk only saw some person on the property who could give no information, and then this matter also was dropped. It was not until more than a year after the conveyance that proceedings were commenced by Earl Beauchamp, and it was not until some months after that that the existence of the cellar was discovered.

In my opinion the purchaser is not entitled to claim compensation under the ninth condition, inasmuch as it does not, and is not intended to, apply to the case of a defect of title, but only to error or misstatement in the description of the subject-matter of the sale, such, for example, as an error in quantity or nature or tenure or amount of the vendor's interest. In the present case there is no error or misstatement in the description of the property; the real complaint is that no title can be shown to a part of the property so described. In 27 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, at p. 313, there is a note of a case Ex parte Riches, which does not appear in any of the regular reports, but the note itself appears to be full and careful, and I see no reason to doubt its accuracy. In that case a question arose as to the effect of a condition for compensation contained in a contract for sale of real estate. Property described as freehold was put up for sale under the order of the court in an action in the Chancery Division, and the conditions of sale provided that "if any error, misstatement, or omission shall appear to have been made in or from the above particulars or these conditions, such error, misstatement, or omission is not to annul the sale or entitle the purchaser to be discharged from his purchase, but compensation is to be made to or by the purchaser, as the case may be, and the amount of such compensation is to be settled by the judge at chambers." Before the purchase was completed the vendor, a mortgagor, had filed a liquidation petition, and the purchase was completed by his trustee, who executed a conveyance to the purchaser, entering into the ordinary trustee's covenants. About two years after the conveyance the vendor died, and it was then discovered that as to part of the property sold he, instead of being owner in fee, had only a life estate. The purchaser claimed compensation under the above condition of sale, and applied, in the first instance, to the Bankruptcy Court, which refused his application, and in the Court of Appeal affirming this decision, Jessel, M.R., said that it was a very hard case, but he could not see his way to assist the applicant. In his opinion the condition as to compensation did not apply to the case of a defect of title. The representation in the particulars of sale was that the estate was a freehold estate, and so it was if it was only a life estate, though he agreed that both parties understood it to mean an estate in fee simple. But taking it that the representation was that it was an estate in fee simple, still the condition as to compensation did not apply. With this judgment Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ., concurred. This appears to be a clear decision as to the non-applicability of such a condition to a defect in title. See also In re Beyfus and Master's Contract, where, however, the condition provided for errors "in the description of the property." Apart from condition, compensation cannot be recovered after conveyance in respect of defect of title: see Clayton v. Leech, a decision of the Court of Appeal approving Besley v. Besley. There remains the question whether or not the purchaser is entitled to the alternative relief he asks, of rescission on the ground of mutual mistake. This is relief which may undoubtedly be granted in a proper case even after conveyance, although there has been nothing in the nature of fraud. In Bingham v. Bingham the bargain and conveyance were nugatory, the defendant had nothing to sell or convey. This case has been repeatedly approved and acted upon: see per Lord Cranworth in Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R 2 H. L. 149, at p. 164, and per Vice-Chancellor Hall in Jones v. Clifford, 24 W. R. 979, 3 Ch. D. 779, at pp. 791-2. Lord Selborne, in Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas., at pp. 936, 937, points out that where there are errors in the particulars unconnected with fraud when the conveyance takes place it is not the principle of equity that relief should afterwards be given against that conveyance, unless there be a case of fraud, or a case of misrepresentation amounting to fraud, by which the purchaser may have been deceived; and after citing Bell's Principles as to the Law of Scotland, to the effect that where there is no warrandice the purchaser has remedy against the deficiency only on one of two grounds—either he must make out a case of misrepresentation and fraud, or he must prove an error in substantialibus sufficient to annul the whole contract—Lord Selborne continues: "It appears to me that the cases which have been decided in this country and in Ireland are to the same effect." He also refers to what was said by Lord Cottenham in Wilde v. Gibson, 1 H. L. Cas. 605, at p. 620, and to Legge v. Croker, 1 Ball & B. 506.

Assuming that there has been a common mistake on the part of vendor and purchaser in the present case, and assuming that there need not be a total failure of consideration to justify rescission after conveyance, still I do not consider that the error has been of such a nature as to justify it in the present case. I am not quite sure that the vendor and purchaser both shared in the same mistake. The vendor thought he was entitled, subject to a possible risk, and the purchaser, if he thought in like manner, took the risk. If, however, he absolutely thought the vendor entitled, without any risk, the mistake was not the same on both sides. I do not think the plaintiff can succeed on the ground of mutual mistake, and there are other and serious difficulties in his way. I do not see how he could, under any circumstances, obtain repayment of his purchase-money from the defendant trustee, who has not had it. The purchase-money has been dealt with by the order of the court, and I think the trustee vendor must, under those circumstances, be exonerated from liability. Upon the whole case I think the plaintiff fails and the action must be dismissed, and with costs, unless the defendants see their way to forgo them.

Action dismissed.

LEVER v. KOFFLER. (a.)

Specific performance—Alternative offers—Verbal acceptance—Agreement for yearly tenancy—Statute of Frauds.

Specific performance will be decreed of a verbal and written acceptance of one of two alternatives contained in a duly signed offer, if the offer accepted can be identified, and of an agreement to let on a yearly tenancy.

Trial of action.

The defendant was the owner of a house and land at Colwyn Bay, known as Min-y-don.

There had been some negotiations with a view to a tenancy of this property by the plaintiff, and on the 12th of April, 1900, Mr. J. A. Porter, the authorized agent of the defendant, wrote to the plaintiff the following letter:

"Estate Office, Colwyn Bay,
April 12th, 1900.

"Re Min-y-don.

"Dear Sir.—I interviewed the owner this morning and after a lengthy discussion got him to agree to the following proposal, which is firm and will be open for your consideration up to Thursday next at 12 noon.

He will let you the place upon an annual tenancy only at the rent of one hundred and fifty pounds (£150) and will allow you twenty pounds towards decorating, &c. Should the owner require possession and serve you with notice to quit at the end of the second year he will allow you the sum of fifty pounds (£50) as compensation for disturbance.

Do., do., Third Year, do. the sum of Thirty Pounds (£30).

Do., do., Fourth Year, do. the sum of Twenty-five Pounds (£25).

Do., do., Fifth Year, do. the sum of Twenty Pounds (£20).

Immediate possession would be given. Tenancy to commence at Midsummer, 1900."

The letter also contained at the foot the following offer to sell the plaintiff part of the property:

"He will sell you the residence, outbuildings, gardens, and grounds, the whole covering an area of four acres only with entrance to Beach-road and right of way over New-road from Abergele-road, reserving to himself the right to define boundaries of the land included in the four acres, at the price of five thousand pounds (£5,000).

"Mortgage of £4,000 at 4½ per cent. can be left on; this proposal also is open for your consideration up to Thursday next at 12 noon. The owner will not grant any option of purchase in the tenancy agreement.—Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) J. A. PORTER."

At 11.30 a.m. on the 19th the plaintiff called at Mr. Porter's office and verbally accepted the terms, and then and there wrote the following memorandum:

"Colwyn Bay, April 19th, 1900.

"J. A. Porter, Esq.

"Referring to your offer of Min-y-don of the 12th of April, I hereby accept same on the conditions named therein.—Yours faithfully,

"(Signed) ELLIS LEVER."

The defendant subsequently repudiated the offer to let, and contended that the plaintiff had accepted the offer to purchase, and eventually the plaintiff issued his writ claiming specific performance of the agreement to let and damages.

Hewitt, for the plaintiff.—The verbal and written acceptance sufficiently indicated an acceptance of the offer to let. The agreement is for a tenancy for two years certain, and thenceforward from year to year, and the court will decree specific performance.

He cited De Brassac v. Martyn, 11 W. R. 1020.

Rowden, K.C., and Gatey, for the defendant.—The offer contained alternatives, and the acceptance did not specify which alternative was accepted, nor did it contain the terms. There is, therefore, no memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. But in any case the agreement is for a yearly tenancy only, and the court will not grant specific performance of this: Clayton v. Illingworth, 10 Hare 451.

BYRNE, J., held on the evidence that it was clear that the plaintiff's verbal acceptance related to the offer of the tenancy. He continued: But I think the written acceptance further indicates with sufficient clearness that that was the offer which the plaintiff accepted, for it begins with the words "Referring to your offer of Min-y-don." This shows that he accepted Min-y-don—that is, the whole property; and the only offer of the whole property was the offer to let, for the offer to sell related to part of it only. Then it continues, "I hereby accept same on the conditions named therein." Thus we have a reference to the property and a reference to the terms, and the parties are identified; and I hold, following the dictum of Lord Cairns in Hussey v. Horne Payne, 27 W. R. 585, 4 App. Cas. 311, at p. 317, that this is sufficient to create a binding contract. It was argued that if you make an offer to sell two houses and the offer of one of them is accepted, no binding contract is created, but I cannot agree to this, and I think all that is necessary is identification of the property, the parties, and the terms. But then it is further contended that the agreement was one for a yearly tenancy only, and Clayton v. Illingworth is cited as an authority for the proposition that the court will not decree specific performance of such an agreement. With regard to this point, I think in the first place that the offer was one of a tenancy for two years certain and thenceforward from year to year. This appears from the agreement for compensation upon notice to quit "at the end of the second year." But apart from this I do not think that Clayton v. Illingworth really supports this contention. I do not think the case really means more than this, that in it the court was of opinion that there was already a binding agreement at law, and that to require the execution of a further instrument would only have put the tenant to needless expense, and that the action was therefore an idle one. On the other hand, the case of De Brassac v. Martyn is an authority for the view that the court will decree specific performance of an agreement even for a yearly tenancy if a proper case is made out. I hold, therefore, that the action succeeds, and I decree specific performance with costs and an inquiry as to damages.

UNDERWOOD v. LONDON MUSIC HALL (LIMITED) AND OTHERS. (a.)

Company—Memorandum—Right to issue pre-preference shares—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 12.

Clause 5 of the memorandum of a limited company was as follows: "The capital of the company is £60,000, divided into 6,000 preference shares of £5 each and 6,000 ordinary shares of £5 each. Such preference shares shall confer a right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of £7 per centum per annum. Any shares of the present or any increased capital of the company may be guaranteed or have any special privilege or advantage, or may be deferred and may be issued on such special conditions as to priority or postponement, either for dividends or repayment of principal, or as to voting power, and generally on such terms as the company may from time to time determine."

Held, that the company had power to increase its capital by issuing preference shares having priority over the original preference shares.

Motion, treated by consent as the trial of the action.

The action was brought by H. T. Underwood (who was one of the directors of the company) on behalf of himself and the other holders of preference shares against the company and the other directors for (1) a declaration that it was ultra vires for the company to increase their authorized capital by creating preference shares ranking in priority to or pari passu with the 6,000 preference shares mentioned in clause 5 of the memorandum of association; and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants, other than the company, and each of them from convening or holding any meeting of the members of the company for the purpose of authorizing the creation of and also from creating preference shares of the company ranking in priority to or pari passu with the existing 6,000 preference shares.

The motion was for an injunction in the terms of the second part of the claim.

The question turned upon clause 5 of the memorandum of association set out above.

E. W. Martelli, for the plaintiff, contended that the company had no power to take away or lessen any rights of the preference shareholders fixed by the memorandum of association.

He referred to Ashbury v. Watson, 33 W. R. 882, 30 Ch. D. 376, and to Buckley on Companies (7th ed.), p. 18, as to the word "conditions" contained in clause 12 of the Companies Act, 1862.

A. R. Kirby, for the company and the directors other than the plaintiff, argued that clause 5 of the memorandum gave the requisite power, and the clause was supported by the articles; there was nothing in the clause to take away from the company the power to alter the rights of shareholders, as established in

(a.) Reported by W. MORRIS CARTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Andrews v. Gas Meter Co., 45 W. R. 321, [1897] 1 Ch. 361.

E. W. Martelli, in reply, said that the rights of the preference shareholders were here fixed by the memorandum and were therefore unalterable.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—The company desire to increase their capital by the issue of shares having a preference over the original £7 per cent. preference shares. I think it is competent for the company to do this. The memorandum of association cannot be altered by the company, but the memorandum itself, after defining the position of the original shareholders, states that any increased capital may be issued on such special conditions as to priority as the company may determine. The result is that the £7 per cent. preference shareholders, while having an absolute right as against the original shareholders, are subjected, by the memorandum itself, to the risk of having increased capital placed in front of them. The clause is ill-drawn, because it is difficult to see how it can apply to the present or original capital, but I do not think it is so obscure that I ought to decline to give effect to it. I must therefore dismiss the action.

Motion refused.

METROPOLITAN ELECTRIC SUPPLY CO. (LIMITED) v. GINDER. (a.)

Injunction — Contract — Implied negative stipulation — Undue preference — Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 59), ss. 19, 20.

Where a contract, although affirmative in form, is negative in substance, the court will, notwithstanding the absence of a negative stipulation, imply one, and grant an injunction accordingly, upon the principle of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604.

A customer of an electric lighting company agreed "to take the whole of the electric energy required for the premises" for five years. He did not bind himself to take any quantity at all. There was no express negative stipulation.

Held, that the court would imply a negative stipulation, and grant an injunction against his taking electric energy from anyone else.

An electric lighting company were empowered under their provisional orders (duly confirmed) to supply a district with electric energy. They agreed to supply a customer for five years at 4½d. a unit upon his taking the whole of his supply from them. They were supplying another customer for two years at 4d., but he was a large consumer, and took his supply in the daytime, which was an advantage to the company.

Held, that the supply to this customer was not an undue preference, and that, consequently, the contract with the first-named consumer was not wanting in consideration.

Held, also, that the contract was authorized by sections 19 and 20 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and the provisional orders of the company.

This was an action by an electric lighting company for an injunction to restrain the defendant from taking his electrical energy elsewhere, upon an agreement to take the whole from them.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff company were empowered by the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Mid-London) Provisional Order, confirmed by the Electrical Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 5) Act, 1889, to supply electrical energy to a large district in London, consisting of the parishes of Holborn and St. Giles and the Strand.

By section 46 of their order the undertakers, upon being required by the owner or occupier of premises within a certain distance of their mains, "were to give and continue to give a supply of energy for such premises in accordance with the provisions of this order."

Section 47, after providing for the service by the consumer of a notice of the supply he required, provided that he should "enter into a written contract with the undertakers (if required by them so to do) to receive and pay for a supply of energy for a period of at least two years" of an amount to be specified.

By section 52 the undertakers were empowered to make any agreement with the consumer subject to the provisions of their order and the Electric Lighting Acts as to price. The limit of their charge was 8d. a unit.

The defendant, who was the keeper of a public-house in Holborn, the "Red Lion," signed in November, 1898, a request, or, as it was called in the proceedings, a "contract," addressed to the plaintiff company, requesting them to supply his premises with electric energy, and agreeing to take all such electric energy, subject to the Electric Lighting Acts and the company's provisional orders, and subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, of which the first two were:

"(1) The consumer agrees to take the whole of the electric energy required for the premises mentioned below from the company for a period of not less than five years.

"(2) The charge for electric energy to be 4½d. per Board of Trade unit."

The premises mentioned below were the "Red Lion." There was no negative stipulation as to taking the supply. The plaintiff company thereupon supplied the defendant company as requested.

In February, 1901, the defendant decided to leave the plaintiff company, and he wrote to them that he was dissatisfied with their light, and requested them to take their meter away, and let him have their account; and he proceeded to take his supply from the County of London and Brush Provincial Electric Lighting Co. (Limited), which had also statutory powers of supplying the district.

In March, 1901, the plaintiff company issued the writ in the action, asking for an injunction to restrain the defendant until the 16th of November, 1903, from taking the whole or any part of the electric energy required for the said premises from any person or company other than themselves, in breach of the agreement of the 16th of November, 1898.

The action was heard without pleadings. The defendant alleged that the plaintiff company had failed to give him a proper supply of energy, but the learned judge found against this allegation. It was, however, proved that the plaintiff company had supplied other persons for various terms at 4½d. a unit, and also had supplied one customer under a contract for two years at 4d. a unit.

Astbury, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiff company.—The contract is in effect a negative one. The defendant does not agree to take any energy at all, but only not to take it from anyone else. The principle, therefore, of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 D. M. & G. 604, applies, and the court can enforce it by injunction: Catt v. Tourle, 17 W. R. 939, L. R.

4 Ch. App. 654. It is not necessary that there should be an express negative stipulation, it may be implied: see observations of Lord Selborne in Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., L. R. 16 Eq. 433, at p. 440, 22 W. R. Dig. 118; and of Fry, J., in Donnell v. Bennett, 31 W. R. 316; 22 Ch. D. 835. Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, 39 W. R. 433, [1891] 2 Ch. 416, which may be cited against us, was a case of personal service, and is distinguishable.

Swinfen Eady, K.C., and Stewart Smith, for the defendant.—Catt v. Tourle turned upon the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774. The contract in Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman was almost exactly the same as the one here, and there the court refused to grant an injunction. In Fothergill v. Rowland, 22 W. R. 42, 17 L. R. Eq. 132, also, an injunction was refused. Besides, the contract here is void as made without consideration. Other persons were supplied at 4½d. or 4d., and therefore the defendant had a right to have it at that price without binding himself in return: see sections 19 and 20 of the Electric Lighting Act. 1882; The Diphwys Casson Slate Co. (Limited), v. Festiniog Railway Co., 2 Nev. & Mac. 73; Holland v. Festiniog Railway Co., 2 Nev. & Mac. 278.

Astbury, in reply.—The plaintiff company have power given them to make these contracts by section 20 of the Act of 1882 and section 52 of their special Act. The agreement with the customer at 4d. was not an undue preference, for there were special advantages to them in the supply required by him, as he was a large consumer and wanted a supply in the daytime. The contract made by the defendant is not, then, without consideration.

BUCKLEY, J.—The first defence is that there is no negative stipulation upon which the court can grant an injunction. I think that I must construe the contract without reference to the legal consequences of the one construction or the other. Upon this part of the case I will refer to the observations of Lord Selborne in Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., made with reference to the case of Lumley v. Wagner, and the court refusing to act upon the implication of a negative, but acting upon the expression of it: "I should think it was the safer and the better rule, if it should eventually be adopted by this court, to look in all such cases to the substance and not to the form. If the substance of the agreement is such that it would be violated by doing the thing sought to be prevented, then the question will arise whether this is the court to come to for a remedy. If it is, I cannot think that ought to depend on the use of a negative rather than an affirmative form of expression." The cases since these observations have, I think, gone to show that that principle has been adopted by the courts. Now, here the consumer agrees to take the whole of the energy required for his premises from the company. The company, when asked, were bound under the statute to supply it. The consumer does not agree to take any energy at all; he may burn gas if he likes, and require none. The only bargain is as to the price, which was fixed at 4½d. The essence of the contract is an implied agreement by the defendant not to take from anyone else. Now it is said that the case of Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, where an injunction was refused, is the same as this. There the defendant said he would "give the whole of his time." But that was a case of a contract for personal services. And the parties did not contemplate any negative agreement, that the defendant should not serve others. On the other hand, there is the case of Catt v. Tourle, which is equally on all fours with the present, where the defendant agreed that the plaintiff should have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, &c., to him, and where an injunction was granted. It is said that that case turned on the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay. But the court were of opinion that from the above words they might imply a negative, and grant an injunction. Fothergill v. Rowland was a case of the sale of goods, and turned on the fact that damages were a complete remedy. In Donnell v. Bennett, where there were express negative words, Fry, J., granting an injunction, said: "The court ought to look at what is the nature of the contract between the parties, and if the contract as a whole is the subject of equitable jurisdiction, then an injunction may be granted in support of the contract, whether it contain or does not contain a negative stipulation." I think, then, that the fact that the contract here is affirmative, and not negative in form, is no ground for refusing an injunction. Next it is said that the contract was invalid because it purported to bind the parties for a term of years. But this contract is less than those authorized by sections 46 and 52 of the order, and therefore valid, because under them the company may require the consumer to receive a supply for at least two years, while here the consumer had not bound himself to take any at all. Next it is said that this contract is invalid under section 20 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, because there were contracts with other consumers at the same rate but for different terms of years, and one with a customer, Gates, for two years at 4d. a unit, and that these different terms and this different rate were not justified by the Act. But Gates was a very large customer, and moreover he burnt largely upon the day lead as distinguished from the night lead, a circumstance which to those companies is of great importance. Now the companies are entitled to take these matters into consideration in fixing the price. The circumstances in such a case are not similar to those of persons who are not on the day lead. Sections 19 and 20 of the Act of 1882, which are supplemented by sections 46 and 52 of the Mid-London order, are a direct statutory authority that the company may contract as to charges within their statutory limit of 8d. I think this is a contract which the plaintiff company were entitled to make, and that they should succeed in the action.

In re YOUMANS' WILL. (a.)

Will—Rule in Shelley's case.

A testator devised certain property to trustees upon trust to receive the rents, &c., and to pay the outgoings and certain annuities for life to the testator's cousins, and then to pay the residue of the rents and profits to D. for life, and after the respective deceases of the said cousins and D., upon trust to convey the property, together with any accumulations of rents in the hands of the trustees, unto the right heirs of D.

Held, that, by virtue of the rule in Shelley's case, the hereditaments belonged to D. in fee, subject to the annuities.

(a.) Reported by H. CLAUGHTON SCOTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Petition by William Douglas for payment out to him of a fund in court.

R. Youmans, by his will dated the 21st of August, 1877, devised the residue of his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to trustees upon trust to receive the rents and profits thereof, and after the necessary payments to maintain the same, to pay thereout certain annuities to his cousins therein mentioned for their respective lives, and then to pay the residue of such net rents and profits half-yearly to William Douglas for his life, and from and after the respective deceases of the testator's said first cousins and the said William Douglas, upon trust to convey, surrender, and assign the said freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates respectively, together with any accumulations of rents in the hands of the trustees, unto the right heirs of the said William Douglas.

The testator died in 1877.

Part of the estate comprised in this devise was purchased under their compulsory powers by the Great Central Railway Co., and the purchase-money was paid into court under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

One of the annuitants alone remained alive; and she had released from her annuity the land taken by the company.

JOYCE, J.—It appears to me that subject to what the effect of the will may be with regard to the period, if any, between the death of the petitioner and that of the annuitant if she survive him, the petitioner is, by virtue of the rule in Shelley's case, owner of the equitable fee simple of the property. It is clear that there would not be an accumulation of the surplus rents for more than twenty-one years from the death of the petitioner, and I am of opinion that any surplus rents accruing after that period would not be undisposed of but would belong to the right heirs of the petitioner. I am, therefore, of opinion that the property, subject to the annuity, belongs to the petitioner in fee simple. The annuitant having released her annuity, the petitioner is entitled to an order for payment out to him.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright and Darling, JJ.) March 26.

In re TAYLOR.
Ex parte TAYLOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Annulment of adjudication—Payment of debts in full—Discretion to refuse annulment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 35.

Where a bankrupt has been guilty of serious misconduct in the course of the bankruptcy, the court will refuse to annul the adjudication, even though the bankrupt has paid his debts and the costs of the bankruptcy in full.

Appeal by the bankrupt from the refusal of the registrar of the county court at Greenwich to annul the adjudication.

Taylor, the bankrupt, was a public-house broker and auctioneer.

In June, 1899, a client named Titley brought an action against him for negligence in connection with the purchase of a public-house, and obtained judgment for a sum amounting, with costs, to about £345.

Taylor failed to pay this amount, and Titley presented a bankruptcy petition against him.

A receiving order was made thereon upon the 26th of September, 1899.

Upon the 6th of October the bankrupt filed his statement of affairs showing liabilities amounting to £386, and a claim for £1,000 against a debtor as the only asset. In his private examination by the official receiver he also failed to disclose any cash assets.

Upon the 17th of November the bankrupt handed to the official receiver the sum of £450, which was more than sufficient to pay the whole of his debts with interest, and the costs of the bankruptcy. At his public examination upon the 21st of November he admitted that such sum of £450 formed part of a sum of £500 which he had failed to disclose in his private examination and in his statement of affairs. He asked leave to correct his omissions, and stated that he desired to pay all his debts in full. The examination was closed upon the 12th of December.

The official receiver paid all the creditors in full and the expenses of the bankruptcy out of the £450, and had a balance of £18 remaining. He made his report upon the conduct of the bankrupt upon the 16th of February, 1900, but no order for prosecution was made thereon.

In 1901 the bankrupt applied for the annulment of the adjudication upon the ground that all his debts had been paid in full. The official receiver opposed the application, which was refused by the registrar upon the grounds that the bankrupt had been guilty of misconduct in concealing the sum of £500, and that he had been guilty of fraud in connection with a bill of sale.

The bankrupt appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—A bankrupt who is quite solvent should be entitled as of right to his discharge. [WRIGHT, J.—He has been guilty of two misdemeanours under the Debtors Act—false statement of affairs, and concealment of assets.] In In re Duncan, 40 W. R. 409, [1892] 1 Q. B. 879, the misconduct was much worse, nevertheless the court annulled the adjudication. It has always been the practice hitherto, in cases where the debts have been paid in full, and the debtor has been through his public examination, to annul the adjudication without regard to any misconduct of the debtor.

S. G. Lushington, for the official receiver, was not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—I cannot possibly say that in this case the registrar was wrong in the exercise of his discretion. The bankrupt was admittedly guilty of two of the most serious offences that a bankrupt can commit He could never have obtained his discharge except for special reasons, and the registrar rightly thought that such a person ought to be punished by the stigma of undischarged bankruptcy. The registrar's decision cannot be got over by saying that whenever a bankrupt has paid his debts in full he is entitled to have his adjudication annulled, and suggesting that the court has no discretion under section 35 to refuse annulment in such a case. I am clearly of opinion that the court has a discretion, and that in such a case as the present an application for annulment ought not to be entertained until at least five years after the bankruptcy.

DARLING, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Feb. 5; March 5.

"THE DEERHOUND." (a.)

Ship—Admiralty—Demurrage—Liability of charterers of ship and consignees of cargo.

The defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel, and guaranteed that the charter-party would be carried out in its entirety and on the conditions as to time provided therein and as to payment of demurrage legally incurred according to the terms of the charter-party. The defendants sold the cargo to the consignees, who were the holders of the bills of lading. On the arrival of the ship at the port of discharge, the consignees, having other ships in dock, were not permitted by the dock regulations to at once berth the plaintiffs' ship, and delay in discharging was thereby incurred, in respect of which demurrage was claimed from the defendants.

Held, that, inasmuch as the consignees had become agents of the charterers to receive the cargo and pay the freight in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, the charterers were not liable.

This was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the county court of Glamorganshire.

The plaintiffs, who were the Ogmore Steamship Co., were owners of the steamship Deerhound, and claimed from the defendants, Messrs. Borner & Co., the charterers of the plaintiffs' vessel, a sum of £22 as demurrage and £43 10s. 10d. as balance of freight.

The Deerhound was a vessel of 1,052 tons register, and was chartered to carry a cargo of iron ore from Porman to Senhouse Dock, Maryport.

The charter-party provided that the ship should discharge at one shilling per ton, but under the circumstances hereinafter appearing it was actually discharged at one shilling and fourpence per ton, and for this balance of freight the claim for £43 10s. 10d. was made.

The Deerhound arrived at Maryport on the 13th of June, but did not get into dock until midnight on the 15th of June.

Her charter-party, however, stipulated that she was to be berthed within twenty-four hours of her arrival.

The dock authorities had a bye-law by which they refused to allow, owing to the limited accommodation in the dock, more than one vessel at a time to be berthed to discharge or load for or from the same consignees or consignors, and on the arrival of the plaintiffs' vessel in the Senhouse Roads, Messrs. Cammells, the consignees of the cargo, had other ships in dock waiting to discharge. The dock authorities therefore refused to allow The Deerhound to enter the dock, and she was not actually berthed for discharging purposes until 10 p.m. on the 26th of June.

One of the questions sought to be determined by this appeal was whether the charterers of the vessel or the consignees of the cargo were entitled to recover demurrage. Another point raised was as to the recovery of a balance of freight, deduction having been made by the defendants under the following circumstance: the charter-party stipulated that the vessel was to give the use of her cranes and winches with the necessary steam power, and the use of the ship's hands. The cargo was to be discharged at one shilling per ton.

When the vessel arrived at Maryport it appeared that there was a dislocation in the working of the dock, the consequence of which was that on the fall of the tide the vessels were left on the mud. This gave considerable extra trouble in discharging, and the stevedore, who was the charterers' agent, declined to discharge the ship at less than one shilling and fourpence per ton. The master, however, offered the use of his winches and his men, but the stevedore declined to accept them or to allow his men to work at all unless they did the whole of the discharging themselves.

Laing, K.C., and Sankey, for the appellants (the defendants in the court below).

Robson, K.C., and Bailhache, for the respondents, contended that there was no difference between the charterers' liability and the consignees'.

The following cases were in the course of the arguments cited: Watson v. Borner, 4 Com. Cas. 335; Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Co., L. R. 9 Q. B. 540; Tapscott v. Balfour, 21 W. R. 245, L. R. 8 C. P. 46.

March 5.—BARNES, J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court, said: This is an appeal from the decision of the county court judge at Cardiff in an action by the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Deerhound, against the defendants, the charterers of that vessel, holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to receive from the defendants £22 for twenty-two hours' demurrage at Maryport and in respect of a charge of 4d. per ton on the cargo discharged which had been deducted from the freight payable by the charterers. The facts were as follows: On the 28th of May, 1900, the vessel was chartered by the plaintiffs to the defendants by charter-party of that date to load at Cartagena or Porman a cargo of iron ore, and proceed to Maryport, Senhouse Dock, and there deliver the same as customary when and as directed by the consignees, to whom notice was to be given of the vessel being ready to discharge, paying for discharging 1s. per ton for freight, to be paid as in the charter-party mentioned. The charter-party provided that the cargo was to be shipped at the rate of 200 tons per working day of twenty-four consecutive hours (weather permitting), Sundays and holidays excepted, and to be discharged on the same conditions (subject to certain exceptions). Days to be averaged to avoid demurrage. Time not to count between the hours of 1 p.m. on Saturdays and 7 a.m. on Mondays unless used, and that the time for discharging should count when the ship was in every respect ready in berth, but berth guaranteed within twenty-four hours after arrival, or time to count and in free pratique as per custom of port, written notice of such readiness to be given to consignees during office hours. Ship to work night and day if requested to do so, and to give use of cranes and winches with necessary steam power and hands, charterers paying all extra expenses of night work. Demurrage (if any) at the rate of 20s. sterling per hour. Despatch money at the rate of half the demurrage, not less than 10s. per hour, to be settled in discharge port; steamer to be consigned to Messrs. Gibson & Greenup and Mr. Joseph Holmes at Maryport. There was a cessor clause in the charter, but by a letter of the 21st of June the charterers guaranteed that the charter-party would be carried out in its entirety and on the conditions as to time provided therein, and to pay any demurrage legally incurred according to the terms of the charter-party. After loading under the charter-party the vessel proceeded to Maryport, and arrived in the harbour outside the Senhouse Dock on Wednesday, the 13th of June, and on the 14th at 10 a.m. the master gave notice to Messrs. C. Cammells & Co. (Limited), the consignees and holders of the bills of lading, to whom the defendants had sold the cargo, that the vessel had arrived and was ready to discharge. At the time the vessel arrived as aforesaid the said consignees had other vessels at berths in the dock and waiting to discharge, and in consequence the vessel was not allowed, in accordance with the dock regulations, to enter the dock until midnight of the 15th. If the time is to count from the time at which the vessel entered the dock, it is admitted that she was afterwards duly discharged, but the plaintiffs claim that in the circumstances they are entitled to treat the time as counting from 10 a.m. on the 15th, and if they are right, I understand the effect would be to give them twenty-two hours' demurrage. The county court judge held that the case was governed by the case of Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Co., and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for twenty-two hours' demurrage. It was argued before this court that the decision was wrong in law, and also that the presence of the other vessels for the same consignees did not, according to the regulations, prevent The Deerhound from getting into dock. With regard to the second point, it seems clear that the case was based in the court below on the admissions of counsel, witnesses who were present to prove the facts, therefore, not being called, and that the case proceeded on the assumption that the fact that the consignees had other vessels at the berths in the dock and waiting to discharge did, according to the regulations and practice of the port, which the harbour-master acted on, prevent the vessel from getting into the dock until the night of the 15th, and I think the case must be decided on the principal point, which is one of general importance. Several cases were cited to us, but they appear to me to turn so much on their particular facts and the language of the particular charters that they are only indirectly of assistance in arriving at a conclusion in this case. In Tapscott v. Balfour, where a vessel was to proceed to a dock as ordered by the charterers and load coal, which would be supplied by a colliery agent and loaded from the tips, it was held that the lay days did not commence until the vessel got into dock, and that the charterers were not responsible for delay in her getting there caused by the colliery agent having three other vessels in the dock, and two more ready to go in, and not being permitted by the dock regulations to have more than three vessels in the dock at a time. It was the usual course to load through a colliery agent, and there was nothing improper or unreasonable in the course pursued by the charterers: see the remarks made by Bovill, C.J., L. R. 8 C. P., at p. 50. The next case is Ashcroft v. The Crow Orchard Colliery Co., which the judge of the court below acted on. In my opinion that case does not govern the present case and is entirely different from it both in the language of the contract and the facts. The charter was for the loading of the plaintiffs' vessel with a cargo of coal at the port of Liverpool, to be loaded with the usual despatch of the port, or if longer detained to be paid 40s. per day demurrage, and the charterers engaged to load "on the above terms," and by a memorandum at foot the vessel was to load in the "Bramley Moor or Wellington Docks High Level Railway." By one of the regulations of the docks no coal agent was to be allowed to have more than three vessels in the docks loading, and to load, at the cranes at one time. The charterers acted as their own coal agents, and as they had three other ships loading in the docks, and other charters in the books having priority over the plaintiffs' vessel, she was not allowed to go into dock for thirty days after she was ready to do so. The judgment in that case seems to me to have proceeded on the ground that the court construed the particular contract before them as imposing an absolute obligation to load the vessel with the usual despatch of the port and that it was immaterial to consider whether the delay occurred outside or inside the dock: see the observations on this case made by Lord Esher in Nelson v. Dahl, 28 W. R. 57, 12 Ch. D. 568, at pp. 588, 589, and by Lord Blackburne in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 28 W. R. 833, 5 App. Cas. 599, at p. 622. The last case was Watson v. Borner, 4 Com. Cas. 335, on appeal 5 Com. Cas. 377, where a steamship was chartered to carry a cargo to Dowlais Wharf, Cardiff. The cargo was sold by the charterers to the Dowlais Iron Co., the lessees of the wharf, which was in the Routh Dock, Cardiff. The company had the control of the wharf and the berthing of vessels there. The time for discharge according to the charter-party did not commence until 6 a.m. after the vessel was ready in berth. It was held that the charterers were not responsible for delay caused to the vessel in getting into berth, after she had got into dock, by the consignees in order to suit their business arrangements giving preference to other vessels which arrived at the dock after the plaintiffs' vessel. The ground of the decision appears to be that the owners of the vessel had agreed to take her to the wharf, that the delay was caused by the way in which the Dowlais Co. as proprietors of the wharf managed the business, and that the charterers were not responsible for this merely because the Dowlais Co. happened also to be the purchasers of the cargo. In the present case the plaintiffs agreed that the vessel should proceed to the Senhouse Dock, Maryport, and the charterers agreed, by the clauses in the charter-party as to discharge and guarantee of berth, to discharge her within a certain time after her arrival—that is, arrival in dock. It is the ordinary and natural implication that neither party should prevent the other from performing that part of the contract which falls to be performed by that other, and if the charterers by themselves or their agents, acting within the scope of their authority, had placed impediments in the way of the shipowners bringing their vessel into dock the charterers ought to be responsible for the delay so caused, as if the vessel had in fact arrived in dock. It appears to follow that if the charterers have other vessels which they have to discharge, and have arranged to discharge, in the dock before the vessel which by the charter is to proceed to the dock and by the practice of the port will not be admitted into the dock while the charterers have the other vessels in the way, the charterers do prevent the shipowners from performing their contract until the charterers have cleared away the impediments. The charterers, however, had sold the cargo to consignees. The position then is that those consignees became agents of the charterers to receive the cargo and pay the freight in accordance with the charter-party and their obligations arose after the vessel arrived in dock. It is true that the consignees had at the time of the vessel's arrival outside the dock other vessels at berths in the dock and waiting discharge, in consequence of which the plaintiffs' vessel was prevented from entering the dock, but the charterers are not, in my opinion, responsible for this. The engagements and actions of the consignees in relation to the other vessels were not entered into or taken by them as agents for the charterers. It was not contended there was anything unreasonable in the charterers selling the cargo to the particular consignees. The charterers would not know what the engagements of the consignees would be at the time of the vessel's arrival. As between the shipowners and charterers the delay is one of the risks taken by the shipowners when they agree to take their vessel to a particular dock. They could guard against it by proper stipulations in the charter-party. There appears to me to be nothing unreasonable in the view which I have expressed of the shipowners' position. It is contemplated in this class of case that the cargo may be sold. Very frequently the charterers' liability under the charter-party ceases by virtue of a cessor clause on shipment. It was so in this case but for the letter of guarantee above referred to. In such cases the shipowners have to look to the consignees only at the port of discharge, and for this purpose the bills of lading usually incorporate the terms of the charter. Even when the charterers remain liable on the charter for its due performance the cargo is frequently sold to consignees who have to act for the charterers in performing their obligations under the charter-party with regard to the cargo, but are not otherwise the agents for the charterers, and the shipowners will have such rights against the consignees, as such, as are provided for by the bills of lading, but as against the charterers only such rights as are conferred by the charter-party. The shipowners know that in ordinary course the cargo may be received by persons other than the charterers and over whose other engagements the charterers have no control, and there is nothing in the charter-party imposing on the charterers the risk of such other engagements preventing the vessel from reaching the spot to which it has been agreed that she shall go. The result in this case is that the defendants are not liable in my opinion for the delay occasioned before the vessel arrived in dock. There is another point turning on the facts of the case and not of general importance. Owing to repairs to the Senhouse Dock, it was only available as a tidal harbour when The Deerhound arrived, and the steamer grounded after tide fall when discharging, and in consequence it was necessary to use the winches. The master of the vessel was ready and willing to give the use of the winches with necessary steam power, and the ship's hands to work them, but the stevedore's men would not allow the crew to work the winches and insisted on doing it themselves and on being paid 4d. per ton additional for discharging. The defendants, as I understand, have deducted the amount of 4d. per ton on the cargo discharged from the freight, and the county court judge has held that they were not entitled to do so. I am of the same opinion on the facts. The shipowner was only to pay 1s. per ton for discharging, and he was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract. The loss through the extra demand of the stevedore's men must fall on the charterers. The appeal must be allowed as to the item for demurrage. In my opinion each of the parties should pay their own costs of the appeal, except that the costs of the printing of the record should be divided between them.

NICKOLL & KNIGHT v. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, & CO. (a.)

Sale of goods—Impossibility of performance—Implied condition—Shipment by named steamer—Damage to steamer rendering shipment impossible—Condition excusing vendor.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants sold to the plaintiffs a cargo of cotton seed to be shipped by a named steamer at Alexandria during the following January. The contract contained a clause that, in case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities preventing shipment, the contract was to be cancelled. The steamer, before arriving at Alexandria, stranded, without the defendants' default, and was so damaged that it became impossible to load the cargo in January; and in December the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice of this fact.

Held, by A. L. Smith, M.R., and Romer, L.J. (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), that the contract was subject to the implied condition that the parties should be excused if, before breach, performance became impossible owing to the steamer ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying steamer, without the defendants' default, when the time for the performance of the contract arrived.

Judgment of Mathew, J. ([1900] 2 Q. B. 298, 5 Com. Cas. 252, 48 W. R. Dig. 50), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mathew, J. (reported [1900] 2 Q. B. 298, 5 Com. Cas. 252, 48 W. R. Dig. 50).

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract dated the 24th of October, 1899, for the sale of a cargo of cotton seed.

The contract was in the form of the Cotton Seed Cargo Contract, 1892, issued by the Imperial Oil Seed Association.

By the contract the defendants sold to the plaintiffs a cargo to consist of from 1,600 to 1,900 tons of Egyptian cotton seed to be shipped at Alexandria and/or Port Said and/or Ismailia during the month of January, 1900, per the steamship Orlando, at £6 3s. 9d. per ton.

By clause 5 of the contract: "In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities preventing shipment, this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof is to be cancelled."

By clause 7: "This contract is to be void as regards any portion that may not arrive by the steamer declared against this contract."

In November The Orlando, which had been chartered to load the cotton seed at Alexandria for the United Kingdom, grounded in the Baltic, and sustained such damage that it became impossible for the necessary repairs to be executed in time for her to load the cargo in January.

On the 20th of December the defendants gave notice of this to the plaintiffs.

The writ in the present action was issued on the 28th of February, 1900, claiming as damages £2,740, being the difference between the contract price, £6 3s. 9d., and £7 13s., the market price per ton of cotton seed on the 31st of January. The defendants contended that, the performance of the contract having become impossible, there was no breach of contract; and further, that, if there had been a breach, the proper measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the market price at the end of December, when the defendants gave notice that it was impossible to carry out the contract, and they paid £750 into court calculated upon that basis.

Mathew, J., held that the contract was subject to the implied condition that the parties should be excused in case, before breach, performance became impossible, and that, therefore, there had been no breach of contract. He further said that, in his opinion, though it was not necessary to decide it, the plaintiffs were bound to mitigate the loss, when they were informed that the performance of the contract had become impossible, by purchasing another cargo at the end of December, and that therefore the sum paid into court would be the proper measure of damages in case there had been a breach of contract. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

Joseph Walton, K.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the plaintiffs.—There was no implied condition in the contract that the parties should be excused if the ship was prevented by some accident from going to Alexandria to ship the cotton seed. It was an absolute contract by the defendants to sell a cargo to be shipped at Alexandria. The defendants had to charter the ship and get her to Alexandria in January. The case is not like those cases where the existence of the thing is an implied condition of the contract, as in Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826.

They referred on this point to Shubrick v. Salmond, 3 Burr. 1637; Hills v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 253; Ashmore v. Cox, [1899] 1 Q. B. 436, 47 W. R. Dig. 41; Leake on Contracts (3rd ed.), p. 608. Secondly, the measure of damages ought to be the difference between the contract price and the market price at the end of January.

R. M. Bray, K.C., and E. Bray, for the defendants.—The decision of Mathew, J., was right. The case comes within the principle laid down by Blackburn, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell.

They also referred to Johnson v. Macdonald, 9 M. & W. 600; Robinson v. Davison, 19 W. R. 1036, L. R. 6 Ex. 269; Howell v. Coupland, 22 W. R. 691, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462, on appeal 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q B. D. 258.

Joseph Walton, K.C., replied.—In Taylor v. Caldwell the thing no longer existed. Here The Orlando was still in existence; she never ceased to be a ship. She merely could not get to Alexandria in time. There is no implied condition in the contract relieving the defendants if the ship shall not be able to get to Alexandria in time: Robinson v. Davison is not applicable, as that was a case of personal service.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an action for damages by the buyers of a cargo of Egyptian cotton seed against the sellers for not shipping the same pursuant to a contract dated the 24th of October, 1899, and the question is whether upon its true construction the contract is a positive and absolute contract to ship the seed or a contract subject to any, and what, implied condition. The contract upon which the question arises, so far as material, is as follows: Sold this day to Messrs. Nickoll & Knight the following Egyptian cotton seed—namely, a cargo to consist of from 1,600 to 1,900 tons to be shipped by the steamship Orlando at Alexandria . . . during the month of January, 1900. (Signed) Ashton & Co. Clause 5 is as follows: "In case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities preventing shipment, this contract or any unfulfilled part thereof is to be cancelled." It is perfectly plain upon the face of the signed contract that the parties deliberately agreed that the shipment of the seed should not be in any ship or ships, but in one particular named ship, for the words in print "ship or ships" are obliterated, and the words "per steamship Orlando" are inserted in writing in their place, and it is equally plain that the contract could only be performed by the defendants shipping the contracted seed in the steamship Orlando during the month of January, 1900, and in no other ship. Now, is a contract such as this a positive and absolute contract by the shipper to ship on board the named ship the contracted cargo, or is it a contract subject to any, and what, implied condition? I find in the judgment of Blackburn, J., delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1863 in Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826, which case has been followed and applied in the Exchequer Chamber in Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 127, and in the Court of Exchequer in Robinson v. Davison, 19 W. R. 1036, L R. 6 Ex. 269, and in the Queen's Bench in Howell v. Coupland, 22 W. R. 691, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462, affirmed in the Court of Appeal 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q. B. D. 258, that a rule as to the construction of certain contracts has been laid down, which rule is as follows: "Where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case before breach performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." In my judgment the contract in the present case falls directly within this rule, for from the beginning the parties must have known that the performance of the contract would become impossible unless the particular thing specified—that is, the steamship Orlando—continued to exist as a cargo-carrying ship down to and during the month of January, 1900; and I have no doubt that the true construction of the contract is that it is not a positive and absolute contract as contended for by the plaintiffs, but is a contract subject to the condition that the parties shall be excused if, before breach, performance becomes impossible by reason of the particular specified thing—that is, the steamship Orlando—ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship without the defendants' default. But it is argued that, although there may be this implied condition, it only applies if the particular thing actually perishes; for instance, it is suggested that, if the roof of the music-hall in Taylor v. Caldwell had alone been destroyed and the hall itself not burnt to the ground, the judgment in that case would not have been given, even although with the roof off the hall could not have been used for the purpose for which it was let, and it is said that, as the steamship Orlando did not actually perish, this case is not within the implied condition. I do not agree. In my judgment, if the ship ceased to exist as a cargo-carrying ship when the time for the performance of the contract arrived, so that it could not be used to ship the cargo in, the implied condition would attach. If the steamship had gone to the bottom before the month of January, 1900, and remained there during that month, so as to be wholly unable to take in a cargo, would not the ship have ceased to exist whereby the performance of the contract became impossible, the ship being then at the bottom of the sea? Quoad the performance of the contract, it would have perished; and what is the difference in principle between the ship being at the bottom of the sea and being stranded upon a rock in the Baltic, as the Orlando was, and thereby wholly unable to take in a cargo pursuant to the contract? In either case, in my opinion, the performance of the contract became impossible by reason of the particular specified thing—i.e., the ship ceasing to exist as a cargo-carrying ship, or, in other words, as regards that purpose having perished. This is not a case in which the thing contracted is possible in itself and the contracting party is only unable to perform it by causes beyond his own control, such as in the case of an unexpected sudden frost: Kearon

v. Pearson, 10 W. R. 12, 7 H. & N. 386. In such a case it is the party's own fault for undertaking unconditionally to fulfil a promise. In the present case, as before pointed out, he has not done so, for the promise he has made is conditional. It also seems to me that the suggested point of the detention of a ship by adverse winds would clearly not fall within the above rule, for in such a case the ship has not ceased to exist at all. It exists as a cargo-carrying ship, but is merely behind time on its voyage. The next point taken by the plaintiffs was that by reason of clause 5 of the contract the implied condition of the continued existence of the ship was negatived, and that it was only the matters mentioned in that clause which excused the performance of the contract. In my opinion the matters mentioned in clause 5 in no way negative the true construction of the contract, which is that the contract is not positive and absolute, and that clause 5 affords an excuse for the not shipping of the cargo over and above the perishing of the ship, which is the implied condition. In my judgment it is not true to say that there is a warranty in this contract that the ship shall be in existence in January, 1900. I think that the judgment of Mathew, J., is correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: I regret to say that I have come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the Master of the Rolls, and with which I understand Romer, L.J., agrees. The question in this case is whether, according to the true construction of the cotton seed cargo contract, there was an absolute contract by the sellers, the now defendants, to load a cargo in January. In other words, did the sellers take upon themselves the risk of the ship declared by them under this contract being prevented by unforeseen circumstances beyond their control from loading a cargo at one of the ports of loading named in the contract during the month of January, 1900? It was argued by the plaintiffs that there was an absolute contract, and that the defendants did take the risk from which they had not in terms protected themselves. On the other hand, it was argued by the defendants that this was a case of a cargo to be shipped by a particular vessel at a named port, at a particular time, and that the obligation to load was made to depend on the arrival of that vessel at that port at the proper time, and that the defendants had not warranted that the vessel should be able and ready to take the cargo on board at the stipulated time, and, therefore, that the defendants were in the event which had happened of the disability of the ship through perils of the sea, without default of the defendants, to take the cargo at Alexandria at the proper time, relieved from further performance of a contract which assumed the continued existence and safe arrival of the vessel in a condition fit to take the cargo. The obligation to ship the cargo, the defendants argued, was not absolute, but, in common with every other obligation in the contract, was conditional on the arrival in proper time of the declared vessel at Alexandria.

Now it was settled by the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell that "where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." Prior to the decision in Howell v. Coupland it used to be supposed that the doctrine as expressed by Blackburn, J., like the cases de certo corpore cited by him from the civil law, was based upon the assumption of the continued existence at the date for the fulfilment of the contract of something existing at the date of the making of the contract, which is obviously quite different from the present existence at the date for fulfilment of the contract of something to come into existence after the contract by the action of a party to it done in pursuance of the contract. The principle laid down in Taylor v. Caldwell was, however, somewhat widened in the case of Howell v. Coupland, for in that case it was decided that on a contract for the sale of a specific crop on particular land the seller is to be excused if performance is prevented by the subject-matter of the sale ceasing to exist, without default of the promisor, before the time of performance, even though the subject-matter of the contract was not in existence at the time of the contract, as is assumed, as it seems to me, in the principle as stated by Blackburn, J. The fact is that the answer to the question whether the obligation of the contract is dependent on the existence of some thing or combination of things at the time for fulfilment, or whether one party to the contract warrants the existence at that time of that thing or combination of things, is always a question of intention of the parties to be gathered from the contract as expressed, and the subject of it. Hannen, J., in Baily v. De Crespigny, 17 W. R. 494, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, thus expresses himself: "There can be no doubt that a man may by an absolute contract bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damages for the non-performance, and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking where the event which causes the impossibility was or might have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or where the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promisor. But where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words, which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens." Can it be said that the non-arrival of The Orlando at Alexandria in January (the event which caused the impossibility) was not or might not have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract? Or can it be said that that event cannot be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties? Or that the general words were not used with reference to the possibility of the contingency which afterwards happened—viz., the non-arrival in time at Alexandria of The Orlando by reason of the perils of the sea? I do not think so, nor do I think business people would think so. The time of loading is a condition introduced into the contract for the benefit of the buyers. It is a condition which the buyers could waive. The event which caused the impossibility of loading in January is an event against which the sellers could have insured. The selection of the vessel, the terms of the charter of that vessel, the risk which the vessel selected would have to run by reason of the length of the preliminary voyage, are all matters within the control of the sellers. The buyers have no voice in the matter. Is it unreasonable to read the general words as throwing on the sellers the risk of the non-arrival of the selected ship within the contract time? The sellers might have excepted this risk or insured against it. It seems to me that in order to prevent general words covering a particular obligation which in terms the general words are wide enough to include the particular obligation must be of the essence of the contract, and further, must be of the essence of the contract in such sense that neither party can waive the obligation; or, to express it in other words, the condition must be such that to waive it would be to make a new and a different contract. No doubt where a contract is made with reference to certain anticipated circumstances, and where without default of either party it becomes wholly inapplicable to any such circumstances, it cannot be applied to other circumstances which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made; but where a party to a contract promises the other party to do a certain thing, or to have a certain thing done, at or before a specified time, and fails to perform his promise, in such case even though the thing promised to be done is of the essence of the contract and a condition precedent, so that the promisor cannot claim to have the promisee carry out his side of the contract, this does not put an end to the contract in such sense that neither party can enforce any obligation under it against the other, but only gives the promisee the option to rescind the contract, unless indeed the anticipated circumstance which has failed to occur or continue is of such a character as to put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation entered upon by the parties to the contract. But a circumstance which one party to the contract can waive, without putting an end to the commercial speculation, cannot be such a circumstance. In the present case nothing has caused it to be impossible for the sellers to supply cotton seed of the contract quality or to prevent them shipping it on board The Orlando at Alexandria; the sellers, according to my view, took upon themselves to promise that the owners of The Orlando should have her at Alexandria ready to take the cargo at a specified time. The peril of the sea has made it impossible for the owners of The Orlando to have her there at that time, and made it impossible, therefore, for the sellers to load The Orlando at Alexandria in January, but this event has not made it impossible that the contract should be carried out. On the contrary, if the buyers chose to waive the time condition, the contract can be performed by loading The Orlando at Alexandria. Nothing in the facts of this case suggests that the delay for repairs was so long as to put an end to the commercial speculation intended by the parties to the contract. By reason of the perils of the sea The Orlando did not arrive at the time the shipowner contracted it should arrive, but the delay was not such that the voyage was frustrated, neither was the contract of sale. It follows that the plaintiffs had a good cause of action on the failure of the sellers to load the cotton seed, even though the perils of the sea made it impossible for The Orlando to arrive at Alexandria at the specified time. I have thought it right to express my opinion in this matter (which unfortunately is contrary to that of my brethren) although it is not, for a reason which I will give, of very great practical importance with regard to the result of the action, for I entirely agree with the opinion of Mathew, J., as to the measure of damages in case the plaintiffs have a right of action, for, according to this measure, the sum paid into court, together with a denial of liability, is more than sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' cause of action.

ROMER, L.J.—A clear principle, applicable to cases of this kind, was laid down by Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Taylor v. Caldwell. The passage in the judgment which states the principle has already been read. It was laid down after a review of all the cases and after very careful consideration. It has been followed in all the cases since that time, and has never been dissented from; and it works complete justice. It is a principle which is easy to follow, and affords a certain guide in a doubtful and difficult branch of the law. It is most useful to business men that the law on the subject should be clear and well defined, and the principle above referred to should be adhered to and not rendered doubtful or weakened by making exceptions to its application. Does that principle apply to the present case. In my opinion it does. I think that the parties to this contract must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless in January, 1900, the particular specified thing necessary for the carrying out of the contract—that is, the steamship Orlando, continued to exist; and they must at the date of the contract have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done. Then is there here any implied warranty by the defendants that the ship shall continue to exist? There is certainly no express warranty to that effect. Nor do I think that any such warranty can be implied. Some liability in respect of the ship on the part of the vendors must no doubt be implied, and difficult cases may arise as to the extent of this liability. But we have not in this case to decide as to the extent of that liability, for I think that it cannot be implied that the liability extended to a warranty that the ship would continue to exist. That being so, the principle applies. The next question is, Did the ship continue to exist in January, 1900, within the meaning of the statement of the principle. I think not. I think that the ship did not exist within the meaning of the phrase as used by Blackburn, J. The ship was not in January, 1900, in existence as a cargo-bearing ship. This fact has already been dealt with by the Master of the Rolls, and I need not add anything to what he has said. I should perhaps say with regard to the argument founded on clause 5 of the contract that that clause, in my opinion, does not affect the above view, for the different special circumstances dealt with in that clause all contemplate the existence of the ship. I therefore agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SPENCE v. COLEMAN AND INSPECTOR-GENERAL IN COMPANIES' LIQUIDATION. (a.)

Company — Winding-up — Undistributed assets—Payment in to Companies' Liquidation Account—Inspector-General—Shareholder—Garnishee order—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 15.

In order to put into force the garnishee procedure the judgment creditor must show that there was a debt due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor.

Payment to the Companies' Liquidation Account by a liquidator of a sum due to a judgment debtor does not constitute the relation of debtor and creditor as between the Inspector-General and the judgment debtor, and therefore the garnishee procedure does not apply.

This was an appeal from an order of Day, J., made in chambers, and raised a question of some importance as to the liability of officials of the Board of Trade with regard to money paid to the Companies' Liquidation Account by the liquidator of a company.

A company called the Bluebell Proprietary Co. (Limited) was wound up voluntarily, and the liquidator after paying the debts of the company and the costs of liquidation had a surplus in hand for distribution among the shareholders.

The defendant Coleman, one of the shareholders, had a sum of £116 19s. 5d. due to him.

The liquidator sent the usual notices to him, but he was absent abroad and his address was not known, and the notices were returned through the post.

Under these circumstances the liquidator, as he was required to do by section 15 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, paid the said sum of £116 19s. 5d. to the Companies' Liquidation Account at the Bank of England.

A creditor of Coleman named Spence recovered judgment against him for £1,829 18s. 9d., and he obtained from Day, J., a garnishee order absolute against the Inspector-General as garnishee, attaching the sum of £116 19s. 5d. to answer pro tanto the judgment debt.

The order was in the ordinary form, that "the said garnishee do forthwith pay to the said judgment creditor the debt due to him from the judgment debtor, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt, and that in default thereof execution may issue for the same."

The Inspector-General in Companies' Liquidation appealed.

The Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 15, provides: "(3) If it appears . . . that any liquidator of a company has in his hands or under his control any money representing unclaimed or undistributed assets of the company which have remained unclaimed or undistributed for six months after the date of their receipt, the liquidator shall forthwith pay the same to the Companies' Liquidation Account at the Bank of England . . . (5) Any person claiming to be entitled to any money paid into the Bank of England in pursuance of this section may apply to the Board of Trade for payment of the same, and the Board of Trade may, on a certificate of the liquidator that the person claiming it is entitled, make an order for the payment to that person of the sum due. Any person dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of Trade in respect of any claim made in pursuance of this section may appeal to the High Court." It has been decided that section 15 applies to companies in voluntary liquidation: In re Stock and Share Auction and Banking Co., 42 W. R. 300, [1894] 1 Ch. 736.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Muir Mackenzie, and R. J. Parker, for the appellant, argued that no debt was due from the Inspector-General or any other official of the Board of Trade to the judgment debtor, and that if there were such a debt the only mode of obtaining payment was that provided by sub-section 5 of section 15 of the Act of 1890, and that consequently the garnishee procedure had no application.

They referred to Prout v. Gregory, 38 W. R. 204, 24 Q. B. D. 281; Hunter v. Greensill, 21 W. R. 263, L. R. 8 C. P. 24; Dolphin v. Layton, 27 W. R. 786, 4 C. P. D. 130; In re Warwick and Worcester Railway Co., Ex parte Turner, 2 De G. F. & J. 254, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 116; Klauber v. Weill, 17 Times Law Rep. 344.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and McIntyre, for the judgment creditor, contended that sub-section 5 of section 15 did not apply, because the judgment creditor could not obtain a certificate from the liquidator that he was entitled to the fund unless he first obtained a garnishee order. The case of In re Warwick and Worcester Railway Co., Ex parte Turner, was an authority in their favour because an official of the Board of Trade was not an officer of the court, and could not direct him to pay in the same way as it could direct its own officer.

COLLINS, L.J., said that in order to put in force the garnishee procedure the judgment creditor must establish that there was a debt due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor. In his lordship's opinion there was no debt due from anyone who could be named as regarded the sum paid into the account at the bank. The effect of a number of cases which had been cited was that when there was in the hands of an officer of the court a sum of money which was payable to a given person the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between the officer of the court and that person. That was the principle of the decisions, and it had been applied to (amongst others) trustees in bankruptcy and the registrar of a county court. It was contended that that principle did not apply to the present case. His lordship thought that that argument was not well founded. The proceedings were regulated by the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. Section 15, sub-section 3, provided for the payment of the money to the account, and by sub-section 5 provided as to the way in which the money paid in was to be paid out to a claimant. For this purpose the person who had the custody of the money was an officer of the Board of Trade and could do nothing without their order. Every principle laid down in the cases referred to applied equally to an officer of the Board of Trade. There could be no doubt that as between him and the judgment debtor there was no debt due from him, but only an obligation on his part to hand over the money under the direction of the Board of Trade It appeared to his lordship that there was no debt due to the officer, and if there was a debt there was only one means of recovering it—namely, that pointed out by sub-section 5 of section 15. It was said that under no circumstances could the judgment debtor avail himself of sub-section 5 because the liquidator had not the materials for certifying that the judgment creditor was entitled to the money. That argument cut both ways. It might be that this mode of recovering the money was not framed to meet this particular case. Whether the fund could or could not be reached in some other way the court had not now to decide. It was sufficient to say that the garnishee procedure did not apply to the present case.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed and said that in In re Warwick and Worcester Railway Co., Ex parte Turner, which had been relied upon, a company was indebted to a judgment creditor, and, notwithstanding the liquidation of the company, an order was made attaching money in their hands to answer the debt, but no order was made against the liquidator. Here the order was made against the Inspector-General, which was a totally different order from that made in Ex parte Turner. In that case an order had been made in the proper form, and effect was given to it in the winding up. In the present case no proper order attaching the fund had yet been made. However much it might be regretted that every kind of property of a judgment debtor could not be attached to answer his debt, the court must not depart from the rules which had been laid down.

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Repair of building—Whitewashing—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Whitewashing the ceilings of a house held to be "repairing" a building within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Wood v. Walsh, 47 W. R. 504, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009, is overruled by Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., ante, p. 380, [1901] A. C. 49.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Gloucester County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman who had been killed by an accident while engaged in the service of the employers upon certain inside work at St. Mark's Schools at Gloucester.

The estimate for the work undertaken by the employers comprised the following particulars—viz., scraping and whitening or distempering ceilings, brushing down and distempering or redistempering walls, cleaning and touching up with paint certain woodwork and portions of walls, painting certain chimney pieces, window sashes, and balusters, cleaning roof timbers, repairing kerbs of grates and resetting hearths of fireplaces, rehanging a door, providing and fixing knobs to a desk, and replacing or providing and refixing hat hooks. Extra to this estimate there was certain additional work, which, besides work of a similar description, included repairs to spouting and roof, and the reglazing of broken window panes.

The building was over thirty feet in height.

On the day of the accident a workman named Vaughan was at work on the top landing of the premises, whitewashing and stopping the staircase ceiling. He was working on an erection formed in the following manner: On the top landing two short ladders were placed against opposite walls, and a plank 8ft. or 10ft. long was placed between them, with its ends resting one on each ladder within a round or two of their tops. From the next landing below and reaching up to the top landing was placed a ladder about 22ft. long, and from this long ladder to the plank resting on the two short ladders was placed a second plank 16ft. long, with one end resting on one of the top rounds of the long ladder, and the other end resting on the shorter plank. Vaughan found that he could not reach the higher part of the arched ceiling from the 16ft. plank, and called to the deceased man Dredge, who was foreman of the work, to help him. Dredge brought a step ladder, and placed it on the 16ft. plank, with its top resting against the wall. He then mounted the step ladder, and worked at the upper part of the ceiling, while Vaughan stood on the 16ft. plank and held the step ladder steady.

After about a quarter of an hour's work, and while Dredge was liming the walls or ceiling, something gave way, and the step ladder and the two men were thrown from the 16ft. plank down the well of the staircase to the ground floor, and Dredge was killed. It appeared that the work on which Dredge and Vaughan were engaged, and for which the arrangement of ladders and planks was being used at the time of the accident, was that of preparing the ceilings for whitewashing by removing the old whitewash and filling up cracks with plaster.

There was evidence that in the lower part of the walls some of the bricks had become decayed and holes had formed in their surface, and that these holes would have to be similarly plastered. But this part of the work did not appear to have been done until after the accident.

The county court judge was of opinion, on the authority of Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 47 W. R. 499, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1018, and Maude v. Brook, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575, that the arrangement of ladders and planks constituted a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, but he held, on the authority of Wood v. Walsh, 47 W. R. 504, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009, that the employment of the deceased was not an employment to which the Act applied, because the work on which he was engaged was not that of constructing or repairing a house by means of a scaffolding; for whitewashing ceilings and preparing them for whitewashing was not structural repair, and, though repairs to roofs and spouting might be structural repairs, there was no evidence that that work had been begun at the time of the accident, and assuming repairs to fireplaces to be structural, they were not done by means of a scaffolding. He therefore made an award in favour of the employers, but, in case the Court of Appeal should be of the contrary opinion, he found that the sum to which the applicant would be entitled was £254 3s.

The applicant appealed.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal in a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, in which the county court judge has decided in favour of the masters. This decision, at the time when it was given, was quite right; it was in accordance with the judgment of this court in Wood v. Walsh. But since then the case of Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. has been taken to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords have put a different construction upon section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act from that which we put upon it: ante, p. 380, [1901] A. C. 49. The question is whether the contract for work entered into by the employers in this case was a contract to do repairs to a building within the meaning of section 7. The building was over thirty feet in height, and the work on which the deceased man was engaged was done by means of a scaffolding. If we had heard this case before the decision of the House of Lords in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., I should have said that this work—viz., whitewashing ceilings, was not within the purview of the Act, because the Act only applied to structural repairs to a building as a whole. In Hoddinott's case we had to deal with a stable, which had been built some months, which did not require repair, but which required strengthening by the introduction of iron stays. We held that, as the building was neither being constructed nor being repaired, the case did not come within the section. The House of Lords said that we were wrong. Lord Macnaghten stated the matter thus: "The question, as it seems to me, is this: Was the work—the thing that was actually being done—a work of construction or a work of repair, or something which was neither the one nor the other, neither construction nor repair? It seems a strong thing to say that when a building is once completed according to the original design you cannot have anything further in the way of construction unless the work be of such a character as to make the building practically a new building. That, however, was the argument. But the Act, it will be observed, uses the word 'construction,' not the word 'erection.' It speaks of a building 'being constructed,' not of a building 'being erected.' And it couples 'construction' with 'repair.' Now repair, as the word is commonly understood, is repair whether much is done or little. Repair for the most part is occasional and partial." He does not say, as we said, that repair must be structural. He does not agree with us in thinking that it must be repair of a building as a whole. Then he winds up in these words: "Construction, repair, demolition, these three operations cover, I think, every varying phase in the life of a building from its beginning to its end." Lord Macnaghten does not adopt the limitation which we put on section 7. The question now is whether painting and whitewashing come within the meaning of the word "repair." Painting is certainly one of the incidents of a building, and so is whitewashing. They seem to me to come within the words used by Lord Macnaghten, and after reading his judgment I cannot say that they are not included in repair. Lords Morris, Davey, and Brampton agreed with Lord Macnaghten. It follows that what this court decided in Wood v. Walsh & Sons is no longer law. I do not decide that mere ornamentation of a building is repair, but I hold that painting is repair, and so is whitewashing. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BRUCE AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Revenue—Legacy duty—Heirlooms—Person chargeable—Absolute interest—Legacy Duty Act, 1796 (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), s. 14.

A testator directed that certain chattels should be considered as heirlooms and enjoyed by the person or persons for the time being beneficially entitled to a certain mansion-house under the limitations of settlements whereby the mansion-house and certain estates were settled upon A. for life, with remainder to the eldest son of B. (who predeceased the testator) in tail male. A. and C. (B.'s eldest son) resettled the mansion-house and estates on A. for life, with remainder to C. for life, with remainders over, and assigned the chattels to the trustees of the resettlement in trust to allow them to devolve as heirlooms with the mansion-house and estates.

Held, that legacy duty became payable upon the death of A. in respect of the chattels, with the payment of which the trustees of the resettlement were chargeable, being persons having "an absolute interest therein" within the meaning of section 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796.

Information.

By his will dated the 14th of December, 1865, the second Marquis of Ailesbury, K.G., directed that the library of books and manuscripts and the bookcases, pictures, drawings, and framed prints, and the statues, vases, marbles, bronzes, and ornamental china and glass in or about his mansion at Savernake Forest and the pleasure-grounds and gardens belonging thereto (with certain exceptions), and also a portion of the plate and plated articles, should be considered as annexed to the said mansion-house at Savernake Forest as heirlooms to be enjoyed by the person or persons for the time being beneficially entitled to the said mansion under the limitations contained in settlements made on the testator's marriage in May, 1837, or subsequently, and upon or subsequent to the marriage of the testator's nephew George John Brudenell Bruce with Lady Evelyn Mary Craven so long as the rules of law and equity should permit.

The testator died on the 6th of January, 1878, and his will was proved on the 3rd of April, 1878.

Under and by virtue of settlements dated respectively, the 10th of May, 1837, and the 3rd of January, 1863 (being the settlements above referred to), the mansion-house at Savernake, together with certain freehold estates, was settled and stood limited at the death of the second marquis to the following uses (omitting limitations which failed)—to the use of Ernest Augustus Charles Brudenell Bruce, third Marquis of Ailesbury, for life, with remainder to the use of the first son of the marriage of George Brudenell Bruce (who predeceased the testator) and Lady Evelyn Mary Bruce in tail male, with divers remainders over.

George William Thomas Brudenell Bruce (commonly called Viscount Savernake), afterwards fourth Marquis of Ailesbury, was the first son of George John Brudenell Bruce.

By an indenture of resettlement dated the 16th of July, 1885, and made between the third Marquis of Ailesbury of the first part, Viscount Savernake of the second part, and the defendant Lord Frederick Bruce and Hugh Mewburn Walker of the third part, in pursuance of an agreement therein mentioned between the third marquis and Viscount Savernake, the mansion-house at Savernake and the freehold estates were appointed and granted by them to the following uses—that is to say (so far as is material to be stated), to the use of the third marquis for life (by way of restoration of his former life estate), with remainder to the use of Viscount Savernake for life, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of Viscount Savernake successively according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainder to the use of Lord Henry Brudenell Bruce, the eldest surviving son of the third marquis, for his life, with remainder to the use of George William James Chandos Brudenell

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bruce, the first son of Lord Henry Brudenell Bruce, for his life, with remainder to the first and every son of George William James Chandos Brudenell Bruce successively according to their respective seniorities in tail male, with remainders over.

By the same indenture, and in pursuance of the said agreement between them, the third marquis and Viscount Savernake, as settlors, assigned to Lord Frederick Bruce and Hugh Mewburn Walker, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all the articles which by the will of the second Marquis of Ailesbury were directed to be maintained and considered as annexed to the mansion-house at Savernake Forest as heirlooms, to be enjoyed by the person or persons entitled to the mansion-house under the existing settlements, to hold them upon trust to allow them to go and devolve and remain as heirlooms, together with premises thereinbefore appointed and granted respectively, so far as the rules of law or equity would permit, but so that the same should not vest absolutely in any person thereby made tenant in tail male by purchase unless such tenant should attain the age of twenty-one years, but on the death of such tenant in tail male by purchase under the age of twenty-one should go, devolve, and remain in the same manner as if they had been freeholds of inheritance, and had been settled accordingly.

The third Marquis of Ailesbury died on the 18th of October, 1886. His grandson Viscount Savernake thereupon became the fourth marquis. He became bankrupt and died without issue on the 10th of April, 1894.

Lord Henry Brudenell Bruce thereupon became fifth marquis, and he became entitled for life to the freehold estates, and the above-mentioned heirlooms vested in the defendants, the present trustees of the resettlement, upon the trusts declared by the indenture of resettlement.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that under the circumstances aforesaid legacy duty under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, on the chattels settled by the will of the second marquis as heirlooms became payable by the defendants either on the execution of the indenture of the 16th of July, 1885, or on the death of the third marquis in October, 1886.

Section 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, enacts as follows: "Provided always and be it further enacted, that no duty shall be paid on any article of plate, furniture, or other things, not yielding any income, and given to or for the benefit of, or so as that the same be enjoyed by different persons in succession, whilst the same shall be so enjoyed in kind only by any person or persons not having any power of selling or disposing thereof, so as to convert the same into money or other property yielding income; but if the same shall be actually sold or disposed of, or shall come to any person or persons having power to sell or dispose thereof, or having an absolute interest therein, then, and in each and every such case, the same duty shall be chargeable and paid thereon as if the same had been originally given absolutely and with full power to sell or dispose thereof and shall be chargeable upon and paid by the person or persons for whose benefit the same shall be sold or who shall have power to sell or dispose thereof or an absolute interest therein, and shall become a debt of such person or persons. . . ."

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—The exemption in section 14 of the Act only applies so long as the chattels are in the hands of persons with a limited interest. When they come into the hands of a person with more than a limited interest then the duty becomes payable. This took place on the death of the third marquis. The settlement in 1885 could not prevent the liability to duty accruing. Otherwise it would be possible, by means of successive resettlements, to postpone the payment of duty ad infinitum. The defendants, as trustees of the resettlements, are liable to pay the duty inasmuch as they are persons "having an absolute interest" in the chattels: see Bliss v. Putnam, 7 Beav. 40; Nisbett's Trustees v. Learmonth, 8 Ct. Sess. Cas. (2nd series) 69; and Bryan v. Mansion, 5 W. R. 483, 3 Jur. N. S. 473.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Spencer Butler with him), for the defendants.—Unless the Crown can clearly show that the property is within the terms of the Act they must fail: see Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Angus, 38 W. R. 3, 23 Q. B. D. 579, at p. 589, and Tennant v. Smith, [1892] A. C. 150, at p. 154, 40 W. R. Dig. 216. On the death of the third marquis the chattels in question came into the hands of the fourth marquis, a person not having any power of selling or disposing thereof. They were therefore exempt from the payment of duty by virtue of section 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796. Heirlooms are a damnosa hereditas. There is therefore no absurdity in holding that they are exempt from duty ad infinitum. Assuming that the duty is payable, the only person liable to pay it was the fourth marquis. The scheme of the Act is that the executors shall be primarily liable to pay the duty, and that upon payment of the legacy to the person entitled to it before the duty had been paid such person becomes jointly liable with the executor: see section 6. It is true that by section 14 the person having an absolute interest in the chattels is made liable to pay the duty, but that means the person having an absolute beneficial interest.

KENNEDY, J.—The question in this case turns upon the effect to be given to section 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796. Now it seems clear that if there had been no resettlement the fourth marquis would have become the absolute owner of these heirlooms. But by reason of the resettlement he did not become so. What he did become, subsequently, was a bankrupt. But the trustees, who are the defendants to the information, did become possessed of the heirlooms upon the trusts of the resettlement. The question is, has the legacy duty become payable by them? That question seems to me to turn on this, whether or not the fact that the heirlooms never became under the circumstances the property of the fourth marquis, but passed to the defendants, prevents there having been anybody in fact who was the absolute owner, because before the ownership accrued to the fourth marquis they came into the hands of the defendants as trustees under a document which, as it were, again tied up the heirlooms in a special way; or whether, again, the section never came into operation at all because of the mere fact of the settlement having intervened before the marquis ever became, or could become, absolute owner. In my view our decision must be governed by the principle which was applied by Lord Cranworth in Bryan v. Mansion. Where, in fact, there would have been an absolute owner from whom the legacy duty would have been claimable by the Crown, and he chooses to part with the property by assignment to somebody else, then it is a question whether that somebody else (in this case the defendants) ought not to be treated as persons who are assignees, and not as persons taking under a will, or under a disposition of that kind, and whether they must not take with what they got by the assignment the liability to pay the duties which would have become due from the assignor. It seems to me that the defendants are, within the principle of Lord Cranworth's decision, assignees who are subject to the burden as well as the benefit of the assignment, that burden being the burden laid upon the fourth marquis by the terms of section 14. In my view, therefore, the Crown is entitled to succeed in this action.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case raises two points—one very easy, the other somewhat difficult. The second Marquis of Ailesbury bequeathed a great number of specific chattels upon terms as nearly as possible corresponding to the limitations of certain estates under two settlements. Under the marquis's will and those settlements, and in the events which happened, the fourth marquis would, if nothing had been done to defeat his interest, have become absolutely entitled to these chattels by reason of his being tenant in tail male in possession of the estates. Before the estates or chattels came into possession he executed a new settlement, tying up the estates and the chattels, reducing his own individual interest in them to an estate for life, and limiting various lives and remainders over. He then became bankrupt and died. The result is that hitherto the Crown has got no duty upon his coming into possession of the chattels, section 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, preventing any duty attaching while the chattels are out in life interest.

It is said, in the first place, that there is no duty payable at all, because the effect of the resettlement before the chattels vested in possession is to prevent there ever being an absolute interest. Now this class of resettlement of chattels as heirlooms is very old, and I should say that since the Legacy Duty Act has been passed there must have been more than one such resettlement every year in the 100 odd years it has been in existence, and it is certainly strange to learn that the Crown has been deprived of all duty on those chattels during the whole of that period, either by submitting not to ask for duty under such settlements or by not amending the law. However that may be, I have not the slightest doubt that it does not lie in the mouth of the fourth marquis, or those claiming title under him, to say that the property has not vested in absolute possession. The fourth marquis would have had an absolute interest in the chattels if he had not divested himself of possession before his interest came into possession and passed it on to the defendants. He cannot defeat the right of the Crown by so doing.

Then comes the difficult question whether the defendants are liable instead of himself. Now one cannot help seeing that, in this particular case, the Crown might be defrauded of a very just claim if we were to hold that the defendants were not liable. The fourth marquis became bankrupt, but before his bankruptcy he had passed his absolute interest in these chattels to the defendant. It is possible if he had kept them he would never have been bankrupt; it is still more possible that there would not have been enough to satisfy the preferential claim of the Crown against his assets for this duty. Therefore I confess I approach the contention on the part of the defendants with some hesitation; but I think that contention disappears on a consideration of the three cases cited to us, and more especially of the decision of Lord Cranworth in Bryan v. Mansion. Probably the true view of section 14 is that the persons who at the moment when the interest actually vests in possession have the right to call for the property are the persons within the meaning of that section, and are the persons then having an absolute interest therein who are made liable. Either on that ground or upon the ground of extension—for which we have the sanction of the Lord Chancellor—it seems to me that the Crown is entitled to succeed.

BROADBENT v. SHEPHERD. (a.)

Local government — Nuisance — Abatement — "Owner" of premises — Appeal — Case remitted — "Owner" ceasing to be owner before rehearing—Jurisdiction to make order on "owner"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 94, 96, 98, 104.

The court having held, upon a case stated by justices, that the respondent, a person receiving the rack-rents as agent for the landlord, was the "owner" of the premises upon whom an order could be made under sections 94 and 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to abate a nuisance thereon arising from structural defects (see ante, p. 205), the agent resigned before the case came again before the justices, who, under the change of circumstances, refused to make the order.

Held, that the justices should have made the order on the agent, for it would not be entirely nugatory, as, if disobeyed, it would have enabled the local authority to enter on the premises and do the work itself and charge the expenses on the person liable.

Appeal by special case from the decision of justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire, on a complaint laid by the appellant, on behalf of the Castleford Urban District Council, against the respondent, as the statutory "owner of certain premises in the district, and alleging failure on the part of the respondent to comply with a notice served on him under section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, requiring him to abate certain nuisances on the said premises.

The complaint originally came on before the justices on the 27th of June, 1900, when it appeared that the nuisance existed and was due to structural defects, but that the respondent was a mere rent collector or agent for the real owners of the premises.

The justices were of opinion though the respondent was "owner" of the premises within the definition of that term in section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was not the intention of the Act to create two ownerships under section 94, and that the definition of "owner" did not apply to the interpretation of that section; and they therefore dismissed the complaint. On the application of the appellant, they, however, stated a special case on the point for the determination of the High Court.

On the 15th of November, 1900, the High Court ordered that the decision of the justices should be reversed, and remitted the case to the justices with an intimation that a rent collector or agent is an "owner" for the purposes of section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875: see ante, p. 205, and 17 Times L. R. 52 for report of these proceedings.

On the 5th of December, 1900, the complaint, having been reinstated in accordance with the decision of the High Court, again came on for hearing. It then appeared that the respondent had, since the last hearing, resigned the agency of the property.

The justices were urged by the appellant to make an order on the respondent to abate the nuisance.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They, however, were advised that they had no power to make an order on the respondent, on the ground that such an order can only be made on a person who is an "owner" of the premises when the order is made. They accordingly dismissed the complaint, subject to the present case.

Macmorran, K.C., and Scholefield, for the appellant.—The justices ought to have made the order, because, although the respondent was then no longer "owner," he was owner when the case first came before them. Even now the order would not be nugatory, for it would give the local authority power to enter on the premises and do the work if the order were not carried out by the person made liable under powers given them by sections 98 and 104 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

No one appeared for the respondent.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—When the case was originally before this court, consisting of Kennedy, J., and myself, we held that the justices ought to have made the order, because the person against whom it was sought was "owner" of the premises within the definition given in the Act. I assume that if they had made the order then it would have been an order to abate the nuisance within a given number of days. What has happened is, shortly, this: At some time after the first hearing before the justices the respondent had ceased to be agent to collect the rents for the landlord. If the sole object of the order sought were to obtain a personal remedy against the respondent as an individual, though even in that case I am not prepared to express an opinion that such an order could not be made, different considerations would arise. It might then be said that the order would be a mere empty order, and ought not to be made. But when sections 96, 98, and 104 are looked at it seems clear that one object of the order would be to give the right to the local authority to enter upon the premises and do the work necessary to abate the nuisance and recover the expenses from the person responsible. We have held that the justices had originally jurisdiction to make the order on the respondent as the agent; and, in my view, when the case went back to them they should then have made the order they should have made in the first instance, unless, as I have pointed out would not be the case in this instance, that order would have been wholly nugatory. We think that the justices ought to have made the order, notwithstanding that the former agent had ceased to be agent on the second occasion that the matter came before them, because that order, if disobeyed, would have given the local authority power by virtue of section 98 to enter upon the premises and do whatever might be necessary in execution of the order. By section 104 power is given to a local authority in such a case to recover their costs and expenses from the owner for the time being of the premises. The order, therefore, would not have been nugatory, and the justices ought to have made it. The case must again be remitted.

STEAD v. NICHOLAS. (a.)

Fishery — Fishery district — Reservoir within the geographical boundary of a fishery district—Jurisdiction of Board of Trade—Taking trout or char from reservoir—Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), s. 6—Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 39), s. 3.

Neither section 6 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, nor section 3 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1886, give power to the Board of Trade to include an artificial water reservoir frequented by trout and char in a fishery district.

Appeal from a decision of two justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire dismissing an information laid by the appellant against the respondent and charging him with a breach of section 35 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1865, as extended to trout and char by sections 6 and 7 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, by fishing for trout without a licence in the Thrybergh reservoir.

The only question was whether the reservoir, which had been constructed under statutory powers and belonged to the corporation of Doncaster, was to be considered within the Yorkshire fishery district.

The limits of the district were defined by a certificate given by the Board of Trade acting under section 3 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1886, as follows: "The limits of the Rivers Derwent, Wharfe, Nidd, Ure, Swale, and Ouse, and the fishery district of the said rivers include all such estuaries, rivers, streams, brooks, lakes, ponds, canals, dykes, cuts, drains, channels, watercourses, and waters as lie within" the limits defined by certain lines and boundaries in the said certificate set forth and described.

Geographically the reservoir was within the bounds of the fishery district, but it was contended that the Board of Trade had not by the words of their certificate included the reservoir in the district, and if they had that they had no power so to do.

H. Avory, K.C., and Waddy, for the appellant.—Although there are cases decided before 1878 which show that an artificial reservoir is not a "tributary" of a river within the meaning of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Acts, and therefore that a reservoir could not then be included within a fishery district under the earlier of those Acts, such a reservoir may now be included under powers given to the Board of Trade by sections 6 and 7 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, which enact that the provisions of the Fishery Acts of 1865 and 1873 relating to the formation, alteration, combination, and dissolution of fishery districts, and to the authority of the conservators, should thenceforth "extend to all waters within the limits of this Act frequented by trout or char." There was no question that if there was power to include this reservoir in the district the Board of Trade had done so.

T. Willes Chitty, for the respondent.—The only effect of section 6 of the Act of 1878 was merely to extend provisions of the earlier Acts previously confined to salmon rivers and their tributaries to trout streams and their tributaries. It is perfectly clear from the wording of the Acts themselves that waters to be protected under those Acts must be rivers or tributaries of rivers. An artificial reservoir not being included within the scope of the statutes, the attempt of the Board of Trade to include the Thrybergh reservoir within their certificate is ultra vires and the magistrates were right in refusing to convict.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case we are asked by the appellant to say that any water frequented by trout and char must be deemed to come within the limits of a fishery district if it is included within the geographical area of that district as defined by the certificate of the Board of Trade. Speaking for myself I should have been glad to adopt the appellant's construction of the statute, but the course of legislation renders that impossible. There is an established code as to salmon rivers and the Legislature has extended its protection to trout rivers or streams as the rivers or streams were frequented by salmon also. Now it is clear that section 6 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, did not introduce fresh legislation but merely provided that on and after the passing of that Act portions of the existing code should extend and apply to all waters within the limits of the Act frequented by trout or char. When the provisions of that Act are read alone, I agree it would be reasonable to construe it as meaning to apply to any water in England except water in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Norwich (which are excepted from the operation of the Act by section 3), though that would be no doubt an unusual meaning for the expression "limits of this Act." But the real answer to the appellant's construction of the Act is this—namely, that the Legislature only intended that the provisions of the previous Acts should be extended to include trout and char frequenting waters in which the salmon were already there protected by statute. It would therefore be going too far to construe that section as extending the legislation to waters of another character. For this reason the decision of the justices is right and this appeal fails.

DICKSEE (Appellant) v. HOSKINS (Respondent). (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Public-house — Separation of part used for trade from part used as dwelling-house —Fire-resisting materials—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 74, sub-section 2.

Section 74, sub-section 2, of the London Building Act, 1894, does not apply to the case where certain rooms on business premises are used for the purpose of residence, but only to buildings in which the part used for the purposes of trade or manufacture is so structurally separated from the part used for the purposes of a dwelling-house as to constitute a separate tenement.

Special case.

This was a case stated by G. G. Kennedy, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate.

On Tuesday, the 17th of October, 1900, an appeal under section 150 of the London Building Act, 1894, wherein F. C. Hoskins was the appellant, and B. Dicksee was respondent, was heard before the above magistrate sitting at the Southwark police-court, and upon such hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:

On the 11th of July, 1900, the respondent F. C. Hoskins, a builder, served notice on the appellant, a district surveyor under section 145 of the above Act, of the proposed erection of a building at No. 87, Old Kent-road, together with plans showing that the proposed building was the re-erection of a licensed beerhouse on the site of an old beerhouse called the "Horse Shoe."

On the 15th of August, 1900, the appellant, as such district surveyor, served upon the respondent a notice of objection to the proposed erection of the said building under section 150 of the said Act of 1894, on the ground that it would be in contravention of sub-section 2 of section 74 of the said Act.

The building, when erected, it appeared, would exceed ten squares in area, and would contain (1) in the basement beer and wine cellars, (2) on the ground floor a bar, public lobby, saloon bar, private bar, bar parlour, and a public room, (3) on the first floor a sitting-room, three bedrooms, and a kitchen, and (4) on the top floor attics.

The old house and the site of the new building were licensed and used, and the new building, when completed, would be licensed and used, for the sale of wine and beer, to be consumed on and off the premises under the Beerhouse Act, 1830 (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64), and the Refreshment-house Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 27), and the Acts amending the said Acts respectively.

The trade of the said beerhouse, it appeared, would be carried on on the basement and ground floor and the licensee and his family would reside in the upper floors of the building. The whole of the building would be covered by the justices' certificate and excise licence. The plans for the new building were submitted to and approved by the licensing justices for the Newington division of the County of London.

The floors separating the ground floor from the first floor, and the staircase leading to the first floor, would not be constructed of fire-resisting materials, and if sub-section 2 of section 74 of the said Act applied to this building the provisions of that section would be contravened.

It was contended for the appellant that sub-section 2 applied to the proposed building as it was to be used in part for the purposes of the trade of a beerhouse and in part as a dwelling-house.

It was contended for the respondent that sub-section 2 did apply to a beerhouse, and the decision of Carritt v. Godson & Son, [1899] 2 Q. B. 193, 47 W. R. Dig. 126, was relied on.

The magistrate found as a fact that the basement and ground floor of the said building were intended to be used for the purposes of the trade of a beerhouse, and that the part above the ground floor was intended to be used as a dwelling-house for the licensed occupier, and he held that the case was governed by the decision in Carritt v. Godson, and he accordingly allowed the appeal and overruled the objection of the district surveyor.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether such decision was right in law.

The London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.) (Local), s. 74, sub-section 2, provides as follows: "In every building exceeding ten squares in area used in part for purposes of trade or manufacture and in part as a dwelling-house, the part used for the purposes of trade or manufacture shall be separated from the part used as a dwelling-house by walls and floors constructed of fire-resisting materials, and all passages, staircases, and other means of approach to the part used as a dwelling-house shall be constructed throughout of fire-resisting materials."

Section 5, sub-section 23, provides as follows: "The expression 'square' applied to the measurement of the area of a building means the space of 100 superficial feet."

Avory, K.C., and H. W. Rowsell, for the appellant.

Danckwerts, K.C., and W. F. Crates, for the respondent, were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In deciding this case I do not wish at all to found my decision on the judgment of my brothers in Carritt v. Godson & Son, although I think that decision was perfectly right, because it is possible it may be suggested there was an additional ground for the decision in that case—namely, the possibility of access to the part of the premises by a yard into which the lobby opened.

In this case we have to decide a very important point—namely, what is the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 74 of the Building Act, 1894. I do not think it can be properly contended that that sub-section was meant to apply to the case of the use of rooms in one dwelling-house partly for trade and partly for residence. In the present case there was an ordinary house intended to be used as a beerhouse, and it makes no difference to my mind at all whether it was or was not going to be used as an hotel. The upper floors would, under all ordinary circumstances, be used for the purpose of residence by the licensee. The licence would cover the whole house.

Now, the finding of the magistrate is that the basement and ground floor of the building were intended to be used for the purpose of the trade of a beerhouse and that the part above the ground floor was intended to be used as a dwelling-house by the licensed occupier. I understand that finding to mean that the licensed occupier would live there. In my opinion, whatever be the use of the premises, be they licensed premises or ordinary shop premises or manufacturing premises, if the state of things is that in the one tenement or dwelling-house some people sleep in rooms which are part of that dwelling-house or tenement, the necessity or the obligation to have fireproof divisions does not arise.

Now I come to the words of the section "In every building used in part for the purpose of trade and in part as a dwelling-house." I do not tihnk we can or ought to shut our eyes to the common and known state of things in the year 1894, when this Act was passed.

It was perfectly well known that there were shops with bedrooms over them much larger than ten squares, and it was also perfectly well known that it had become a common practice to have the ground floor and basement, and sometimes the first floor, applied as a separate tenement to trade purposes, and above that as a separate tenement approached by a staircase, a part of the building which was used as a dwelling-house. I am satisfied in my own mind that the section was intended to apply to a building of which there is one part used for trade and another part used as a dwelling-house, those two parts being structurally separated and approached by separate entrances, thus forming two separate tenements.

I can only say that the reasoning in Carritt v. Godson entirely supports this view, and is an authority in favour of the view which I take, and would have been binding on us, but I wish it to be distinctly understood, speaking for myself, that I have arrived at this conclusion, be it right or be it wrong, on the considerations which arise on the language of this section and the purview of the section quite apart from that decision, with which decision, however, I entirely concur. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree. I only desire to say this about Carritt v. Godson, that with regard to the judgment, both of my brother Day and myself, it was directed almost entirely to agreement with the argument of the learned counsel for the respondents and did not go further. We agreed with him, took the views he took, that the building was not used partly for the purpose of trade and partly as a licensed house, and that being so it was not necessary to go further into the case. I entirely agree with the extension of the principle, if I may so call it, which has been stated by the Lord Chief Justice in his judgment.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal given.

THE KING v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Highway — Obstruction—Indictment—Practice—Verdict of acquittal—Motion to stay entry of judgment—Misdirection.

Where a verdict of not guilty has been returned upon an indictment for an obstruction to a highway, the court will not order the entry of judgment to be stayed, on the ground of a misdirection of the judge before whom the indictment was tried, for the purpose of giving an opportunity for the question to be raised again upon a fresh indictment.

Rex v. Inhabitants of Wandsworth, 1 B. & Ald. 63, considered.

Rule nisi directed to the defendants to show cause why the entry of judgment upon the verdict on an indictment for obstructing a highway should not be stayed until further order.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Durham, held on the 26th of June, 1899, an indictment was preferred before the grand jury at the instance of the Stanley Urban District Council against the North-Eastern Railway Co., whereby the company was charged with obstructing certain Queen's highways by placing and maintaining thereon certain lines of rails and certain gates, fences, and buildings, and other encroachments, and by running and shunting of engines and trains upon and across the said highways.

A true bill having been found by the grand jury, the indictment was removed by a writ of certiorari into the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and on the 12th of July, 1899, the company pleaded not guilty thereto.

The indictment was tried at the summer assizes, 1900, for the county of Durham, before Ridley, J., and a special jury.

It appeared from the evidence given on behalf of the prosecution that upon and across both the highways in question a double line of rails was maintained by the company and also fences, gate-posts, and swing-gates enclosing the rails.

It also appeared that a signal-box and a dwelling-house had been erected and were maintained by the company, and it was alleged that these buildings encroached upon the highway leading from Wolsingham to Newcastle, and that a portion of this highway had been enclosed and was used as a garden in connection with the dwelling-house.

The company, in support of their plea of not guilty, claimed to be justified in maintaining the rails, buildings, fences, and gates alleged to obstruct the highways, and to run and shunt engines and trains on and across the highways by virtue of a grant of wayleave, pursuant to an Act of 13 Geo. 3, from the Bishop of Durham, and another grant of wayleave from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and by virtue of the statutes 5 Vict. cxxvii. under which the Pontop and South Shields Railway Co. was incorporated, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. cccxxx., by which the undertaking of the company was transferred to the North-Eastern Railway Co. They denied that the signal-box, dwelling-house, or garden were upon any portion of the highways.

The learned judge refused to leave to the jury any question with reference to the placing of the lines of railway, and the running and shunting of engines and trains, upon and across the highways, and held that although the lines of rails and the shunting of engines and trains would have been obstructions to the highways, the North-Eastern Railway Co. was authorized to maintain them upon the highways, and directed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty upon the first two counts, which related to these matters. It was alleged on behalf of the applicant that the learned judge misdirected the jury in addressing them upon the remaining counts. The jury found a verdict of "not guilty" on the first two counts. Upon the other count they found a like verdict. In answer to the learned judge they stated that they were not decided on the question of the limits of the highway. The learned judge did not ask the jury whether they had considered the question of the limits of the highway, though asked to do so by the applicants, and the judge gave judgment that the verdict was a general one of not guilty.

Scott Fox, K.C. (Manisty, K.C., with him), showed cause.—It is true that the courts have in special cases, where rights would be bound, suspended the effect of a verdict of not guilty upon an indictment in order that a fresh indictment might be brought unprejudiced by the former verdict: see Rex v. Inhabitants of Wandsworth, 1 B. & Ald. 63; Reg. v. Inhabitants of Southampton, 19 Q. B. D. 590, 36 W. R. Dig. 89. But in the present case no rights would be determined by the proceedings sought to be stayed, for the offence is a continuing one. It would be straining the rule laid down in the above cases to apply it in the present instance. The ordinary rule that a verdict of not guilty in criminal proceedings shall not be interfered with ought to prevail: see Reg. v. Johnson, 8 W. R. 236, 2 E. & E. 613; Reg. v. Duncan, 7 Q. B. D. 198, 29 W. R. Dig. 69; and Reg. v. Russell, 2 W. R. 555, 3 El. & Bl. 942.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Bethune, in support of the rule.—We are entitled to the benefit of the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Inhabitants of Wandsworth on the ground that the judge has decided against us upon one part of the case and has withdrawn that part of the case from the jury, and on the ground that he has misdirected them on the other part of the case. We are therefore entitled to have the proceedings stayed until the trial of a fresh indictment.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The object of the rule sought to be obtained in this case is to obtain a decision from the court that upon an indictment for obstruction to a highway the proceedings may be stayed upon the ground that there has been some misdirection on the part of the learned judge. Mr. Tindal Atkinson has been obliged to admit that the case is novel inasmuch as he is asking us to extend the practice which was laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Inhabitants of Wandsworth. If we could see our way to holding that the same principle ought to apply we should not hesitate to lay down the rule, but as I have ventured to point out in the course of the argument there is a broad distinction of principle between the two cases. In Rex v. Inhabitants of Wandsworth Lord Ellenborough appears to have laid down the rule that under special circumstances, where rights would be affected by previous proceedings, he would suspend the effect of the former verdict because great injustice might arise from precluding further discussion, and he referred to a previous case, Reg. v. Inhabitants of Middlesex, in which he had so acted. Now, there have been a long series of decisions, including Reg. v. Russell, Reg. v. Johnson, and Reg. v. Duncan—all of them applications for a new trial—in which the court has uniformly refused to grant a new trial, but even in those cases the court thought it right to take the same action as Lord Ellenborough, L.C.J., took in Rex v. Wandsworth, and as Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., pointed out in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Southampton, they of course could have done so as the rule moved in one form would not have precluded them from giving a remedy. Ought we to extend the rule to cases of obstruction to a highway? The reasoning used by the learned judges in more than one of those cases would seem to afford a conclusive argument against any such extension. It has been most fairly admitted by Mr. Tindal Atkinson that in the event of an indictment being preferred in respect of a continuance of the same obstruction the present acquittal could not be used as an answer by the defendant to the proceedings. Therefore, as I have already pointed out, an attempt is being made to induce us to extend the rule laid down as to cases where rights would be affected to cases where rights would not be affected. The main ground on which this has been urged is the difficulty in which the prosecutors would find themselves, and we were urged to extend the rule because, it was said, the learned judge had misdirected the jury, and had withdrawn a part of the case from their consideration. Assuming that the judge had misdirected the jury, that would not be sufficient to justify the court in staying the proceedings. The learned judge has not given a judgment which will finally determine the rights of the parties. He has directed the jury as to his view of the legal rights applicable to the facts before him. Mr. Atkinson says that any other judge who tries another indictment will feel himself bound to adopt exactly the same view of the law. I do not think that any judge would feel himself so bound. He would endeavour to apply to the facts then before him his own view of the law. In Reg. v. Duncan the application was for a new trial, and was based on misdirection, but nevertheless the application was refused. Coleridge, L.C.J., in Reg. v. Southampton, indicated that in a proper case, although the application was for a new trial, the court would have adopted the course adopted by Lord Ellenborough, of which he approved, and would have stayed the proceedings. Therefore inasmuch as the prosecutors can to-morrow take fresh proceedings in respect of the obstruction, it would in my opinion be wrong to extend the rule of arresting the entry of judgment to a case in which no rights have been determined but the only question has been whether the jury thought there was an obstruction or not.

I will add that there seems to be a further broad distinction between this case and the cases cited, because the parties can by informing the Attorney-General obtain the use of his name and then the proceedings can be carried to the superior courts and to the House of Lords if necessary, so that any ruling of the learned judge can be finally determined. In my opinion the rule ought to be discharged.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

Rule discharged.

LORENZO REPETTO v. MILLARS KARRI AND JARRAH CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Ship — Bill of lading—Freight—Right of captain to sue for.

The defendants chartered a ship to carry a cargo. The charter-party provided that the captain should sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party. A cargo was loaded, and bills of lading incorporating the terms of the charter-party were signed by the captain of the ship. The defendants were the shippers and also the consignees and receivers of the cargo.

Held, that the captain had signed the bills of lading merely as agent for the owners, and was not entitled to sue the defendants for freight.

Action tried in the Commercial Court before Bigham, J., without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a balance of freight under bills of lading signed by the plaintiff as master of The Beecroft.

The goods in respect of which the freight was claimed had been shipped on board The Beecroft by the defendants, who were also the consignees and receivers of the goods.

The Beecroft had been chartered to the defendants by her owner by a charter-party dated the 28th of August, 1899.

The defendants alleged that by a charter-party dated the 24th of January, 1899, a vessel called The Gio Batta Repetto, belonging to the same owner as The Beecroft, was chartered by the owner to the defendants for a voyage from Albany to the United Kingdom or Continent with timber to be shipped by the defendants; that during the voyage general average sacrifices were made and general average expenses were incurred in respect of which the owner became indebted to the defendants in a general average contribution amounting to £217 16s. 10d., which had not been paid.

The defendants before action tendered, and after action paid, to the plaintiff as agent for the owner the sum of £39 1s., and claimed to set off the amount of the general average contribution against the balance of the plaintiff's claim.

The defendants also counterclaimed a like sum.

The bills of lading sued upon were, so far as material, in the following terms:

"Shipped in good order and condition by" the defendants upon The Beecroft now lying, &c., and bound for London "whereof L. Repetto is master for the present voyage . . . 267 pieces of jarrah timber . . . to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the said port of destination, loss and damage by detention, by the act of God, restraint of princes and rulers, public enemies or people, quarantine, epidemics, pirates or robbers, barratry of the master and crew . . . collisions, stranding or other accidents of the seas, rivers, canals, and navigations of whatsoever kind (even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner . . . always mutually excepted . . . unto Millars Karri and Jarrah Forests (Limited) or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the same as per charter-party dated the 28th of August, 1899, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter are herewith incorporated . . . (Signed) L. Repetto, Master."

The charter-party of the 28th of August, 1899, provided that The Beecroft should proceed to Fremantle, and there load a cargo of timber from the defendants' agents and proceed therewith to a safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, and deliver the same on being paid freight as provided.

The charter-party contained the usual exceptions and the following clause: "The captain to sign bills of lading at port of loading at any rate of freight without prejudice to this charter, and should the bills of lading for the entire cargo show less sum in the aggregate than the amount of freight due the ship under this charter (allowing for advances to the master) the difference to be paid at port of loading in cash. The charterers' liability under this charter to cease on ship being loaded. Ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage."

Scrutton, K.C., and Leck, for the plaintiff.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and P. C. Morris, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 3.—BIGHAM, J.—This action is brought by Lorenzo Repetto, the master of a vessel called The Beecroft, to recover balance due for freight. The endorsement on the writ shows that the gross freight was £3,383 6s. 5d., and that this amount has been reduced by payments on account by disbursements for the ship at the ports of loading and discharge to a sum of £256 17s. 10d.; since action brought a further sum of £39 1s. has been paid, leaving £217 16s. 10d., the balance sued for. The defendants do not deny that they owe this balance, but they say that they owe it to the owners, and not to the plaintiffs, and that they have a set-off, as against the former to the amount of the claim. The question I have to determine is whether the plaintiff (the master) can maintain the action. The facts are as follows: By a charter-party dated August 28, 1899, Fortunato Repetto (not the plaintiff) chartered The Beecroft to the defendants to bring a cargo of timber from Australia at an agreed rate of freight, the defendants undertaking to provide the cargo. The charter-party contained the usual exceptions. The freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. Then there was the following clause: "The captain to sign bills of lading at port of loading at any rate of freight without prejudice to this charter, and should the bills of lading for the entire cargo show less sum in the aggregate than the amount of freight due the ship under this charter (allowing for advances to the master) the difference to be paid at the port of loading in cash. The charterers' liability under this charter to cease on vessel being loaded. Ship to have an absolute lien on the freight, dead-freight, and demurrage." The defendants loaded the cargo and presented bills of lading to the plaintiff for signature. These bills of lading described the cargo as shipped by the defendants in The Beecroft, "whereof L. Repetto is master." The exceptions were more extensive than those mentioned in the charter-party. The bill of lading provided that the cargo should be delivered to the shippers or their assigns, "they paying freight for the same as per charter-party dated the 28th of August, 1899, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter are herewith incorporated." These bills of lading the plaintiff signed as master of the ship. The ship then proceeded on her voyage, and on her arrival at the port of discharge the cargo was delivered to the defendants against presentation of the bills of lading. This action was then brought, and it was no doubt brought in the name of the master, Lorenzo Repetto, in the hope that the defendants might thereby be precluded from setting up the set-off which they allege they have against Fortunato Repetto.

There are only two ways in which a promise can possibly arise on the part of the defendants to pay freight to the plaintiff. It can arise out of the bill of lading itself, or it can arise by implication from the delivery of the goods by the plaintiff at the request of the defendants. There can be no doubt that when a master signs a bill of lading without qualification, that is to say without anything in the document to show that he does so merely as agent, he makes himself personally liable to the shipper. The shipowner who has authorized the master to sign the bill of lading is also liable upon it. The master is estopped from denying the truth of the representation which he has made, in other words he is not allowed to give evidence to discharge himself from a liability which he has apparently undertaken; and the shipowner is bound by the contract because it has been entered into on his behalf and with his authority. Thus two separate liabilities are created for the performance of one contract. But no difficulty arises out of this state of things, for the shipper has not a concurrent remedy against both master and owner; he has merely a right to elect which of the two he will hold liable, and having once finally elected his remedy against the other is gone. And as either master or owner may be sued, so either may sue, for the existence of the liability on the one hand involves the existence of the correlative right on the other. These rules apply not merely to contracts created by bills of lading, but to all simple contracts; they form part of the law relating to principal and agent.

Now applying this law to the circumstances of the present case, one must look to see what it is that the master has signed. It is not a mere bill of lading in the ordinary form; it is a bill of lading which in express words incorporates all the terms of a charter already made between the master's owner and the charterers (the defendants). Thus the two documents must be read as one, and it is to the contract so created that the plaintiff has put his signature. Then, reading the two documents together, does it appear that in signing he did so as agent merely, or does it appear that he did so as principal? By the charter-party the shipowner promises the defendants that his servant the master shall sign bills of lading as presented. Why is is this provision inserted? It is inserted with two objects: First, to enable the charterers in case they ship their own goods (as they did in this case) to obtain a negotiable instrument which they can transfer by indorsement, and on which, if need be, they can obtain money; and, secondly, it is inserted to enable them, in case they ship the goods of other people, to hand to such other people bills of lading which in their hands can serve a similar purpose and which shall express the freight they may have agreed to pay. These are the only objects with which the provision is inserted, and in my opinion the plaintiff, when he signed the bills of lading sued on, did so merely in order to effectuate the first of these purposes, and so to carry out the promise which his owner had made by the charter-party. I think this is the meaning to be put on the two documents when read together. It is neither apparent from the documents, nor is it the fact, that the master or the charterers intended that a new contracting party should be introduced into the business by the signing of the bills of lading. It is not necessary to consider what the effect might have been if the bills of lading had been indorsed to third parties so as to pass the property in the goods. Here the charterers, the shippers, the consignees, and the receivers of the cargo are one and the same, and the Bills of Lading Act has therefore no bearing on the case. I come to the conclusion that the master's signature to the bills of lading must be read as the signature of a mere agent fixing a liability on his principal only. The master therefore could not be sued, and it follows as a consequence that he cannot sue.

A point was taking during the argument that the master could not be taken to have intended to contract, inasmuch as he had excluded himself by the contract from the consequences of his own barratry, and it was said that it was absurd to suppose that the man could have contracted upon such a footing, I am not disposed to attach much importance to this point, for I think it very likely that the clause in the bill of lading, which is different from the clause in the charter-party by which the liability of the person signing the bill of lading in respect of his own barratry is excluded is on the bill of lading per incuriam. It occurs in the printed part of the document and was probably overlooked and not struck out.

It was also contended that the master is entitled to sue, if not on the bill of lading, at all events on an implied contract to pay the freight. It was said that the master held possession of the goods in order to enforce the shipowner's lien, and that he had given up the possession at the request of the defendants, who were, as I have said, the consignees and receivers of the cargo, and that it must, therefore, be implied from the request, and from the fact that he had given up possession, that the defendants had promised to pay the freight. I do not think that there is anything in this point. It was not at the request of the defendants to the master that the lien was parted with and possession of the goods given up. The application by the receivers for possession of the goods was made to Messrs. Clarkson, the shipowners' agents, and it was the shipowners, through their agents, who gave up possession at the receiver's request. I find as a fact that there was no request for possession made to the master, and that therefore no implied contract to pay him arose.

The question was argued as to what the position would be if the master stood in the relation in which the plaintiff contended that he did stand—that is, as principal on the contract. It was said that, inasmuch as the charter-party contained a clause for cesser of liability, the defendants would not be liable to pay. I do not agree. In my opinion the defendants would be liable if the master could sue and certainly would be liable if an action were brought by the shipowner for the freight mentioned in the bill of lading. I think the case of Gullischen v. Stewart makes that clear. The bill of lading is supplementary to the charter-party and creates the liability which, but for the bill of lading, would probably be gone—namely, the liability to pay the freight. The two documents which must be read together are in a sense one contract, but the bill of lading, which is the later document, I think overrides the charter-party and makes the defendants liable to pay the freight, but the person to sue in this case is, in my opinion, the shipowner and not the master. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff's case fails, and it follows that the defendants' counterclaim is misconceived. If, however, it should be held on appeal that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the freight sued for, the defendants are to be at liberty to prove their counterclaim if they can do so.

Ex parte BUENOS AYRES AND PACIFIC RAILWAY (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Withdrawal of proof—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Sched. II.

A creditor will not be allowed to withdraw his proof otherwise than unconditionally while a motion is pending to expunge such proof.

Application by the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway Co. (Limited), creditors of Mateo Clark, for leave to withdraw their proof without prejudice to the presentation of a fresh proof in case it should subsequently appear that there was any debt due to them.

Mateo Clark, the debtor, was a contractor and the builder of the railway. He had covenanted with the railway company to grant to them indefeasible titles of certain lands through which the railway ran. He gave the company a number of their own shares as security for the performance of his covenants. A receiving order was made against him in 1896, but he had not been adjudged bankrupt, having proposed a scheme of arrangement with his creditors. At the date of the receiving order he had not succeeded in obtaining indefeasible titles to the lands in question for the company, and the shares which the company held as security for the performance of the covenants were of small value.

The company, therefore, had put in a proof for damages for breaches of covenant, and had assessed their security at a very small amount.

Subsequently, however, the company succeeded in obtaining some of the titles in question, and the shares held by them as security had also risen greatly in value, so that at the date of the present application their security was enough to cover the whole of their claims against the debtor. They therefore applied for leave to withdraw their proof without prejudice to their right to put in a fresh proof in the future in the event of their security decreasing in value.

Reed, Q.C., and Carrington, for the applicants.—A proof may be withdrawn at any time before it is adjudicated upon for the purposes of dividend: In re Rhoades, 47 W. R. 432, [1899] 1 Q. B. 905. [WRIGHT, J.—But you ask leave to withdraw your proof conditionally.] Yes, the shares held by the company as security may depreciate in value, and the company would desire in that case to put in a fresh proof revaluing their security.

Muir Mackenzie, for the debtor.—The company should not be allowed to withdraw their proof otherwise than absolutely. There is a motion pending to expunge their proof and if successful it will result in showing that there never was any provable debt due to the company.

Reed, Q.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It seem to me that I ought not to establish a precedent in allowing a conditional withdrawal—if I may so call it—of a proof as distinguished from an absolute withdrawal of it, while there is a motion pending to get rid of the proof. If the company had been willing absolutely and finally to abandon their proof I cannot say that there could have been any objection to it. But as they are not willing to do that, and as there is a motion pending by the debtor to get rid of the proof altogether, it seems to me that nothing is gained by allowing the withdrawal of the proof with a reservation that it may hereafter be presented afresh. I think the best course is to refuse this application for withdrawal, but reserve the costs of it until after the hearing of the debtor's motion so that I can see whether there was any substance in the present application or not, and give leave to the company now to amend their proof.

On the hearing of the motion the company may ask the court to take into consideration in their favour the fact that they made the offer, though qualified, to withdraw their proof at the present stage. I do not know whether it will make any difference as to the costs of the motion, but it may; and the company are not to be prejudiced on the hearing of the motion by anything which has taken place here to-day.

Application dismissed.

Practice—Costs—Company—Debenture-holder's action—Insufficient assets.

Where the assets in a debenture-holder's action are insufficient to pay the debentures in full, the plaintiff is entitled to solicitor and client costs out of the fund realized.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. The action was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of herself and all other the debenture-holders of the company to enforce their security. The assets of the company were insufficient for the payment of the debentures in full.

Upon the further consideration of the action the question arose whether the plaintiff was entitled to have her costs taxed as between solicitor and client or as between party and party.

Kekewich, J., directed taxation as between party and party. He was of opinion that although the case of In re Queen's Hotel Co., Cardiff, 48 W. R. 567, [1900] 1 Ch. 792, was distinguishable owing to the fact that the fund in that case was more than sufficient to pay the class of debenture-holders represented by the plaintiff in that case, the principle of that decision applied, and that the rule under which the plaintiff in a creditor's administration action, where the estate was insufficient for the payment of the creditors in full, was entitled to solicitor and client costs, though well settled, rested on no sound principle, and ought not to be extended to debenture-holders' actions.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiff.

Renshaw, K.C., and J. F. Waggett, for the trustees of the debenture-holders.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and A. R. Kirby, and C. T. Mitchell, for other parties.

COLLINS, L.J., said that the learned judge below felt himself bound by a rule of practice which debarred him from giving to the plaintiff other than party and party costs. The plaintiff had succeeded by her diligence in bringing a fund into court for the benefit of the debenture-holders, and she claimed that, having done so, she should not be put in a worse position than the other debenture-holders. As matters stood she had come out of the discussion without being recouped her expenses of recovering the fund. The simple principle, at least in creditors' administration actions, was that where a fund exclusively belonged to a class there should be complete indemnity to the person by whose diligence that fund was realized and secured, and there was no such indemnity where the person obtained only party and party costs. In Thomas v. Jones, 8 W. R. 328, 1 Dr. & Sm. 134, the principle was extended to a new class—namely, to legatees, and Kindersley, V.C., there laid down the principle which ought to govern such cases, which was that where a creditor institutes proceedings on behalf of himself and all the other creditors, and it turns out that the estate applicable to the payment of debts is insufficient, the estate belongs to the creditors exclusively, and therefore if a creditor has, for the benefit of all the other creditors, instituted a suit in which he has recovered a fund, it is extremely unreasonable that the fund which would be divisible among the creditors pro rata should be applied in the payment of debts without recouping that creditor what he has properly expended in recovering the fund, and he is clearly entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client. If the fund is sufficient to pay all the creditors and there is a surplus, that surplus does not belong to the creditors, but to the legatees. That was a reasonable principle, and there was no reason why it should not be applied to debenture-holders' actions as well as to creditors' administration actions. The matter, however, did not rest there, since there were two unreported decisions, one by North, J., and one by Stirling, J., in which the principle had been given effect to in debenture-holders' actions. The decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Queens' Hotel Co. Cardiff, in which party and party costs only were allowed, was a case of a different kind, for there the assets were more than sufficient to pay in full the creditors whom the plaintiff represented and the surplus did not belong to the debenture-holders. Where the fund was sufficient to pay the debenture-holders in full it might well be that different considerations would apply. The principle was perfectly well established and was founded on common sense, and the learned judge below was wrong in thinking that he was debarred from applying it to the present case.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed, and said the question was whether the practice with regard to costs in creditors' administration actions rested upon principle or was an anomaly and a mere rule of thumb. The principle had been formulated by Kindersley, V.C., in Thomas v. Jones, and the only difficulty arose from the fact that the courts had not always been quite logical in carrying out that principle. His lordship saw no reason why the practice should not apply to debenture-holders' actions, and being based on principle he thought it ought to be so applied. The decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., In re Queen's Hotel Co., Cardiff, did not affect the present case at all, and was quite in accordance with the principle laid down by Kindersley, V.C. His lordship was not quite sure whether the principle was properly applied in the case In re McRae, 32 Ch. D. 613, 34 W. R. Dig. 47, but that case did not stand in the way of holding in the present case that the principle applied.

Appeal allowed.

Ecclesiastical law — Churchwarden — Election of parishioners' churchwarden—Right of minister to vote as ratepayer—Canon 89—Sturges Bourne's Act, 1818 (58 Geo. 3, c. 69), s. 3.

The minister of a parish has no right to vote in his capacity as a ratepayer in the election of the parishioners' churchwarden.

Judgment of Wills and Channell, JJ. (ante, p. 399, [1901] 1 Q. B. 573), affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division (Wills and Channell, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus to the Bishop of Salisbury commanding him to admit Samuel Vine to the office of churchwarden of the parish of Winterborne Came, in the county of Dorset (ante, p. 399, [1901] 1 Q. B. 573).

At the election of the parishioners' churchwarden for the parish of Winterborne Came, held on the 23rd of April, 1900, two candidates, Samuel Vine and John Stevens Passmore, were nominated. A poll was demanded, and was taken on the 7th of May. Passmore received twenty-nine votes given by nineteen ratepayers, and Vine received twenty-three votes given by eight ratepayers. The rector, who presided, claimed the right to vote as a ratepayer, and he gave the six votes to which he was entitled by virtue of his assessment to Vine, the result of which was that the votes were equal. The rector then gave his casting vote in favour of Vine, and declared him duly elected.

Both candidates claimed the right to be admitted to the office of churchwarden, and they both applied for admission to the Bishop of Salisbury, who was then holding his triennial visitation.

On the 21st of June the bishop gave his decision in favour of Passmore, who was thereupon admitted to the office.

Vine then applied to the Archdeacon of Dorset to admit him as churchwarden. The archdeacon refused the application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to admit churchwardens during the bishop's visitation.

Vine obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the archdeacon, but this was discharged by the Court of Appeal: see Reg. v. Sowter, ante, p. 338, [1901] 1 Q. B. 396.

Vine thereupon commenced the present proceedings and obtained a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus to the bishop.

By canon 89 of the Canons of 1603, which is declaratory of the common law, as it stood before the passing of Sturges Bourne's Act, "All churchwardens or questmen in every parish shall be chosen by the joint consent of the minister and the parishioners, if it may be; but if they cannot agree upon such a choice then the minister shall choose one and the parishioners another; and without such a joint or several choice none shall take upon them to be churchwardens."

By the Vestries Act, 1818, commonly called Sturges Bourne's Act (58 Geo. 3, c. 69), s. 2: "In case the rector or vicar or perpetual curate shall not be present, the persons so assembled"—that is, in pursuance of a notice of vestry meeting—"shall forthwith nominate and appoint by plurality of votes . . . one of the inhabitants of such parish to be the chairman of and preside in every such vestry; and in all cases of equality of votes upon any question arising therein the chairman shall (in addition to such vote or votes as he may by virtue of this Act be entitled to give in right of his assessment) have the casting vote."

By section 3: "In all such vestries every inhabitant present, who shall by the last rate which shall have been made for the relief of the poor have been assessed and charged, upon or in respect of any annual rent, profit, or value not amounting to £50, shall have and be entitled to give one vote and no more; and every inhabitant there present who shall in such last rate have been assessed or charged, upon or in respect of any annual rent or rents, profit, or value amounting to £50 or upwards (whether in one or in more than one sum or charge) shall have and be entitled to give one vote for every £25 of annual rent, profit, and value upon or in respect of which he shall have been assessed or charged in such last rate, so, nevertheless, that no inhabitant shall be entitled to give more than six votes."

The Divisional Court were of opinion that the rector was not entitled, either by the common law, or by section 3 of Sturges Bourne's Act, to vote in his capacity as a ratepayer in the election of the parishioners' churchwarden. They accordingly held that the bishop had dealt with the matter rightly, and they discharged the rule.

The prosecutor appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Edwardes Jones, for the prosecutor.—By common law, as declared by the canon, the minister is entitled to vote as a parishioner in the election of the parishioners' churchwarden. The expression "the parishioners" does not exclude the minister. The common law rule was laid down in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench delivered by Lord Denman, C.J., in Reg. v. D'Oyly, 12 A. & E. 139. The question was as to the right of the minister to preside at the election of the parishioners' churchwarden, and Lord Denman said, "It is clear that, as a parishioner, he might give a vote deciding the nomination." The dictum ascribed to Lord Hardwicke in Strange's report of Stoughton v. Reynolds, 2 Str. 1044, that the minister seems to have no share in the election of the second churchwarden, is not to be found in the other reports—viz., Fortescue, 168, and Lee temp. Hardwicke, 274. Moreover Stoughton v. Reynolds was at least partially overruled in Wilson v. M'Math, 3 Phillim. 67. At any rate the minister has a right to such a vote under section 3 of Sturges Bourne's Act, which expressly enacts that every inhabitant present at the vestry who is assessed to the poor rate is entitled to vote. The intention of the Act is that property is to be represented. A distinction must be drawn between the right of the minister as a spiritual person to appoint one churchwarden and his right as an inhabitant ratepayer to vote in the election of the other churchwarden. And it can make no difference whether he is a ratepayer in respect of property held by him in his private capacity or in respect of his ecclesiastical freehold. The words of the section are quite general and unqualified, and there is no ground for saying that they are not applicable to an election of a people's churchwarden.

They also cited Ranson and Knott v. Campkin, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 370; Reg. v. Kirby, 10 W. R. 13, 31 L. J. Q. B. 3.

Dibdin, K.C. (C. W. Holgate with him), for the bishop.—The canon draws a clear distinction between the minister and the parishioners. Primarily the election of churchwardens is a matter for the vestry as a whole. But if the minister and the parishioners cannot agree, then the minister is to choose one churchwarden and the parishioners another. The term "the parishioners" is clearly used here in a sense excluding the minister. The argument for the prosecutor treats "the parishioners" as equivalent to "the vestry." The minister and the parishioners together constitute the vestry. Lord Denman's proposition in Reg. v. D'Oyly is only a dictum. Sturges Bourne's Act is a general Act dealing with the holding of vestries for parochial matters. It ought not to be construed as altering the law relating to the election of churchwardens. If it has taken away the right of the people other than the minister to choose their churchwardens, it must equally have taken away the right of the minister to choose his churchwarden.

He referred to The Queen v. Allen, 21 W. R. 190, L. R. 8 Q. B. 69.

May 3.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: Prior to the passing of Sturges Bourne's

Act in 1818 there can be no doubt that, if the minister and the parishioners of a parish did not agree as to the appointment of the churchwardens, the minister appointed his churchwarden—that is, the incumbent's churchwarden, and the parishioners appointed their churchwarden—that is, the people's churchwarden. And the 89th canon of the Canons of 1603, which is declaratory of the common law, makes this abundantly plain. The canon is as follows: "All churchwardens or questmen in every parish shall be chosen by the joint consent of the minister and the parishioners, if it may be; but if they cannot agree upon such a choice, then the minister shall choose one and the parishioners another, and without such joint and several consent none shall take upon them to be churchwardens." I agree with my brothers Wills and Channell that in this canon the parishioners are mentioned in such a way as to show that in case the vestry cannot agree the minister is to choose his own churchwarden, and the parishioners as opposed to and distinguished from him are to choose their churchwarden. The term "parishioners" in the canon means the minister's parishioners, and would not include the minister himself. And, accordingly, it is not in dispute that in practice the minister never did take part in the voting for the parishioners' churchwarden. But it is said on behalf of the appellant that the effect of Sturges Bourne's Act was to alter the position of affairs and that, while it left unaffected the right of the minister to choose his own churchwarden, it at the same time gave him the right to vote in the election of the parishioners' churchwarden. Now, in the first place, it is to be observed that the Act, which is intituled "An Act for the Regulation of Parish Vestries," is perfectly general in its character, and does not refer in terms to the election of churchwardens, or purport to alter the then existing law and practice whereby, at a vestry meeting, in case of the vestry not agreeing in the selection of the churchwardens, the minister, who is part of the vestry, on the one hand was entitled to choose his churchwarden, and the parishioners on the other hand, as distinguished from the minister, were at the vestry meeting entitled to vote for the parishioners' churchwarden. And on the best consideration I can give to the matter I do not think that the Act was intended to alter, or that on its true construction it did alter, the existing law and practice in the way contended for by the appellant. If the Act was intended to alter the existing law and practice as to the election of churchwardens in the way contended for, it is difficult to see why it should not also have altered the right of the minister to choose his own churchwarden. But the appellant shrinks from contending this, and, indeed, such a contention could not be supported. I think that the true reading of the Act is that, although the class of persons who as parishioners are entitled to vote at a vestry meeting and their franchise are by the Act altered, yet the election of churchwardens was not otherwise intended to be altered or affected, so that, in case of the vestry not being able to agree, the minister is still entitled to choose his churchwarden, and his parishioners apart from him, though presided over by him as chairman if he be present, are entitled to vote for the other churchwarden. I understand that the point now taken by the appellant—viz., that the minister can now vote for the people's churchwarden—is a novel one, and that, although Sturges Bourne's Act has been in operation since the 3rd of June, 1818, the practice has been to act upon the construction of the Act adopted by me. The view of the Act I have expressed is borne out by an examination of its material sections. Section 1, after reciting that it is expedient to regulate the manner of holding parish vestries and the right of voting therein, enacts that public notice shall be given of the vestry meeting and the special purpose thereof, and by section 2 it is enacted that, in case the rector, vicar, or perpetual curate shall not be present, the persons so assembled in pursuance of such notice shall forthwith nominate and appoint by plurality of votes to be ascertained as thereinafter directed — that is, by every inhabitant present who has the new franchise conferred upon him by section 3—one of the inhabitants of such parish to be the chairman and preside in every such vestry, and in all cases of equality of votes, upon any question arising therein, the chairman shall, in addition to such vote or votes as he may by virtue of this Act be entitled to give in right of his assessment, have the casting vote. This second section appears to me only to deal with those cases in which there is an equality of votes amongst those present who on the subject voted upon are entitled to vote. I cannot find in this section any indication that where the voting is upon the election of the parishioners' churchwarden, and the minister is chairman, he is to be entitled to vote as a parishioner, and then, if the votes be made equal by his vote, have a right to vote as chairman. The next section (section 3) enacts that in all vestries the inhabitants present shall be entitled to vote according to the new franchise prescribed in that section. That section is perfectly general, and no doubt regulates generally who are to vote at vestries and what votes they shall have. But full effect can be given to it as a general enactment without implying that the minister shall have the right to vote for the people's churchwarden, or that the parishioners shall vote for the rector's churchwarden. It will be noticed that throughout this section there is not a word said as to the questions upon which, or the persons for whom, the voters with the new franchise are to vote, and in my judgment it leaves untouched the question as to how churchwardens are to be chosen. It appears to me that after the Act, as before it, if the vestry cannot agree in selecting the churchwardens, they are to be selected, one by the minister and the other by his parishioners. The choice of the parishioners, apart from the minister, could, and would, be ascertained by their votes in the manner prescribed by the Act. I see no sufficient reason why this should not be done without its following as a necessary corollary that the minister is to vote in his character of parishioner, or inhabitant, or ratepayer. I agree in the view taken by my brother Channell that the machinery and procedure of the Act can be applied in taking the votes on the question as to the election of the parishioners' churchwarden without its thereby following that the minister is to vote in his character of ratepayer. It does not appear to me to be necessary to review the authorities, which have been sufficiently dealt with in the court below. And in the result I agree with the Divisional Court, and I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not think Sturges Bourne's Act meant to alter the respective relative rights of the parson and his parishioners in the matter of selection and election of churchwardens by the one and the other.

ROMER, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

ELLIMAN, SONS, & CO. (LIMITED) v. CARRINGTON & SON (LIMITED). (a.)

Contract—Restraint of trade—Contract not to retail goods supplied by plaintiff below a fixed price.

A contract entered into with a manufacturer not to retail his goods below a fixed price is not a contract in restraint of trade.

The plaintiffs in this action were the proprietors of Elliman's Embrocation.

Before delivering their goods they made purchasers sign an agreement not to retail them below certain fixed prices, and to obtain from every dealer whom they might supply a signed agreement in similar terms.

The defendants purchased certain goods from the plaintiffs, after signing the agreement in the usual form, but resold some of them to dealers without obtaining from them the stipulated agreements. The dealers were thereby enabled to retail the goods at sums below the fixed price, whereupon the plaintiffs brought this action for an injunction and damages.

The defendants did not dispute the facts, but contended that the contract was unenforceable as being in restraint of trade.

Renshaw, K.C., and E. Ford, for the plaintiffs.

Warrington, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendants.—The whole object of the contract is to upset the natural laws of supply and demand, and is therefore directly injurious to the public, and it interferes with the right of the individual to carry on his business in his own way: Hilton v. Eckersley, 4 W. R. 326, 6 E. & B. 47. An agreement merely for the purpose of raising prices is not enforceable: Urmston v. Whitelegg, 63 L. T. Rep. 455, 55 J. P. 453, 39 W. R. Dig. 193. It is settled that an agreement which is in restraint of trade can only be enforced if it is reasonable for the protection of the party in whose favour it is imposed and at the same time is in no way injurious to the public: Nordenfelt v. Maxim-Nordenfelt Co., [1894] App. Cas. 535, at p. 565.

KEKEWICH, J.—The defendants' point is that the contract is unenforceable, and that conclusion, they say, follows from the fact that it is in restraint of trade. In one sense, no doubt, the contract is in restraint of trade, for it prevents one party from being able to do what he pleases with the goods. On the other hand, the plaintiffs are not bound either to sell or manufacture the goods; and if they do sell they are at liberty to charge whatever price they please. That is the right of every owner of goods, and neither the moral nor the legal ideas which once attached to the sale of corn can apply to embrocation. So it was perfectly competent for the plaintiffs to bargain with the defendants or anyone else that they should not retail the goods below a fixed price. The cases cited are all well known and must be recognized, but they are not in point. To call in public policy and say that that is to prevent the plaintiff from exercising his own liberty in the matter is to ride an exceedingly high horse. Still the defendants have broken the contract, not by retailing the goods below the fixed price, but by failing to obtain contracts of a like nature from dealers whom they supplied. Of this they must bear the consequences. It is not a case for an injunction, as the plaintiffs have the remedy in their own hands by closing their account and refusing to sell the defendants any more goods. It is reduced, therefore, to a question of damages, which, it is admitted, must be merely nominal. The defendants must pay 20s. damages and costs.

POWELL v. BRODHURST. (a.)

Mortgage—Joint account—Part discharge of joint debt—Receipt by one of two joint creditors—Remedies of mortgagor at law and in equity—Joint account clause—Disclosure of trusts.

In a foreclosure action for £4,000 the defendant claimed to redeem for £3,000, contending that a payment of £1,000 to a firm in which one of his joint creditors was a partner, but which did not appear to have been authorized to act as agent in the matter, discharged the mortgage pro tanto.

Held, that, although the payment to one of the joint creditors might have been a good discharge of the joint debt in law, yet the court of equity would consider all the facts of the case and decide whether it was equitable to deprive the plaintiffs of their legal title to the charge as a whole, and that in this case the plaintiffs were entitled to foreclosure, the principal sum being £4,000.

Steeds v. Steeds, 37 W. R. 378, 22 Q. B. D. 537, explained.

Matson v. Denis, 4 De G. J. & S. 345, followed.

On the 1st of March, 1872, the defendant executed a mortgage of real estate at Worksop to Barnett and Birch to secure £6,000 and interest at 4 per cent. per annum, and by the same deed covenanted to pay the said sum on the 1st of September, 1872.

In 1875 £1,000, part of the £6,000, was repaid.

Both the mortgagees died, and on the 1st of September, 1878, the executor of the survivor transferred the £5,000 mortgage debt and the securities to Cartmell Harrison and J. C. Ingram.

In 1888 the defendant paid off another £1,000, leaving £4,000 only remaining on the security.

In 1890 this sum of £4,000 and the securities for it were transferred to de Paravacini and James Ingram.

In August and September, 1892, the defendant sent two cheques for £500 each to the firm of Ingram & Harrison, and these sums were accepted by Cartmell Harrison (by a letter of the 31st of August, 1892) as in part discharge of the mortgage debt.

Both the sums of £1,000 previously paid off had been paid in like manner by the defendant to the firm, and had been duly applied by them.

Both the sums of £500 were paid into the account of the firm, and were credited in the books of the firm to the defendant, and the interest on the mortgage debt was throughout paid to the firm, and after September, 1892, was paid on £3,000 only.

On the 26th of September, 1897, de Paravacini died, and on the 25th of December, 1897, James Ingram died, and on the 1st of May, 1900, his executors transferred the mortgage debt and security to the plaintiffs. The mortgage debt was stated in the transfer to be £4,000, but the transferees had notice of the payment of the two sums of £500 to the firm of Ingram & Harrison before its execution. The money was in fact trust money, and no consideration therefore passed from the plaintiffs to the executors. The plaintiffs therefore stood in the same position as James Ingram, and the action was to be regarded as an action by him. The defendant had no notice when he paid the two sums of £500 in 1892 that the mortgage debt was trust money.

James Ingram, one of the transferees in 1890, was the senior partner in the firm of Ingram & Harrison from a period prior to 1891 till his death in December, 1897. He was taken ill at the end of 1891, and did not come to the office at all in 1892. He came for a few days in 1893 and 1894, but he never really attended personally to any business after 1891. The other partners in the firm from 1891 till December, 1897, were Cartmell Harrison and J. C. Ingram.

The plaintiffs claimed to have an account taken of what was due under the covenant in the mortgage and an order for payment, and an account of what was due under or by virtue of the mortgage, and foreclosure.

The defendant admitted that £3,000 was owing and secured, but denied his liability to pay more, and claimed to redeem on the footing that £3,000, and not £4,000, was owing on the security.

W. H. Upjohn, K.C. (G. Cave with him), for the defendant, argued the case first.—The true nature of the transaction was that the defendant, the mortgagor, paid money on account to one of two joint mortgagees, who afterwards became the survivor on the joint account; he was James Ingram, who admittedly was a member of the firm which received the £1,000. But neither James Ingram nor his executors could have sued for the other moiety, and their transferees can be in no better position. The mortgage is merely a security for the debt covenanted to be paid, and is to be diminished by the amount of reduction of the debt: Matson v. Dennis, per Stuart, V.C., in 12 W. R. 596. Apart from the notice of the trust, at common law the payment by the debtor to one of two joint creditors is a good payment to the extent to which he is entitled to assume that that creditor is beneficially entitled Steeds v. Steeds, 37 W. R. 378, 22 Q. B. D. 537; and, before the Judicature Act, Morley v. Bird, 3 Ves. 629; Wallace v. Kelsall, 7 M. & W. 264; Husband v. Davis, 10 C. B. 645, at p. 650; and Rigden v. Vallier, 2 Ves. sen. 252, cited in a note to Lake v. Craddock, 3 P. Wms. 158. [The cases of Marsh v. Keating, 1 Bing. N. C. 198, 219; Webb v. Ledsam, 1 K. & J. 385, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 101; and Turner v. Smith, 49 W. R. 186, [1901] 1 Ch. 213, were also referred to.] What is good defence at law is a good defence at equity in the circumstances of this case.

J. G. Butcher, K.C., and H. E. Wright, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant cannot say that the payment was not made to the firm, or that it was made to James Ingram through the firm, when its agency to receive it is not proved. Even if he could, there is no authority that a payment to, and discharge by, one of two trustees is a good discharge of the debt. So long as two persons are entitled to receive a mortgage debt, the receipt of one is inoperative. The payment in 1892 was not good then, and cannot be validated by the death of his co-creditor in 1897. The defendant can only redeem on payment of the full £4,000, to which the mortgagees and their transferees are entitled, as there is no misconduct in the present case. The doctrine of Steeds v. Steeds cannot be applied to the present question, which is one of equity: see Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 754, 38 Ch. D. 458, at p. 465. If the defendant succeeds no trustees will be safe again in lending trust moneys without disclosing the trust. [FARWELL, J., referred to Robbins on Mortgages (1897 ed.), p. 845, and cases there cited.]

W. H. Upjohn, K.C., replied.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts as above, said: There are therefore two questions involved—(1) the liability under the covenant, which is a question of common law, and (2) the liability in the foreclosure action, which is a question of equity. In my opinion the old rule of common law, that payment to one of two joint creditors is a good discharge of the joint debt, still remains good. There was no possible conflict of any equitable rule with this, because no bill would lie in Chancery to recover a mere money demand. Equity no doubt had to deal with debts in the administration of the estates of deceased persons and in the liquidation of companies, but in determining whether claims for debts had been discharged or not equity followed the law, and indeed in cases of difficulty, before 15 & 16 Vict. c. 56, ss. 61 and 62, sent cases for the opinion of the common law courts. There is nothing inconsistent with this in Steeds v. Steeds. The question there was whether it was so clear that the debt claimed was joint that the defence should be struck out, and it was held that there was a conflict between law and equity in the presumption to be drawn from the existence of a security to two without words of severance, and that the rule of equity as to such presumption now prevails. But that was a conflict of presumptions—whether there was or was not a joint tenancy, and had no relation to the legal consequences flowing from the existence of an admitted joint tenancy. In the present case both sides agree that this is a joint debt, and, having regard to the words of the covenant and the 61st section of the Conveyancing Act, I take this to be correct. But the joint debt in this case was not paid to either of the joint creditors, but to the firm of which one of them was a member. Now, payment of a private debt due to a member of a firm, to the firm of which such creditor is a member will not, in my opinion, support a plea of payment in the absence of evidence, express or implied, that the creditor has authorized the receipt of the money by the firm as his agents. The mere fact that the person who has made the payment would have a good cause of action against the firm to recover the money if the sum is not accepted in payment, does not make it payment. The defendants to such an action must be all the partners, and there is no set-off either in law or in equity of the private debt of one defendant against the joint debt of the firm: see Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.), p. 292 (4), and cases cited there. It is, no doubt, generally true that a man may do by his agent anything that he can do himself, and I will assume that a joint creditor may effectually receive payment of a joint debt by his agent; and, in an ordinary case, I should infer agency from the receipt and expenditure of the money by the firm, and its entry in the firm's books; but there is a great difficulty in coming to such a conclusion in the present case. If James Ingram did in fact authorize the firm to receive this money he was guilty of a breach of trust, and the court never infers that a man is guilty of a wrongful act unless the inference is irresistible. In the present case it is apparent from the admitted facts relating to James Ingram that he took very little part in the business of the firm after 1891. It is quite possible that he knew nothing whatever of the receipt of this money, and, although he would be liable jointly with his partners to refund it because he had had the benefit of it, as he must be taken to have known, it does not necessarily follow that he authorized the receipt. I do not think that I am bound, or, indeed, ought, to convict him of such a breach of trust. I do not, however, propose to rest my judgment solely on this ground. The real contest between the parties has been as to the extent to which the property is charged. The plaintiffs argued that, even assuming that the £1,000 has been paid off, so that £3,000 only could be recovered under the covenant at law, nevertheless the defendant can only redeem on payment of the full £4,000. The defendant argued that the mortgage is merely a security for the debt covenanted to be paid, and that if, and so far as, the debt is gone, the mortgage must be diminished to the same extent, and, indeed, Stuart, V.C., decided the case of Matson v. Denis, 12 W. R. 596, on this very ground. That was an objection to title between vendor and purchaser, and the Vice-Chancellor said that the purchaser was entitled to evidence that the joint debt was properly discharged; that a joint debt was properly discharged by payment to one joint creditor; that at law the receipt of one joint creditor was an extinction of the debt; and that no law was applicable but that of debtor and creditor; and he ordered the purchaser to pay his purchase-money into court, with costs. But his judgment did not meet with approval in the Court of Appeal. I have referred to it because it shows that the very point now argued was raised and decided. Knight Bruce, L.J., says, 4 De G. J. & S, at p. 350: "The question is, whether when an equitable charge is vested in two persons—and, as I will assume, as joint tenants—the money can be paid to one without any special authority from the other so as to discharge the estate. I am not speaking of an action. I am speaking of discharging an equitable burden upon an estate, and so discharging the estate. In my judgment, and in the absence of special circumstances such as are not shown to exist in the present case, that cannot be done. The purchaser is entitled to have it taken here that Mr. McLeay was alive at the time, and that some money has, without any consent on his part, been paid to the other joint tenant or tenant in common. That, I repeat, in my judgment does not discharge the estate in equity. Especially in the case of vendor and purchaser I think the purchaser has a right to say that the whole £3,000 was not shown to be discharged, but that it is consistent with the evidence to suppose that it may be still an available charge in equity." Turner, L.J., shortly referred to the facts and concurred, adding that that part of the order under appeal which directed the payment of the purchase-money into court was right, and ought to stand, because the title was good and the question raised only one of conveyance. An order was made accordingly, by which the purchase-money was to be brought into court. No costs were given on either side, but the costs of the plaintiffs in the suit were directed to be costs in the cause. The reasoning of the Court of Appeal is contrary to the reasoning of Stuart, V.C., in the court below, which I have read. It was urged that this amounts only to an expression of opinion that the purchaser was entitled for his protection to have the concurrence of a possible claimant, but I cannot regard it as confined to this, and I am, of course, bound by the decision, and not the less because it coincides with my own opinion and the general practice of conveyancers, for, if the defendant is right, the joint account clause ought never to be inserted where the mortgage money is held in trust, and the existence of the trust ought always to be disclosed—a course which would revolutionize a settled practice of many years' standing. The fallacy of the defendant's argument consists in the assumption that the question whether the money covenanted to be paid is recoverable at law is the only relevant consideration in foreclosure or redemption proceedings and in disregarding the principles of equity that underlie foreclosure and redemption. The mortgagee's estate is absolute at law on breach of the covenant to pay on the appointed day, but the court interferes for the benefit of the mortgagor on the terms that he does equity. The mere payment of the principal and interest legally recoverable is not necessarily sufficient. For example, money laid out in permanent improvements may have to be paid, although there is no covenant under which it could be recovered at law, and in a mortgage of a reversionary interest in land where time runs from the falling into possession of such interest, foreclosure will be granted although the remedy on the covenant is statute barred (Hugill v. Wilkinson, 36 W. R. 633, 38 Ch. D. 480), and arrears of interest for more than six years may be retained in an action to redeem a mortgage of a reversion (Dingle v. Coppen, 47 W. R. 279, [1899] 1 Ch. 726); and the mortgagee's right to tack and consolidate depend on the same principle. If a mortgagor chooses to pay otherwise than in strict accordance with the terms of his contract he does so at his own risk. The proviso for redemption in a mortgage to several is never expressed to take effect on payment to the mortgagees or either of them, but to the mortgagees or the survivor of them; and if a mortgagor pays to one, although such payment may be a good discharge in law, yet the matter is at large when he comes into equity, and the court takes into consideration all the facts of the case, and ascertains whether the payee was beneficially entitled to the whole or to a part only, or whether he was a trustee with the other mortgagee, and treats the payment as good in whole, or in part, or altogether bad, accordingly. It is not a question of fixing the mortgagor with notice of a trust, but it is the inquiry that the court makes to satisfy itself that it is just and equitable under all the circumstances to deprive the mortgagee of his legal title to the property comprised in the mortgage. This is an answer to the last argument of the defendant—that James Ingram was the actual survivor, and therefore could have received the money and given a valid receipt at a later date. The mortgagor did not, in fact, pay to the survivor, but to one of two. He can rely only on the receipt as at the time when it was given, and he has only himself to thank because he chose to pay otherwise than in accordance with the contract. Indeed, on his own evidence he trusted to the firm of Ingram & Harrison to do what was right with the money, and to endorse a receipt for the £1,000 on the mortgage. The judgment will be in the usual form (Farrer v. Lacy Hartland, 34 W. R. 22, 31 Ch. D. 42, at p. 51), the principal sum due being £4,000, not £3,000.

By a contract dated the 25th of January, 1897, F. Saunders, the vendor, agreed to sell, and the plaintiffs, as purchasers, to purchase, a freehold plot on a building estate of the vendors for the sum of £500, to be paid as to £200 by way of deposit on the signing of the contract, and as to the balance of £300 on the completion of the purchase with interest.

The contract provided: "Clause 3.—The purchase is to be completed as soon as 300 houses shall have been erected on the said estate (but without prejudice to clause 10 hereof) at the office of the vendor's solicitors, and the purchasers are to have possession as from the day of completion, when the balance of purchase-money, with interest as aforesaid, is to be paid. All outgoings up to that time will be cleared by the vendor, his heirs or assigns."

Clause 9 enabled the vendor to cancel the contract if the purchasers made any requisition which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to comply with.

"Clause 10.—If 300 houses shall not be erected on the said Woodhouse estate within two years from the date of this agreement, the purchasers shall have the right, by giving seven days' notice in writing to the vendor, to rescind and cancel this agreement, and at the expiration of such seven days the agreement shall absolutely cease and determine.

"Clause 11.—In the event of either the vendor or the purchasers cancelling this contract by virtue of any of the powers herein given, no costs, expenses, loss, or damage of any kind whatsoever shall be claimed or paid from one to the other, but the deposit without interest shall be returned by the vendor to the purchasers."

The plaintiffs paid Saunders the deposit of £200. Saunders afterwards sold and conveyed the Woodhouse estate to Saxelby, who mortgaged it.

In November, 1900, the mortgagees sold and conveyed the estate to the defendant Watt with notice of the contract of the 25th of January, 1897.

The 300 houses were not built, and Saunders did not pay or account for the deposit to any of his successors in title.

On the 3rd of December, 1900, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant rescinding the contract of the 25th of January, 1897, and claiming payment of the deposit of £200, which was refused.

The summons claimed a declaration (1) that under the contract of the 25th of January, 1897, the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge or lien on the hereditaments therein described by way of security for the repayment of the deposit of £200 paid by them to Saunders on signing the contract, and (2) enforcement of the said security by foreclosure or sale.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, said: The 300 houses have not been built, and on the 3rd of December, 1900, the plaintiffs gave the defendant notice to rescind, and on their behalf it is contended that they have a lien for their deposit on the estate in the hands of the defendant. On the other hand it is said that the lien arises only on the vendor's default, and depends on his default. The defendant's contention is inconsistent with the law as settled by the authorities and well stated in Robbins on Mortgages, vol. 2, p. 1376: "If a purchaser advance all or any part of the money to the vendor, and the contract is broken off, an implied contract arises, by which the purchaser has a lien on the land; and if the purchaser properly declines to complete, he has a lien for the deposit and interest on unpaid purchase-money, and for interest on the payments and also for the costs of a suit by himself or the vendor to compel performance of the contract, and this lien attaches on the deeds. If the purchase goes off through the fault of the purchaser, of course he has no lien for what he has paid." That seems to me to be a complete and accurate statement of the law. Then in Wythes v. Lee Kindersley, V.C., contrasts the case of a purchaser and a vendor, and what he says is quite consistent with an absence of any wrong-doing or default. He says: "This is clear, that the vendor, if he has parted with the estate to the purchaser before he has got his money, has a lien for it on the estate; that is unquestionable. Now, does the right of the purchaser, if the contract goes off, stand in principle on the same footing as that of the vendor?" Then after considering that aspect of the case, he says: "When a contract is made and then goes off, it appears to me that in principle and justice the equity of the purchaser to a lien on the estate ought to stand on as good a footing as the lien of the vendor after conveyance." The matter came before the House of Lords in Rose v. Watson. That case, to my mind, is on all fours with the present. There was, first, a contract, then a mortgage with notice, and then default by the vendor, and the House of Lords held that the purchaser who had paid a deposit had a charge for that deposit and interest in priority to the mortgagees. It was put by Lord Cranworth thus: "There can be no doubt, I apprehend, that when a purchaser has paid his purchase-money, though he has got no conveyance, the vendor becomes a trustee for him of the legal estate, and he is, in equity, considered as the owner of the estate. When instead of paying the whole of his purchase-money, he pays a part of it, it would seem to follow, as a necessary corollary, that to the extent to which he has paid his purchase-money, to that extent the vendor is a trustee for him; in other words, that he acquires a lien, exactly in the same way as if upon the payment of part of the purchase-money the vendor had executed a mortgage to him of the estate to that extent." And Lord Westbury in the same case had previously pointed out that the money paid in conformity with the contract was part of the purchase-money under the contract; at p. 682 he says: "It was money advanced upon the faith that the land the subject of the contract would become the property of the respondent; and being so paid as part of the purchase-money under the contract, and being paid in advance, on the faith of the vendor's performance of the contract, I think that your lordships will have little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that those sums of money thus paid formed principal sums, in respect of which there became a lien from the time of the payment of them; in consequence of the subsequent failure of the vendor to perform the contract, and becoming such lien, they bore fruit consequently—that is to say, they entitled the person who is possessed of that lien to claim interest in respect of them." The lien is created by the contract under which the money is paid as part of the purchase-money and on the faith that the contract will be carried out, and not by the default of the vendor. The default gives rise to the necessity for enforcing the lien, but the lien arises from the contract. I see no reason why a condition that, if 300 houses are not built the purchaser may rescind, should be held to differ in any way from the ordinary condition in a contract that, if the purchaser makes or insists upon any requisition or objection to the title which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with the vendor may rescind. There is no default there, but I venture to think it would not be arguable, and I do not think counsel for the defendant contended that the purchaser in such a case would have no right to a lien in the same way as if the purchase went off by reason of want of title on the part of the vendor. It is not default. It is rather misfortune. I hold, therefore, that on authority and on principle the purchaser has a lien, both when the contract goes off for want of title, and when the contract is rescinded under a condition enabling the purchaser to rescind. If the purchaser himself makes default the case is entirely different. If the purchaser makes default in such a way as to deprive himself of any debt at all, he cannot have a lien for that which does not exist. The only authority against the view which I have expressed is a dictum of Kay, L.J., in Rodger v. Harrison, and if the Lord Justice was right in that expression of opinion, it is, no doubt, decisive of the present case. The dictum was not necessary for the decision of the case before him, the point in which was the meaning of the word "assurance" in the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884. The Lord Justice says: "If there be a lien for the purchase-money paid, when does that lien come into existence? Certainly not at the date of the contract. It cannot, then, be assumed that the contract will go off by default of the vendor. The purchaser's right, then, is to have the land itself." With every respect to the Lord Justice, that is not accurate. It is directly in the teeth of the decision of Rose v. Watson, in which the lien was anterior to the default; Rose v. Watson was not cited to him, and could certainly not have been present to his mind.

Easement—Right of way—Private right of way—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 2, 3, 4—Unity of possession of alleged dominant and servient tenements by lessee.

Unity of possession of the dominant and servient tenements in the person of a lessee for years during the twenty years next before action brought is sufficient to bar a claim to a right of way under the Prescription Act.

Onley v. Gardiner, 4 M. & W. 496, and Battishill v. Reed, 4 W. R. 603, 18 C. B. 696, followed.

Trial of action.

Sarah Rachel Damper, the plaintiff in this action, was the owner of a farm known as Springfield Farm, Penshurst, Kent, and Elizabeth Bassett, the defendant, was part owner of an adjoining farm known as Holt's Farm.

The plaintiff's case was that the defendant had committed a trespass by driving a horse and cart across certain meadows forming part of Springhill Farm on to the highway.

The defendant admitted the act complained of, but justified it as having been committed in assertion of a private right of way which she claimed under the Prescription Act.

Many witnesses were called, and much conflicting evidence was given as to the user of the alleged right of way.

It was, however, proved, amongst other things, that from the year 1877 one George Ashby became tenant both of Holt's Farm and of Springhill Farm, and remained tenant of both until his death in 1898, after which his representatives remained in possession until Michaelmas, 1899.

Hughes, K.C., and Boxall, for the plaintiff.—In order to claim under the Prescription Act, the right of way must have been enjoyed as an easement and as of right: Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 211, at p. 219; Monmouth Canal Co. v. Harford, ibid. 614. During the period of the unity of possession neither of these can have existed. Moreover, the easement must have been enjoyed during the twenty years next before action brought: Onley v. Gardiner, 4 M. & W. 496; Battishill v. Reed, 4 W. R. 603, 18 C. B. 696.

Younger, K.C., and Church, for the defendant.—Bright v. Walker and Onley v. Gardiner do not affect the case, because there the plaintiff was not in a position to prove twenty years' user without taking into account the period covered by the unity of possession. All that those cases go to prove is that there must have been, at some time or other, continuous enjoyment of the easement for twenty years, and that the terms of the Act are not satisfied by adding together isolated periods. The only case on which the proposition rests is Battishill v. Reed, and that case should not be followed In Simper v. Foley, 2 Jo. & Hem. 555, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 23, unity of ownership was held only to produce a suspension of the easement; and so in Ladyman v. Grave, 19 W. R. 863, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 763, where it is decided that the interruption indicated by the statute means an adverse interruption.

They also cited Hollins v. Verney, 33 W. R. 5, 13 Q. B. D. 304; Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Cr. M. & R. 34; and Gale on Easements, at pp. 165 and 209. They further asked permission, if necessary, to amend the pleadings and claim the right by immemorial user.

Hughes, K.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21.—JOYCE, J.—This is an action of trespass by the owners of Springhill Farm against the defendant as owner, or part owner, of Holt's Farm, in driving a horse and cart from Holt's Farm across certain meadows forming part of Springhill Farm to the highway leading to Penshurst. The defence is that the act complained of was done in exercise of a private right of way, which is thus pleaded in paragraph 4 of the statement of defence: "For upwards of forty years prior to the commencement of this action the defendant and her predecessors in title, and persons employed by and serving them respectively, have uninterruptedly and as of right passed and repassed with cattle, horses, wagons, carts, and carriages, and on foot for all purposes along and over the roadway coloured red on the plan printed hereon between the points marked A and B on such plan." This I understand to be a plea of a right of way under the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71); and the defendant contended, while the plaintiffs disputed, that the existence of the alleged right of way could be made out under the provisions of section 2 of that Act, and this was the issue which the plaintiffs came to the trial prepared to meet, and which was tried accordingly. Now, the action was instituted on the 28th of May, 1900. It appeared that from the year 1877 until his death in 1898 one Ashby, as tenant, was in occupation, not only of Springhill Farm, but of Holt's Farm, and his representatives remained in occupation until Michaelmas, 1899. In other words, for the twenty years, and for twenty-three years of the forty years, immediately preceding the action there was unity of possession of the alleged servient and alleged dominant tenement, so that the private right of way alleged, if it ever existed, could not during the last twenty-three years have been enjoyed as of right as an easement. This being so the plaintiffs insisted upon the provisions of the fourth section of the Act and the decisions in Bright v. Walker, Onley v. Gardiner, and Battishill v. Reed as being fatal to the defendant's claim to have acquired a right of way under the Prescription Act. I understood the defendant's counsel to contend that the two last-mentioned decisions have been overruled or ought not to be followed, relying upon certain dicta that have fallen from the court in cases where the easement in question was the right to the access of light, which, it is well settled, stands, as compared with other easements, upon a special and peculiar footing under the provisions of the third section of the Prescription Act. I do not consider myself entitled, nor indeed do I see any reason why I should desire, to hold myself not bound by the decisions of the eminent judges who decided the cases I have mentioned, and in particular Onley v. Gardiner and Battishill v. Reed. They have not either of them been overruled or, so far as I am aware, expressly disapproved of; and I must, therefore, follow them. But at all events the case of Baxter v. Taylor, 4 B. & Ad. 72, shows that the user, if any, of the alleged right of way at any time during the last forty years would, under the circumstances, be no evidence of right as against the owners of the freehold of Springhill Farm—that is to say, against the present plaintiffs. As a matter of fact, it does not appear that at any time during Ashby's possession of the two farms the alleged way or right of way was actually used in any sense whatever. For all necessary purposes of communication between the two farms Ashby, at least for many years before his death, made use of an opening in the boundary fence at an entirely different place from that at which it is now alleged that the right of way existed. In the circumstances stated, I consider that the claim of the defendant to a right of way under the provisions of section 2 of the Prescription Act fails as well by reason of the fact that there cannot possibly have been any continuous user of the kind required by the Act for either twenty years or forty years next before the action as also because the enjoyment, if any, during either of those periods would not, in my opinion, have been effectual as against the plaintiffs.

His lordship also found against the defendant upon the facts, and refused leave to amend the pleadings at so late a stage in the proceedings. He granted an injunction against the defendant, gave one shilling damages, and ordered the defendant to pay the costs.

PICKFORD (Appellant) v. CORSI (Respondent). (a.)

Pawnbrokers — Unlawful pawning of stolen article—Conviction of pawner for larceny—Liability of pawner to further proceedings by pawnbroker—Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict c. 93), s. 33.

Where a person steals an article and unlawfully pledges it with a pawnbroker, and is subsequently charged with the theft and is convicted, the pawnbroker does not thereby lose the right to take proceedings against the pawner under section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, because the pawner has been convicted of larceny by the owner of the goods.

This was an appeal on a case stated by Haden Corser, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, the point raised being whether a man is liable to be convicted of the offence under the Pawnbrokers Act of unlawfully pledging goods belonging to another person after he has been already convicted of the larceny of the same goods.

The facts, as stated by the case, were as follows: At a court of summary jurisdiction holden at the Worship-street police-court, one of the police courts of the metropolis, on the 24th and 31st days of January, 1901, an information bearing date the 13th of January, 1901, preferred by the appellant against Antonio Corsi (hereinafter called the respondent) under section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, charging that he, the said respondent, on the 5th of January, 1901, had knowingly and designedly pawned with the appellant, being a pawnbroker within the meaning of the said Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, two rings, being the property of one Constance Laura Biddulph, the respondent not being employed or authorized by the said Constance Laura Biddulph to pawn the same, was heard and determined by the aforesaid magistrate, and upon such hearing the said information was dismissed. Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were either admitted or found in evidence: "1. The appellant is a licensed pawnbroker within the meaning of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872. 2. On the 5th of January, 1901, the respondent pledged with the appellant two rings for £6 then advanced by the appellant to the respondent on the security thereof, which said rings had been stolen by the respondent at the Avenue Studios, where he was employed as an artist's model, and which were the property of the said Constance Laura Biddulph. 3. On the 16th of January, 1901, the said Constance Laura Biddulph charged the respondent at the Westminster police-court with stealing the said two rings on a day prior to the said 5th of January, 1901. The respondent was convicted and was thereupon bound over by recognizance in the sum of £10 to come up for judgment if called upon. 4. The appellant declining to give up the said rings, the said Constance Laura Biddulph, on the said 16th day of January, 1901, issued against the appellant a summons under the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 27, for unlawfully refusing and neglecting to deliver the said two rings to her. This summons was heard on the 22nd day of January, 1901, at the said Westminster police-court, when the appellant was ordered to deliver the said two rings to the said Constance Laura Biddulph on payment by her to the appellant of the sum of £3, and in compliance with the said order the appellant delivered the said two rings to the said Constance Laura Biddulph and received the said sum of £3 from her. The respondent has not repaid the said sum of £6 advanced by the appellant on the security of the said rings nor any part thereof. 5. It was contended for the appellant that the conviction for larceny of the said rings did not prevent the respondent being proceeded against under section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872."

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondent having been convicted of larceny of the said rings, was not liable to be convicted of another criminal offence in respect of the same property, and upon the same facts as those proved upon the conviction for larceny; that the offence under section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, was a criminal offence, inasmuch as a penalty is awarded, and the fact of a court of summary jurisdiction having the power in addition to imposing a penalty to award to the pawnbroker any sum not exceeding the full value of the pledge, did not constitute a civil remedy merely for the purpose of recouping the pawnbroker for any loss he might have sustained.

Section 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, provides as follows: "If any person knowingly and designedly pawns with a pawnbroker anything being the property of another person, the pawner not being employed or authorized by the owner thereof to pawn the same, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable, on conviction thereof in a court of summary jurisdiction, to forfeit any sum not exceeding five pounds, and, in addition thereto, any sum not exceeding the full value of the pledge as ascertained by the court. The forfeitures when recovered shall be applied towards making satisfaction thereout to the party injured, and defraying the costs of prosecution as the court directs."

Avory, K.C. (C. L. Attenborough with him), for the appellant.—The magistrate should have convicted the respondent. Unless the larceny changed the property and gave the property to the respondent the conviction cannot be an answer to these proceedings. The magistrate has confused the two questions, because the same evidence was used in order to prove the guilt on the second occasion. No doubt this was a criminal offence because it is subject to a penalty, but the question is, Could the respondent plead autrefois convict, and is it res judicata? He could not plead autrefois convict for this reason: that it is not the same offence, and it is not an offence involved necessarily in the other. It is a conclusive answer to the plea autrefois convict or res judicata that it is not the same transaction which forms the subject of inquiry. A man who steals goods does not necessarily pawn them—it is a separate and subsequent transaction. This case is governed by Fancett v. Bierman, 14 Times L. R. 148, where the question was raised whether, under this section, the pawnbroker was the proper person to take proceedings. The magistrate held that the pawnbroker is not the party injured within the meaning of the Pawnbrokers Act, and that he had no right to take proceedings under this section, but that it was only the owner of the property. The court overruled that contention and said that the pawnbroker was the person injured within the meaning of this section. That case decides the present case because the learned judges held that there were two separate offences, one committed against the owner of the property, and a second offence committed by the man against the pawnbroker. The object of this Act is the protection of pawnbrokers, and the object of the section is to give the pawnbroker a remedy against any person who deceives him by pawning property that does not belong to him, the necessary consequence of that being that the pawnbroker ultimately has to give up the property and may or may not get back from the owner the amount which he has advanced. In this case he gets back half the amount. That is a usual order to make when the pawnbroker has not been guilty of any neglect or default. The confusion in the magistrate's mind is very clearly expressed in Reg. v. Ollis, ante, p. 76, [1900] 2 Q. B. 758. In that case a man was indicted for false pretences and acquitted. There was a second indictment for false pretences, and evidence which had been given on the first trial was repeated at the second trial, and the question was whether that was admissible. The magistrate thought that because the same evidence was called to prove the one offence as was called to prove the other, therefore the man was entitled to be acquitted. Darling, J., says, at p. 780: "By the admission of this evidence the defendant was not bis vexatus, for I feel sure that those words are not to be understood as meaning that a man is not to be more than once annoyed by the same evidence. I think they mean that he is not to be by legal process twice exposed to the risk of being found guilty of the same crime, or the same tort, or liable twice to pay the same debt, be it to the State or to his fellow citizen. To hold otherwise seems to me to rule that evidence which has been given once shall never be produced again against the same defendant; yet it is plain that up to a certain point the evidence must often be the same, although the defendant is accused of wrongs done to two distinct persons, and that in different suits or forensic proceedings." So it is here—up to a certain point the evidence is the same, but the evidence necessary to convict the man of larceny does not involve proving that he has pawned the article. He may be convicted of larceny without any proof that he has pawned. He was guilty of the offence of larceny before he committed the other offence. Supposing a man having stolen some valuable diamond ornament, in order to prevent detection or out of mere spite, smashed the diamond ornament up with a hammer, could it be doubted that he might be convicted of wilful damage? The magistrate was wrong here, and the respondent ought to have been convicted of this second and subsequent offence.

No one appeared on behalf of the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the learned magistrate ought to have entertained this case. I think the ground may be shortly put, as has already been put by the argument of Mr. Avory, that this is a statute which was passed, not only for the protection of owners of goods, but also for the protection of pawnbrokers, and that the offence is knowingly and designedly pawning goods which are the property of somebody else. It would seem strange that because as in this particular case the goods have been stolen before they have been pawned, and the ownership of the goods has been proved not to be that of the man who pawned them, the pawnbroker should lose his right to such remedy as the section gives him. I think that it would require express words in a statute to make it an answer to the offence of illegally pawning goods to say that there had been a previous conviction in respect of the depriving of another owner of the property in those goods. I think in this case the learned magistrate ought to have dealt with the charge.

SOUTH LONDON ELECTRIC SUPPLY CORPORATION v. PERRIN. (a.)

Metropolis—Public health — Nuisance—Sending forth black smoke—No evidence offered that any particular individual or property was annoyed or injured thereby — Necessarily a nuisance — Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 24 (b).

The appellant company was convicted under section 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, of sending forth black smoke "in such quantities as to be a nuisance."

Held, that as the evidence proved that black smoke was sent forth in such quantity and for such periods as must necessarily amount to a nuisance, the conviction must be affirmed, as it was not necessary in such circumstances to show that the black smoke was a nuisance or an injury to any particular individual or property.

Appeal by case stated from the decision of a metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Lambeth police-court, convicting the appellant company of an offence under section 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

Ten several complaints were preferred by the respondent Wm. James Perrin against the appellants, charging that at their premises the following nuisance existed—to wit, "a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance." The matters complained of took place on ten days between the 1st and 14th of November, 1900, and at the hearing before the magistrate it was proved that black smoke issued from the appellants' chimney, which was 180 feet in height, on the days mentioned in the summonses at various times during those days.

On the 5th of November smoke issued from the chimney on various occasions amounting in all to 128 minutes, and on several other occasions during the ten days in question the same thing happened for more than seventy minutes during the day.

On the 13th of November smoke came from the chimney for not not more than sixteen minutes.

No witness stated that the black smoke was a nuisance to himself.

Upon these facts the magistrate convicted the appellants and imposed the maximum penalty of £10 for each offence and £10 costs.

The ground of the appeal was that proof of the mere issuing of smoke from the chimney was not sufficient to support a conviction.

Cripps, K.C. (Scott Fox, K.C., and Samuel Fleming with him) for the appellant company.—To support a conviction there must be evidence that the smoke issued in such volume as to create either a nuisance to a particular individual or an injury to property. There is no such evidence here, and therefore the alleged annoyance caused to the neighbourhood by the smoke falls short of a nuisance at common law. The offence is the permitting of smoke to issue "in such quantities as to be an annoyance" and the mere issue of smoke from a chimney in itself constitutes no offence under the statute.

Stanley v. Farndale, 56 J. P. 709; Stinson v. Browning, 14 W. R. 395, 35 L. J. M. C. 152; and Hill v. Somerset, 51 J. P. 742, were cited during the argument.

Horace Avory, K.C., and Lowenthal, for the respondent, were not heard.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case I think the magistrate was right. But while I think the appeal should be dismissed, I must not be thought to say that in my judgment a magistrate ought to convict simply on evidence that smoke had been seen coming out of a factory chimney in every case. On the other hand I think there are many cases, and this is one, where the evidence of the quantity of smoke that has been permitted to pour forth amounts to so patent a nuisance that it becomes unnecessary to show that any particular individual is annoyed or any specific property injured before he ought to convict. In my opinion the evidence here shows that on the days in question the smoke must necessarily have amounted to a nuisance, and therefore it is impossible to argue that there ought not to have been a conviction under the statute. Under the circumstances we cannot say that the magistrate was wrong in coming to the conclusion that he arrived at.

CORBETT v. BADGER. (a.)

Metropolis — Building — District surveyor — Fees — Builder in default—Right to recover fees from owner or occupier—Limitation of time—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s 11—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 154, 157 (1) (2).

A district surveyor can take summary proceedings to recover his fees from the owner of a building under section 157 of the London Building Act, 1894, within six months from the date of the receipt of the bill of fees by the owner.

Special case stated by Mr. Kennedy, a metropolitan magistrate, on the hearing of eight summonses issued on complaints by the respondent to recover fees amounting to £546 7s. 6d., alleged to be due to him as district surveyor for the district of Lewisham, under the London Building Act, 1894.

In 1899 the appellant was the owner of the St. German's estate, Hither Green, and he contracted with a builder named Lawrence to erect certain houses on the estate. The houses were duly erected by Lawrence, who was paid the contract price by the appellant, which under the contract was to include any fees which Lawrence might be called on to pay to the district surveyor under the above Act.

The builder, however, became insolvent before the fees were paid, and the district surveyor thereupon took out summonses against the building owner, as the statute provided that if the builder was in default with his payment of the fees the owner or occupier should be liable.

At the hearing of the summonses the building owner took the objection that none of the summonses were issued within six months of the time the respective complaints arose, and this depended upon a quantity of detailed evidence as to the progress made with the buildings. In the result the magistrate overruled the appellant's contention, and ordered him to pay in all fees amounting to £546 7s. 6d. and costs.

The building owner appealed, and the question was whether the complaints had been made within six months after the matter of complaint arose as required by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.

Section 154 of the London Building Act, 1894, provides that certain fees shall be paid by the builder, or in his default by the owner or occupier, to the district surveyor; and section 157 enacts: "(1) That at the expiration of the following periods—that is to say, (a) of fourteen days after the roof of any building surveyed by the district surveyor under this Act has been covered in . . . the district surveyor shall be entitled to receive the fees due to him from the builder employed in erecting such building . . . or from the owner or occupier of the building so erected. . . . (2) If any such builder, owner or occupier refuses to pay the said fees they may be recovered in a summary manner on its being shown to the satisfaction of the court that a proper bill specifying the amount of the fees was delivered to or sent to him in a registered letter addressed to his last known residence."

Macmorran, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the appellant.

Ruegg, K.C., and Montague Shearman, for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this case is one of considerable difficulty, but I think we ought not to interfere with the decision of the learned magistrate. It seems that the roof was completed in December, 1899, and at some date after the expiration of fourteen days from then the surveyor became entitled to the fee now claimed. Between the 17th of January and the 10th of September, 1900, the district surveyor delivered to the builder the fee bills contemplated by sub-section 2 of the 157th section of the London Building Act, 1894. On the 2nd of July, 1900, the builder Lawrence became bankrupt. On the 20th of October, 1900, notices of the claim for fees were sent to the building owner; and on the 8th of November these summonses were taken out against him. The point we have now to consider is whether the six months ran from the expiry of the fourteen days above referred to or whether they ran either from the time when the bills were given to the builder (in which case some of the summonses would be out of time), or whether they ran from the date of the notices to the owner on the 20th of October, 1900 (in which case none of them would be out of time). The material words of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, speak of the time "when the matter of such complaint arose," and I agree it would be quite possible to hold, as we are invited by the appellant to do, that the "matter of complaint arose" when there was a neglect to pay the fees after fourteen days by the builder. It seems to me, however, that we ought not to take that view because at that time the whole of the matter of complaint was clearly not ascertained. For instance, some of the fees under the Act required calculation and under those circumstances the principle enunciated in Poole and Forden Highway Board v. Gunning, 51 L. J. M. C. 49, 30 W. R. Dig. 89, applies—namely, that at that time the amount could not be so ascertained as to require the debtor to pay. As against the builder I think the time would run from the date when the bills were sent to him. As against the builder, I think we must hold that time did not run until he had received a bill under sub-section 2 before referred to. What we have to do is to consider when there was a default. I cannot myself say that the neglect of the owner to pay in default of the builder was such a default as would make the six months begin to run, until the fee bills have been served on him. During the argument it was contended on behalf of the appellant that he ought not to be ordered to pay the money twice over. That is a question which we have no jurisdiction to deal with, although no doubt under the circumstances the failure of the builder has worked a substantial hardship on the building owner. For the reasons I have stated none of the summonses were in my opinion issued too late, and the decision of the magistrate must therefore be affirmed.

WILLIS v. LOVICK. (a.)

County court—Practice—Notice of statutory defence—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 Vict. c. 9), s. 1—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18a.

The Gaming Act, 1892, created a statutory defence, of which it is necessary for the defendant to give notice under the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, r. 18a.

Appeal from the Westminster County Court.

The plaintiff brought an action in the county court claiming from the defendant the sum of £8 15s. 10d., of which the particulars were as follows:—

"1900, October 21-27.—To 25 per cent. commission in cash received by the defendant on the introduction of plaintiff, and on which commission was agreed to be paid—cash received, £11 15s. 2d.; commission, £2 18s. 10d.

November 4-10.—The like; cash received, £38 0s. 5d. —commission, £9 10s. 1d."

Credit was given for £3 13s. 1d., cash received in account.

There was an alternative claim for money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff.

The only answer to this claim set up by the defendant at the trial was that the contract on which the plaintiff relied was void by the Gaming Act, 1892 (55 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that no notice of the defence had been given in pursuance of the County Court Rules, ord. 10, rr. 10 and 18a.

Magee, for the defendant.—It is not necessary to give notice of a statutory defence when the action is based upon an illegal contract: Scott v. Brown, Doering, McNab, & Co., 41 W. R. 116, [1892] 2 Q. B. 724. Ex turpi causa non oritur actio.

See also Brutton v. Branson, [1898] 2 Q. B. 219, 48 W. R. Dig. 41.

Wildey Wright and H. L. Ormsby, for the plaintiff, were not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The county court judge has decided that the defence that the contract sued on was void by virtue of the Gaming Act, 1892, cannot be raised unless notice thereof has been given under ord. 10, rr. 10 and 18a, of the County Court Rules, 1887. Rule 10 provides that "where the defendant intends to rely upon any of the grounds of defence mentioned in rules 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 of this order, or upon any counterclaim, he shall file a notice stating thereon his name and address, together with a concise statement of such grounds, five clear days before the return day. . . ." Rule 18*a* provides that "when in any action the defendant relies upon any statutory defence, or any defence of which he is required by any statute to give notice, he shall in his statement set forth the year, chapter, and section of the statute, or the short title thereof, and the particular matter upon which he relies." The county court judge thought that the defence raised by the defendant came within these words.

On the particulars of claim the action might have been maintainable and the commission recoverable, notwithstanding the Gaming Acts; no one could tell on the face of the particulars that they involved a gaming transaction. I do not lay down any rule as to what a statutory defence is; I agree with what Wills, J., said in Brutton v. Branson, and I think the ground of his decision is one on which we may fairly act. That was a case under the Statute of Frauds, and Wills, J., pointed out that the non-existence of a writing to satisfy the statute had always been treated as a matter of defence and that, if it was a defence, it was a statutory defence. Mr. Magee says that that reasoning cannot apply to a statute passed so recently as 1892, but it is a gaming statute and for many years the defence that a wagering contract cannot be enforced has been held to be a defence which must be specially pleaded. I have no doubt that the county court judge was right in disallowing the defence, because no one could know from the particulars of claim what defence was going to be raised.

It is clear that the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Brown thought fit to deal with this point as a matter of law, but no rule was laid down in cases where the county court judge thinks that the defence is statutory that he must allow it to be raised or adjourn the trial to enable the defendant to give notice. We should be interfering with a useful rule if we overruled the county court judge's decision in this case.

DUCKWORTH v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Passenger—Ticket—Incorporation of conditions—Delay caused by negligence of company—Liability of company for loss to passenger.

D. travelled by an early workman's train, which arrived late, and he consequently lost a day's wages.

Held, that the railway company were not liable, because the printed notice on the back of the ticket—to the effect that the departure or arrival of the trains at the times specified in the time-table was not guaranteed nor were the company under any circumstances to be held responsible for delay or detention, however occasioned, or any consequences arising therefrom—was a condition incorporated into the contract; and therefore the plaintiff could not recover, notwithstanding that the delay was caused by the admitted negligence of the defendants.

Appeal by the railway company from the decision of his Honour Judge Bompas, sitting in the Burnley County Court, who gave judgment for the plaintiff in an action raising the question of liability of the company to compensate a passenger for loss of a day's wages due to the admitted negligence of the company, whereby the train by which the plaintiff travelled was late in arriving at Burnley.

The defendants, the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., are accustomed to run a train for workmen every morning from Rose-grove to Burnley.

The usual time taken is three minutes, the train being timed to start at 5.45 and arrive at 5.48.

On the 18th of October the plaintiff took a workman's ticket by this train.

The train started, but before reaching Burnley was stopped, the signals having been left against it by the negligence of the signalman.

The train did not arrive until ten minutes past six—that is, twenty-two minutes late.

The plaintiff was a weaver at a mill, and was going to his work. He went straight to the mill, but he found on getting there that another weaver had been already put in his place, and he lost his day.

He then brought this action in the county court to recover 4s. 6d., his day's wages.

The defendants admitted the negligence of the signalman, but said the ticket was issued subject to the regulations contained in the company's time-tables.

Under the heading "General Regulations" was this notice: "The hours or times stated in the company's time-books, tables, bills, and notices are appointed as those at which it is intended, so far as circumstances will permit, the passenger trains should arrive at and depart from the several stations, but their departure or arrival at the times stated, or the arrival of any train passing over any portion of the company's lines in time for any nominally corresponding train on any other portion of their lines is not guaranteed; nor will the company under any circumstances be held responsible for delay or detention, however occasioned, or any consequences arising therefrom. The right to stop the trains at any station on the lines, although not marked as a stopping station, is reserved."

The learned judge was of opinion that a contract was implied by the issuing of the ticket that, having taken the passenger into the train and started it, the defendants would take reasonable care to carry him, not only in safety, but with reasonable speed, to his destination, and he did not think the notice in the regulations abrogated this contract, and that as it was admitted that through the negligence of the defendants' servants the defendants had taken an unreasonable and wholly unnecessary time in carrying the plaintiff between the two stations indicated on his ticket, he gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum claimed.

The railway company appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Hogg, for the railway company, contended that notwithstanding their admitted negligence, they were protected by the condition and were entitled to succeed on the authority of Le Blanche v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 24 W. R. 808, 1 C. P. D. 286, and McCartan v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 54 L. J. Q. B. 441, 33 W. R. Dig. 175.

F. H. Mellor, for the plaintiff, contended that, negligence being admitted, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the decisions of the Court of Appeal are too strong to allow of our accepting the argument for the plaintiff. It might have been open to the courts to decide otherwise originally, and it is possibly still open to the House of Lords so to decide. But it has long been held in decisions binding on this court that there is no limit on the conditions that may be imposed with reference to passenger traffic by railways. The cases with reference to carriage by sea depend on other considerations. If the matter were absolutely res integra, a good deal might be said in favour of the view that words not pointing to negligence of the company ought not to be held to cover negligence. But the judgments of the Court of Appeal are conclusive on this point. In Le Blanche v. London and North-Western Railway Baron Cleasby thought that even the conditions in that case were sufficient to enable the court to enter judgment for the defendants; but the other members of the court thought that the words—which are not in the condition in the present case—that "every attention will be paid to ensure punctuality as far as possible" made the case one in which the plaintiff might be able to succeed, and one in which there might, therefore, be a new trial. In McCartan v. North-Eastern Railway, where those words were absent, judgment was entered for the defendants. And in Le Blanche v. London and North-Western Railway Mellish, L.J., and other members of the court pointed out that had the words in question been absent in that case, the result would have been different. It is quite impossible that such learned judges should have delivered the judgments they did if they had not thought that such a condition as that in the present case would cover negligence. The appeal must therefore be allowed, but in view of the importance of the case leave to appeal will be given.

ROBERTSON (Appellant) v. KING (Respondent) (a.)

Local government—Working classes—Dwelling-houses—Closing order—Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), ss. 29, 32 (2).

Where proceedings under section 32 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, are taken by the local authority against the owner of any dwelling-house for closing of the same, on the ground that it is unfit for human habitation, the fact that such dwelling-house has already been voluntarily closed by the owner to human habitation, and has been kept so closed, is no objection to a closing order being made.

Section 29, which defines "dwelling-house" as "any inhabited building," was not intended to negative the natural meaning of sections 32 and 33.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court by E. M. E Welby, Esq., stipendiary magistrate for Sheffield.

Application was made to the magistrate by the appellant, John Robertson, the medical officer of health for the city of Sheffield, under section 32 of Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, for a closing order in respect of three dwelling-houses on the ground that they were in a state so injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation.

The respondent, Elizabeth King, was the owner of the premises.

At the hearing it appeared that the houses were old buildings, and for a long period after they were built had been occupied and inhabited as dwelling-houses, but that at the date of the complaint they were unfit for human habitation within the meaning of the Act inasmuch as they were in a dirty and ruinous and dilapidated state, and some filthy and other accumulations on the premises had very probably become a nuisance for which proceedings under the Public Health Act might be taken.

It appeared, further, that the late owner of the houses had more than five years ago closed them to all purposes of human habitation, and that they had never since been used for or reopened to such purposes by him or anyone else.

It appeared, further, that the respondent had only recently come into possession of the premises, and that she had no intention of having them used for human habitation as they then were, but it did not appear whether any intention had been formed or not as to allowing them to remain as they were or of rendering them fit for human habitation, if they could so be made, or of demolishing them and putting new dwelling-houses or other buildings on the site or turning them to other purposes.

At the hearing it was argued that by section 32 (2) proceedings may be taken for the express purpose of causing dwelling-houses to be closed, whether the same be occupied or not, and that the subsequent proceedings set out in sections 32, 33, 34, &c., cannot be put in force unless there has been a closing order.

The learned magistrate refused to make a closing order. He considered that the premises had been a long while ago closed to human habitation, as much as they would be by a closing order and had been so kept ever since; and that they had therefore been closed as to being dwelling-houses as defined by section 29 of the Act, and had been voluntarily put where a closing order would put them, and had been kept so closed ever since; and that whatever nuisance or other like proceedings their owner might be liable to there was a want of foundation for a closing order when the premises had been voluntarily closed to such use and kept so. If the owner had in some way caused or allowed the premises to be reopened for purposes of human habitation a closing order might be made whether they were occupied or not; but the owner had not done so; and an application to close them might be made as soon as there was something to show that they were held open to human occupation, whether they were occupied or not. He accordingly refused to make an order.

Against this decision the appellant stated the following grounds of objection: That the premises were dwelling-houses within the meaning of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890; that section 29, defining a dwelling-house as any inhabited building, provided that such definition shall apply "unless the context otherwise requires," that under section 32 (2) the context otherwise required and provides that the provisions of section 32 shall apply whether the premises are occupied or not; that the buildings were unoccupied dwelling-houses, and that there was no evidence of permanent abandonment of the buildings as dwelling-houses, inasmuch as they had not been adapted for any other purpose and might at small cost and in the course of a day or two be made fit for human habitation.

The question for the decision of the court was whether under the circumstances the closing order applied for should have been refused or granted.

R. Browne, K.C., appeared for the appellant.

No one appeared on behalf of the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think the learned stipendiary ought to have made the order in this case. Without in any way straining the words of the Act, I think that the real object of these sections is to be carried out; and the object obviously is that if the owner, on notice being given him, does not put the house into a proper condition, certain consequences shall follow. As I understand the very lengthy reasoning of the learned stipendiary he thought that because for five and a-half years the owner had neglected to let these houses, so that they were obviously unfit for habitation, and were not in a habitable condition, therefore they were not inhabited buildings within the meaning of section 29.

I think that section 29 was not intended to negative the natural meaning of sections 32 and 33. That non-inhabitancy is not an objection to the order is absolutely clear because the words are "whether occupied or not," and the moment you get that, you have to ask yourself—how long must it have been unoccupied. I think, as Mr. Browne very frankly said, he could not tell, on the face of the learned stipendiary's reasons, what he would have said supposing the house had been unoccupied for six months. I think, although the houses are in that condition, they are houses; they are dwelling-houses, primâ facie; and I do not think that the statement, "dwelling-house shall mean an inhabited building," taken with the context and the other sections, makes it necessary for us to limit the words to inhabited dwelling-houses. Under the circumstances I think the fact that they have been for five and a-half years not occupied is no objection in law to the learned magistrate's order being made. As I pointed out just now, no harm is done because the owner of the property, if he does not want the houses pulled down, can make them fit. Then, of course, the closing order, which only closes them until they are fit, practically will have no operation against him. I think that this appeal should be allowed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

THE KING v. NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL.
Ex parte GREEN. (a.)

Local government—Right of way—Obstruction to—Duty of district council to take legal proceedings for protection of public right of way—Transfer of duty to county council—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict c. 73), s. 26, sub-sections 1, 3, 4.

In an action by the owners of an estate against private persons for an alleged trespass in removing certain obstacles, erected by the plaintiffs, to an alleged public right of way over such estate, the county council, where the parish council have appealed under section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, to the rural district council for assistance in protecting such right of way, and the rural district council have refused or failed to take any proceedings in consequence, are authorized under such section, on petition by the parish council, to pass a resolution that the powers and duties conferred upon the rural district council by such section shall be transferred to the county council, and that the county council shall contribute towards the costs of the defendants in the action.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case a rule nisi for a certiorari had been obtained calling upon the county council of the county of Norfolk to show cause why a certain order or resolution passed by them on the 13th of October, 1900, with reference to an action then pending in the Chancery Division, in which Sir Edward Green, Bart., and Edward Lycett Green were plaintiffs, and Charles Ellis and William French were defendants, should not be quashed.

From the pleadings in the action it appeared that the plaintiffs were respectively tenant in possession and owner of the Ken Hill estate in the parish of Snettisham, in the county of Norfolk.

A part of the estate consisted of enclosed woods and coverts and lands and marshes.

On the 15th of October, 1899, the defendants, in the assertion of an alleged highway through the woods and coverts and over the land and marshes, demolished the fences and barriers which had been erected by the plaintiffs and removed a notice board warning the public that there was no public footpath.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the trespass and a declaration as to the alleged right of way.

The Snettisham Parish Council appealed to the Docking Rural District Council to assist them in maintaining the right of the villagers to the footpath.

The district council, not having sufficient funds, and being unable to make a special rate, refused to do so, whereupon the parish council appealed to the county council to protect the right of the parishioners, and at a meeting of that council on the 13th day of October, 1900, it was resolved:

"That the powers and duties of the Docking Rural District Council under section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, in respect of the alleged unlawful obstruction of a public right of way along the Ken Hill footpath, in the parish of Snettisham, be transferred to the county council; and that the county council do contribute towards the defendants' costs of the action pending in the Chancery Division in this matter."

It was now sought to quash the above resolution upon the ground that it was illegal and not authorized by section 26 of the above Act.

It was agreed that the court should now deal with the matter upon the basis that the resolution was an order such as could be removed by certiorari under section 80 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The Local Government Act, 1894, provides as follows: Section 26 (1), "That it shall be the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way, and to prevent so far as possible the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way. . . ."

(2) "A district council may, with the consent of the county council for the county within which any common land is situate, aid persons in maintaining rights of common where, in the opinion of the council, the extinction of such rights would be prejudical to the inhabitants of the district. . . ."

(3) "A district council may for the purpose of carrying into effect this section institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they deem expedient."

(4) "Where a parish council have represented to the district council that any public right of way within the district or an adjoining district . . .

has been unlawfully stopped or obstructed . . . it shall be the duty of the district council, unless satisfied that the allegations of such representation are incorrect, to take proper proceedings accordingly; and if the district council refuse or fail to take any proceedings in consequence of such representation, the parish council may petition the county council . . . and if that council so resolve the powers and duties of the district council under this section shall be transferred to the county council."

C. A. Russell, K.C. (Fleetwood Pritchard with him), showed cause on behalf of the county council.—The only point is whether the resolution of the county council was ultra vires or not. The position of the county council is defined by section 26, sub-section 4, of the Local Government Act, 1894, and the council in acting as they did were acting within their legal rights under that sub-section. There is no authority for the proposition that they were acting illegally. The district council on inquiry was in favour of taking steps, but the question of funds arose, and that body found they could not make a special rate and therefore they could not support the defendants in the action. The county council cannot perform their duty in this case except by aiding the defendants. The rule should therefore be dismissed.

Rawlinson, K.C. (C. Gurdon with him), showed cause on behalf of the defendants in the Chancery action.

R. A. M'Call, K.C. and F. K. North (C. H. Swanton with them), in support of the rule.—The rule should be made absolute. The Legislature has not authorized the county council to spend the county money in aiding defendants in such a case as the present one. The ratepayers' money would be spent in litigation over which they have no control. Sub-section 2 of section 26 only gives the district council a permissive power. If the contention on behalf of the county council is correct a local body will never fight a right of way case but always leave it to the county council to do so.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This question is not altogether free from doubt, but, in my opinion, we cannot make this rule absolute. Section 26, sub-section 1, imposes upon every district council the duty of protecting all public rights of way, and preventing, as far as is possible, the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way. Sub-section 3 provides that "a district council may, for the purpose of carrying into effect this section, institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they deem expedient." Now, it is, of course, possible to construe those words as only meaning instituting any proceeding in their own name or defending any legal proceedings brought against them, but I think that would be putting too narrow a construction on them. In the first place there are many proceedings which, instituted on behalf of public bodies, may have to be taken in the name of the Attorney-General, and, with regard to defending these, it seems there are many cases in which it is quite as probable the action will be brought against a private individual or a servant of a district council as against a district council.

In my opinion a district council may, in discharge of their duty to prevent an obstruction to a public right of way, defend legal proceedings brought against their surveyor who has been instructed by them to pull down the obstruction.

Now, in the present case, before the council are assumed to have intervened at all, an action is brought against two private persons who had pulled down an obstruction, and it is suggested, though the suggestion does not appear to be justified, that these two persons would not be able to pay the costs. It is possible that the plaintiffs might not have security for their costs, but they have brought their action against the persons who pulled down the obstruction and there is nothing in the Act that gives to these particular plaintiffs the benefit of any security for costs that might be payable by the defendants.

Assuming in the present case that the district council had been minded to take up the defence, I think that they could have done so under sub-sections 1 and 3.

It is quite true that when you look at sub-section 4 it is seen that the draughtsman has not exactly followed the same language as is employed in the previous sub-sections; for instance, sub-section 4 does not refer to "steps" or "duty," it simply speaks of the district council taking "proper proceedings accordingly," and when the district council refuses or fails to take any such proceedings "the parish council may petition the county council for the county within which the way or waste is situate, and if that council so resolve the powers and duties of the district council under this section shall be transferred to the county council."

This does not seem to me to be a case where the intention of the section is such as to enable us to draw any conclusion between the exact language of these sub-sections respectively. I think that on the petition of the parish council the county council have all the powers and duties of the district council, and that being so, having regard to what I have said as to sub-sections 1 and 3, the county council can defend such an action brought against the surveyor of the other authority or defend such an action brought against other persons if they think it a proper action to be defended.

It was suggested to us that if the language of sub-section 4 is contrasted with that of sub-section 2 then there is only a permissive power to aid people in maintaining rights of common, which would lead in that case to possible contribution by the county council. That may be so, but I think we ought not to limit the powers under the section by finding that the councils have only a permissive duty to assist such persons, and that to do so would be dangerous, as we think there is a general duty put, first, upon the district council, and then upon the county council in their place, to defend a right of way and to defend proceedings taken against other persons in respect of such right and to assist such persons. I cannot say the case is free from difficulty, but, on the whole, I think it is not sufficiently clear to enable us to make the rule absolute.

MILMAN v. LANE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Devise of term to persons in succession—Remainder to "the heirs and assigns of the survivor."

A testator by his will devised certain lands to certain persons in succession for the term of ninety-nine years if they should so long live, and from and after the determination of the last of the said terms or the death of the survivor, "to the heirs and assigns of the survivor of them for ever."

Held, upon the construction of the will as a whole, that the limitation to the heirs and assigns of the survivor should be read as one to the heirs of the survivor and their assigns, and not to the heirs or appointees of the survivor; and that, therefore, the heir of the survivor was entitled to the land as against a person who had purchased the land in fee simple from the survivor in his lifetime.

Appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Lawrance, J.

The action was brought by Amelia Milman against William Lane to recover possession of a farm called Ranscombe.

The testator, John Vicary, by his will dated the 27th of December, 1830, devised the farm in question to the use of his nephew Edward Milman and his assigns for a term of ninety-nine years if he should so long live, and after the determination of that estate in trust for such one or more of the son or sons of Edward Milman as he should appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the heirs of the body of Edward Milman, and in default of such issue male then to the use of the testator's nephew William Milman for ninety-nine years if he should so long live, then to the use of the four sons of William Milman in succession for ninety-nine years if each should so long live, and from and after the determination of the last-mentioned term and estate or the death of the survivor of them the said William Milman and his four sons, then upon trust to and for the use of the heirs and assigns of the survivor of them for ever.

The testator's will was proved on the 5th of November, 1831.

The testator's nephew Edward Milman died on the 10th of April, 1849, a bachelor.

The testator's nephew William Milman and his four sons all survived the testator, one of the sons, Richard Milman, being the survivor, and he died on the 29th of December, 1899, without issue, leaving the plaintiff his heiress at law surviving him.

During his lifetime Richard Milman had sold and conveyed the farm in question in fee simple to the defendant.

The question in controversy between the parties was whether the plaintiff, as heiress of Richard Milman, or the defendant, as purchaser from him, had the better title; in other words, What was the effect of a devise to "the heirs and assigns" of a named person to whom no particular freehold estate was limited?

Lawrance, J., held that upon the construction of the will as a whole the word "assigns" had no conveyancing meaning, and that the heiress of the survivor took the land as a persona designata. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—ROMER, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: The question for our decision on this appeal concerns the effect of the ultimate devise in the will of John Vicary of his Ranscombe estate, after the determination of the terms of ninety-nine years previously created in favour of the testator's nephew William Milman and the nephew's four sons respectively. This ultimate devise is to the use of the heirs and assigns of the survivor of the four sons. It is to be observed that in the devise the estates granted are legal, and further, that, as none of the sons took any prior estate except in respect of his term of ninety-nine years, the rule in Shelley's case, 1 Co. Rep. 93b, does not apply. And it cannot be validly urged, and, indeed, it is not contended on behalf of the appellant, that the ultimate gift can be read as one to the survivor and his heirs and assigns. In other words, it is beyond dispute that the heirs of the survivor take by way of direct gift, and the only question is what is the effect under the circumstances of the addition of the words "and assigns" in the legal remainder granted to the heirs and assigns of the survivor. The question is one strictly of real property law. The appellant asks the court to hold that the remainder is to be read as a gift to such uses as the survivor shall appoint, and, in default of appointment, or so far as no such appointment shall extend, to the use of the heirs of the survivor. It appears to us that this is asking the court to imply overmuch by reason of the employment of the words "and assigns" in the legal limitation in question. In the first place the appellant asks us to change the word "assigns" into the word "appointees." Having got so far, he is next embarrassed by the word "and," which is used in the limitation, for there would be considerable difficulty in determining the effect of a legal remainder to the heirs and appointees of a person as persona designata. He, therefore, next asks us to read "or" for "and," and to treat the limitation as one to the use of the heirs or appointees of the survivor. And then he says the way is comparatively easy to read the gift as one to the appointees or heirs, and as consequently meaning, when fully expanded, the limitation he is contending for. We do not see our way to support this contention. It is important to notice that the word "assigns" cannot have its strict legal meaning given to it in the limitation, unless it is attached to the word "heirs," so as to mean their assigns; for the survivor of the four sons had no estate in him which he could "assign," except his term of ninety-nine years. So that in this limitation one has to recognize that the testator, by using the word "assigns," could not, in the ordinary legal sense, have meant the assigns of the survivor. This being so, and knowing how often in conveyancing the word "assigns" is unnecessarily used as a word of limitation to show power of alienation and nothing more, we think it will be doing far less violence to the words used by the testator to construe the limitation to the heirs and assigns of the survivor as being one to the heirs of the survivor and their assigns. And we think that in the absence in the will of anything to show that a contrary view should be taken, such a gift as we are dealing with ought to be so construed. In the present case not only is there nothing in the will to support the contrary view, but there is much to support the view we have expressed. For we find constantly in this will the word "assigns" put in unnecessarily, having no conveyancing virtue at all, and as merely declaratory of a power of alienation in a donee which he would have without it. And, further, with reference to the appellant's contention that in the particular limitation in question the testator meant, by using the word "assigns," to give the survivor of the four sons a power of appointment, we find that, while elsewhere throughout his will he constantly uses the word assigns as a mere conveyancing word and never as meaning "appointees," where he does wish to give a power of appointment he knows how to do it in proper terms and in a proper way: see, for example, the power of appointment given in regard to this Ranscombe property to his nephew Edward Milman to appoint in favour of his sons. And, lastly, it is worthy of observation that this will is obviously a conveyancer's will, and is not the personal product of a testator ignorant of law and using untechnical terms or obviously using terms which have a technical meaning in an untechnical sense.

It remains to add a few words upon the authorities bearing on the point. In the case of Tapner v. Merlott, Willes, 177, there is a dictum of Willes, C.J., to the effect that, in such a devise as we have here, the court might possibly imply a power of appointment by the use of the word "assigns." But the point does not appear to have been argued before the learned judge, and we gather that he was not expressing any concluded view, but was merely stating an idea that had occurred to him which might possibly be well founded. But in the case of Quested v. Michell, 3 W. R. 435, 24 L. J. Ch. 722, Kindersley, V.C., did undoubtedly, though under special circumstances, hold that a gift in a will of a share of a testator's real and personal estate after the death of a previous equitable devisee for life to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns had the effect as to the real estate of giving a power of appointment to her with remainder to her heirs in default of appointment. But we think that that decision depended upon the particular circumstances which that very learned and careful judge had before him. The will in that case is fully set out in the report in 3 W. R., at p. 435, and, when that will is considered, it will be seen that there were circumstances which would or might lead to the view that the testator in that particular case did intend the equitable tenant for life to have absolute dominion over her share subject only to her not being allowed to anticipate the income of her share during her life. The will was dealing with six shares—two were given to devisees absolutely, one was given to a man for life, and then to his children absolutely, and the other three shares were given for the benefit of three ladies respectively, who were restrained from anticipating the income of their shares. As to these last-mentioned three shares it was clear that the ladies took an absolute interest in the personalty subject to their not anticipating the life income, and it might well be supposed that the testator intended them to have a corresponding dominion over the realty, though, as pointed out by the Vice-Chancellor in the report of the case in 24 L. J. Ch. 722, a legal inference to that effect could not be drawn merely from the fact of the realty and personalty being dealt with together by the testator. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor was treated as turning on the special circumstances of the will before him in the subsequent case of Brookman v. Smith, 19 W. R. 1029, L. R. 6 Ex. 291. In that case the Court of Exchequer did in fact decide (whether it was necessary for them to do so or not) that a limitation in a settlement after the death of a lady to the use of the heirs and assigns of that lady as if she had died sole and unmarried did not give her a power of appointment. No doubt that case turned to a great extent on the use of the words "as if she had died sole and unmarried." But Quested v. Michell was distinguished on the ground above-mentioned, and Brookman v. Smith is an authority to show that there is no rule that a remainder given to the heirs and assigns of a person who is dead when the remainder takes effect must, in order to give special meaning to the word "assigns," be held to give that person a power of appointment; and it is noticeable that in his argument and reply in that case Mr. Waley said that Quested v. Michell appears to have been decided with reference to the very peculiar provisions of the will, and is a case which is not supported by other authorities, and is inconsistent with the view generally adopted in practice of an ultimate limitation to "heirs and assigns." Coming from such a source, that observation is not without weight. The other authorities cited in the course of the argument do not appear to be sufficiently pertinent to the case to require special mention. On the authorities as they stand we think that it is open to us to decide, and that it is right that we should decide, the present case in the manner already indicated. We agree in the judgment of Lawrance, J., and think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

DAUNCEY v. HOLLOWAY. (a.)

Libel — Slander — Words spoken of a solicitor imputing insolvency—"Money scrivener"—Imputation not upon him in his business—Words not per se actionable—No action lies in absence of proof of special damage.

Words imputing to a solicitor that he had "gone for thousands" and had "lost thousands," in the absence of proof of special damage, held not capable of bearing a meaning defamatory to the plaintiff in relation to his business or profession as a solicitor; and that there was, therefore, no case to go to the jury.

Action to recover damages for slander.

The plaintiff was a solicitor in practice, and in his statement of claim he alleged that he was carrying on the business or profession of a solicitor, and in the course of that business or profession he was in the habit of receiving moneys in trust for or on behalf of clients for investment and otherwise, and that the words complained of were spoken "in relation to his said business or profession, and the carrying on and conducting thereof by him, and in his capacity as a solicitor."

The words complained of were spoken by the defendant in the course of conversation with two persons whom he met in the street, and were: "They tell me he (the plaintiff) is gone for thousands instead of hundreds this time"; and "Miss A. told me Mr. Dauncey has lost thousands."

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff alleged that those words meant that he was insolvent, and would be unable to pay his clients the moneys received or held by him in trust for and on behalf of them, and that he was unfit to carry on the said business or profession, and to receive or hold moneys in trust for or on behalf of clients.

The action was tried before Wright, J., with a jury at Gloucester Assizes.

The plaintiff gave evidence that he was practising as a solicitor, and that his business mainly consisted of conveyancing; that he had been receiving trust moneys from his clients, and moneys on purchases and sales from them; and that he found mortgages for them and put their money out for them.

Evidence was also given that the defendant spoke the words complained of in the course of conversation with two persons whom he happened to meet in the street. The words were quite untrue, and were not justified in any way. No special damage was proved.

The sole question, therefore, was whether the words were actionable per se, as spoken of the plaintiff in relation to his said business or profession.

At the trial the plaintiff's counsel likened his client's particular class of business to the ancient calling of a "money scrivener," and contended that spoken of him as such, the words were per se actionable.

On the part of the defendant (who did not allege the truth of the words imputed to him) it was denied that the statements were actionable per se.

The learned judge held that the words complained of were not capable of bearing a meaning defamatory to the plaintiff in relation to his business or profession, and accordingly directed a verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff applied for a new trial.

A. H. Spokes, for the plaintiff.—It is for the jury to say whether the words complained of were spoken of the plaintiff in his character of a solicitor—in respect of his profession or business as such. If they held they were, then the words would be actionable per se, and no special damage need be proved in order to maintain this action, as the learned judge wrongly ruled when, in effect, he non-suited the plaintiff: Doyley v. Roberts, 3 Bing. N. C. 835. Such words spoken of a money scrivener would clearly be actionable per se: 1 Rolle's Abr., p. 59, Com. Dig., action upon the case for defamation, D. 25. Mr. Dauncey gave evidence at the trial that his business consisted principally in receiving clients' money for investment, and he said he therefore carried on business similar to that of a money scrivener, and that no special damage need be proved in order to maintain the action. The test is whether the words are likely to affect a man's credit: Whittington v. Gladwin, 5 B. & C. 180. If necessary I should be prepared to contend that such words spoken of any solicitor would be actionable, but it is sufficient for me to submit that in the case of this solicitor, carrying on the particular class of business that he does, the words are per se actionable. A "money scrivener" is defined in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary at p. 704 as "A person to whom property is intrusted for the purpose of lending it out to others at a profit payable to his principal, but also at a commission or bonus for himself, whereby he seeks wholly or in part to gain his livelihood." In Wharton's Law Lexicon the definition of the word given is this: "When a solicitor is the general depository of money of his client and other persons who employ him, not simply in his character of solicitor, but as a money agent, to invest their money on security at his discretion, allowing him procuration fees for any sum laid out on bond or mortgage, as well as a fee or charge for preparing the deeds, such a course of dealing is substantially the business of scrivener." The words here impute insolvency to the plaintiff and must affect his credit, and therefore a new trial should be directed.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and Stuart Bevan, for the defendant.—The defendant, who does not allege the truth of the words imputed to him, submits that the words complained of are not actionable per se. They do not impute dishonesty or professional misconduct or anything else which must ex necessitate be a slander on the person referred to. They were not spoken of the plaintiff in his character as a solicitor, nor in relation to his business or profession as such. In the absence of special damage the words must touch the solicitor in his profession. There is no evidence that the plaintiff carried on the business that a money scrivener formerly did. A scrivener invested money belonging to his clients in his own name. The plaintiff cannot contend that it was part of his business to do that. When looked at reasonably there is nothing in the words imputing personal unfitness on the part of the plaintiff to conduct the ordinary business of a solicitor, in the course of which he would no doubt often receive money from clients to invest for them. But he offers no evidence that, like a scrivener, clients had been in the habit of intrusting money to him before he had a security ready to invest it in. Therefore he offers no evidence that his business was substantially different to that carried on by any other solicitor, and there being nothing to connect the imputation with his professional conduct, in the absence of special damage no action will lie: Ayre v. Craven, 2 A. & E. 2; Gallwey v. Marshall, 2 W. R. 106, 9 Ex. Ch. 294; Brayne v. Cooper, 5 M. & W. 249.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I entirely agree with the judgment which Wright, J., delivered in this case, and with the reasons there given for it. That learned judge, whose decision we are asked to overrule, held that the words "They tell me he (the plaintiff) has gone for thousands not hundreds this time," and "I am told Mr. Dauncey has lost thousands" spoken of this solicitor, in the absence of proof of special damage, were not actionable. I cannot bring myself to hold that those words were capable of conveying an imputation upon the plaintiff in his character of solicitor, for they were not spoken of him in relation to his business or profession as such. My brother Wright came to the conclusion that the words were not capable of conveying an imputation of unfitness in the plaintiff to carry on business as a solicitor, and I am unable to see that the learned judge was wrong in so holding. I cannot, sitting here, say that the words were capable of conveying an imputation upon the plaintiff quâ solicitor, and he has not proved special damage and does not therefore bring himself within the class of cases referred to in the text-books cited to us. The words complained of were uttered in the street by the defendant in conversation with persons whom he met casually. They did not per se convey an imputation upon the plaintiff of any impropriety or unfitness in the conduct of his business, or that he was not able to carry on his business properly. The only imputation was that he had lost thousands or gone for thousands. In my opinion it would be unreasonable to say that those words impute a want of capacity in the plaintiff to carry on his business of a solicitor. For these reasons I think the judgment of Wright, J., should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I only desire to add this—that when long years ago our ancestors they would have been entitled to examine the books and for that purpose to have employed a competent agent. Therefore it seems to me that it is an expression of opinion of the Vice-Chancellor in a case outside litigation. But, secondly, even if it is limited to litigation, I do not myself see that that is a very significant observation in this case, for what is the meaning of granting it in litigation? The courts have got to make up their minds whether or not it is a case in which the party asking it should have inspection. That is the point that has got to be decided. When we have once arrived at the conclusion that he ought to have inspection then we are in the same position as we are now, unless the partnership deed or the nature of the conditions negative it. We are in the position that the person asking for it has a right of inspection. That is all that is decided in the litigation. Having decided that he has a right to inspection, how is it effectively to be given? There is none the less the necessity for it being effective if it is taken under a private agreement than there would be if it is given as the result of litigation. The question is, how is the inspection to be effective? It is nothing to tell me that in Brown v. Perkins the parties were in litigation as a reason why the plaintiffs should not get inspection under a private agreement unless something can be pointed to that excludes the right to it. When once you have construed the private agreement and desire to give effective inspection, then you give it exactly on the same principle and by the same standard as in the other case. Now that case appears to me to be a decision in favour of the view that I take. But there is also another case which seems to me an authority; although not decided actually in a partnership, it seems to me an a fortiori case. That is the case of Dadswell v. Jacobs. The head-note is this: "A firm of merchants residing abroad brought an action against their agent in this country claiming production of the documents relating to their business to a person appointed by them for that purpose. The defendant put in a defence stating that the person appointed by the plaintiff was a clerk in a rival and unfriendly house of business, for which reason he objected to produce the documents to him, but that he was willing to produce them to any proper person. The plaintiff moved under ord. 25, r. 4, to strike out the defence. Held (affirming the decision of Chitty, J.), that although a principal had a general right to the production of documents in the hands of his agent to any person appointed by him, he cannot insist on their being produced to an improper person and therefore the defence disclosed a reasonable answer to the claim." On p. 281 (34 Ch. D.) Cotton, L.J., says: "The plaintiffs are abroad, and of course it was the duty of the defendant, as agent, to produce to the principals any accounts that were kept for them, and where the principal is abroad, in my opinion the agent is bound to produce to any properly appointed agent of the principal any books of account kept for the principal." It is said here that in this case it is a case of partners, and that in the case I am citing, it is a case of agency, but partnership is only one division of the law of agency. A partner is a principal but he is also an agent. If the right to inspection by agents exists in the case between principal and agent it seems to me a fortiori that it ought to exist in the case where the relation is not that of principal and agent but where each for certain purposes is a principal. Therefore it seems to me that that is an authority in the absence of any special agreement at all, that out of the relation of principal and agent arises the right to inspection and that inspection can be carried out where the circumstances justify it by means of an agent. In this case one of the parties seeking inspection happens to be abroad, but being abroad is only one particular circumstance showing that that means of inspection is the only effective means. It does not exhaust all the cases in which inspection may be offered to the inspecting agent. Then we find on p. 286 what Lindley, L.J., says. He says: "No doubt the principal is entitled to come and see the books if he likes, and he is entitled to have a copy of them sent by the agent at the principal's expense. There is no controversy about that, and I am not at all prepared to deny his right to have the books inspected by a person whom the court thinks is a proper person in case of dispute on that point." So that although he had no absolute and unqualified right to have the books inspected by anyone he liked, which was not set up in the action, the court, holding that he had not that right, held that he had the qualified right of inspection by somebody else, provided that person was one to whom no reasonable objection could be taken. I should have said earlier that the contention of the defendants appears to me to be still more difficult to support in view of the fact that they have to concede that these persons who in their view are debarred from inspecting by a third person have the right to sit from day to day in the office of the managing partner and make full copies of all the books, and when they have done that to hand it over to the very person to whom the right of inspection is denied. That they have to concede, and conceding that they say the plaintiffs may do in that roundabout fashion something that might cause greater mischief than if it was done in a simple fashion. The principle upon which this right rests has been also discussed in other cases, and it has been distinctly stated where the question has been whether the right to inspect involves the right to take copies, that that is implied. That has been held to be implied in the right to inspect, and why? Because the inspection is not effective in the sense in which it was intended to be effective unless it carries with it as a corollary that incidental right. In fact it is put nowhere more fully than in Nelson v. Anglo-American Land Mortgage Agency Co., where Stirling, L.J., refers to the leading case, Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Co. The point in that case is stated in the head-note: "The right of a member or creditor of a company to inspect the register of mortgages under section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, includes a right to take copies of the register." The learned judge there cites from Lindley, L.J., in Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Co.: "Parliament having conferred the right to inspect, the court ought not so to construe the statute as to render the right conferred illusory, and if the court were to hold that in such a case as the present the right to inspect existed, but the right to take copies did not, the court would in effect be rendering the statute of no avail." Now that I think is very material upon this point. The right in that case, although conferred by an Act of Parliament which was limited merely to inspection, carried with it the means to render it effectual. Why is that principle not to be applied in the case before us? It seems to me that these cases are direct authority that it can be and ought to be unless there is something in the nature of the partnership which negatives the right. Otherwise you have got to read into the enabling provisions of the articles some disabling exclusion of a particular mode of availing themselves of the right conferred. So also with the decision of Hall, V.C., which has been referred to in In re Credit Co., where he held that the solicitor of a member of a company was entitled to inspect under section 43 of the Companies Act, although that right in terms was given by the section only to creditors and members. He says: "As regards the register of mortgages I am of opinion that there has been a refusal by the company to allow a shareholder to inspect it, though it has been contended that there was no refusal to him but only to his solicitors. I consider that the refusal was to produce to the applicant, and that there was no ground for that refusal." That, again, is simply an affirmation of the same principle as that which Stirling, L.J., followed in the case I have referred to. It is said that these cases have no bearing on the discussion, because they are cases of shareholders and cases of statutory enactments, and so forth. It seems to me, for the reasons I have given, that they are directly in point as to what is to be implied by a permission to inspect. How much does that cover? The decisions are that it covers everything to make it effective. That is the principle followed, and the only way those cases can be distinguished is not merely by saying that those are company cases and these are partnership cases. They would not be effectually distinguished except by pointing to some difference between the two. That comes to this, that you have got to get out of the fact that this is a partnership case, that therefore there is an exclusion. I have pointed out twice that if I did not get the exclusion out of the condition of the partnership, those cases are direct authority to show that the permission to a man to do something which he cannot do effectually without an agent to help him, carries with it the right to employ such an agent.

Now I do not think I need go into the other authorities that have been referred to in more detail. One case was, no doubt, very properly called to my attention by Mr. Cave. That is the case of the West Devon Great Consols Mine Co., in which without argument—without the point having been discussed at all or considered by Baggallay, L.J., who gave the judgment—Cotton, L.J., did consider that the right of a shareholder in such a company to inspection was personal to himself. Whatever the true view may be, the decision of Cotton, L.J., on the special terms regulating the right of shareholders in that case was a decision without the assistance of any argument or discussion during the case, and therefore that certainly does not appear to be an authority in point nor does it appear to me to be an authority that outweighs those decisions on fact and on principle which I have already referred to. Then it is said that there is a dictum of the President of the court in the Scotch case of Cameron v. M'Murray, decided I think as far back as 1855, but that dictum when read in its context does not appear to me to be an authority against the defendants at all. I do not know whether it is as exactly and precisely stated in point of language as one could wish, but it seems to me to be merely an affirmation of that limitation which it is conceded must exist upon the right of a partner demanding inspection. It is nothing more than an affirmation that the right of a partner to inspect by anybody else does not affect the obligation of not allowing a stranger to inspect to whose intervention objection could reasonably be taken. I think the right of inspection by an agent is limited to some person to whom no reasonable objection can be taken, and I doubt very much whether the learned President, in uttering the dictum which has been referred to, meant anything more than that. The actual decision in the case was that inspection was given and given by means of an agent in the litigation.

There is one more observation I desire to make, and that is that it has been urged in argument that a different standard is to be applied in litigation as compared to the standard to be applied without litigation. I put it to Mr. Cave, who argued extremely well for his client, what is the principle lying at the bottom of the distinction between the cases? One likes to get at the bottom of a principle to see what the real meaning is, and Mr. Cave said it is that suggested by Cotton, L.J., in the case referred to—that is to say, where it is outside litigation the court can have no control over the person who inspects—and therefore, although the right to inspect by a third party might not exist outside litigation, it may well be held to exist in litigation because the court can exercise control over the actual person inspecting. Be it so. How does that apply to this case? The court at this moment has got seisin of the whole position, and it is in a position to impose terms upon the person inspecting. Clearly the court has that power, and it is accepted by the plaintiffs, and they are ready to accept the limitations sought to be put upon them. Therefore, even if this were to be tried by the standard which the respondents contend for, and that standard was somewhat different from what it would be if there were no litigation, we are in a position to give the rights which can only be obtained by litigation and to impose the limitations which can be imposed only as the result of litigation. I have gone into the question at some length because unquestionably it is a case, as has been pointed out, of very considerable importance, and in my opinion it is a case in which I think we must accept the responsibility of dealing, not only with the particular provision in these articles, but incidentally and because they are practically to the same effect with the construction of the section of the Partnership Act. Therefore, considering this matter, and going through the authorities as I have done, I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge cannot be supported.

STIRLING, L.J.—I entirely agree with the conclusion my learned brother has arrived at, and with the reasons which he has given, but as the point which we have got to consider is one of considerable importance, and also as we are differing from the judgment given in the court below, I should like to add a very few words to show that I have given the matter my serious consideration. Now, the contention on behalf of the respondents, the defendants in the action, is that the rights of access to inspection of, and the right of copying partnership documents, which are conferred by sub-section 9, section 24, of the Partnership Act, 1890, and are also conferred by article 16 of the articles of partnership which we have got to deal with in the present case, are exercisable only by the partners personally and are not exercisable by them through agents. There I take leave to observe that the general rule of law is that whatever a person who is sui juris can do personally he can also do through his agent. That is the general rule. No doubt there are some exceptions. The reason of the rule may be stated in a few words in two sentences which I will read from a well-known treatise on agency—viz., that of Story. The learned author says on p. 2: "In the expanded intercourse of modern society it is easy to perceive that the exigencies of trade and commerce, the urgent pressure of professional, official, and other pursuits, the temporary existence of personal illness or infirmity, the necessity of transacting business at the same time in various and remote places, and the importance of securing accuracy, skill, ability, and speed in the accomplishment of the great concerns of human life must require the aid, assistance, and labours of many persons in addition to the immediate superintendence of him whose rights and interests are to be directly affected by the results. Hence the general maxim of our laws, subject only to a few exceptions above hinted at, is that whatever a man sui juris may do of himself he may do by another." That principle has been adopted by the English courts in many cases, as a good illustration of which I may refer to the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Whitley Partners, 34 W. R. 505. That case has no direct bearing upon the present, and I refer to it merely as an illustration of the way in which the principle has been applied by the English courts. There the head-note is: "C. verbally authorized O. to sign on his behalf the memorandum of association of a company. O. accordingly signed the name of C. to the memorandum without his own name appearing. The company being in course of winding up C. was put on the list and applied to have his name removed on the ground that he had never signed the memorandum nor agreed to take shares. Held, that, there being nothing in the Companies Act, 1862, to show that the Legislature intended anything special as to the mode of signature of the memorandum, the ordinary rule applied that signature by an agent is sufficient." I agree that where the right which is going to be exercised is conferred by some written instrument, either by a statute incorporated in the general partnership contract, or by the articles of partnership, it may be upon the true construction of the document from the context that the intention of the parties was that inspection should be personal; but unless you find something of that kind in the document itself you have no right to say that although an agent is not specially mentioned the exercise of the right by the agent is excluded. We come, therefore, to the consideration of the Partnership Act and of the articles of partnership with which we have to deal, with this view in our minds, that primâ facie whatever rights are given to the two parties are, unless there is something to be found in the Act limiting them, capable of being exercised by agents. If we look at the present deed of partnership, it does seem to me that it is one in which the reasons pointed out by Storey in that passage which I have read are very applicable indeed. The general scheme of this partnership was that the management of it should be placed in the hands of the defendants in this action as managing partners, who should have the direct control of the partnership and assets and books. Now the other partners I see by the description of them which appears in the articles of partnership are, first, a clergyman who is resident in Canada; secondly, two gentlemen of the name of Bevan who are surgeons at Monmouth; and the next is a lady described as a spinster; and those persons have conferred upon them under the Act and by virtue of the clause to which reference has been made rights of access to and examination of, and the right of taking copies of and extracts from, any of the books and partnership documents. All the plaintiffs to whom I have referred are, in the strict sense of the word, laymen as regards those matters. The whole control and management of the business is in the hands of the defendants as the managing partners, and I can hardly conceive but that if those rights are meant to be seriously used at all it is a case in which recourse must be had to the advice and assistance of experts with a view to the proper and beneficial use of the right conferred. That right was conferred for a purpose — namely, that they might be enabled to make themselves acquainted with the affairs of the partnership, and might be enabled to use the information which they have thus acquired, not, of course, to the detriment of the partnership or of their fellow-partners, but certainly with a view, so long as the rights of the firm in general or the rights of the partners are not infringed upon, of making a proper use and having the beneficial use and enjoyment of their own property. But it must be remembered throughout that these books and documents, like the rest of the partnership property, are just as much the books and papers of the plaintiffs as they are the books and papers of the defendants. Now do we find anything in the Act or in the deed which excludes the right of a partner to avail himself of the assistance of an agent in examining the books and taking copies of them? I confess I cannot find anything. If we look at article 16 itself it begins in this way: "Proper books of account shall be kept by the managing partners for the time being, in which all transactions relating to the partnership business shall be duly entered." That throws the duty of keeping the books on the managing partners. Were they bound to keep those books themselves, to make entries in them with their own hands? No one supposes anything of the kind. It is quite obvious that the managing partners may rightly and properly employ clerks and other persons to make up the books properly. Then let us proceed to see what is the right which is conferred upon the other partners. "Each of the partners shall have free access to and liberty to examine and copy or take extracts from any of the books and writings of the partnership at all reasonable times." Can it be contended that he who is desirous to avail himself of this right is bound himself to go and sit in the counting-house of the firm and make the copies and extracts which he desires to make with his own hands. I confess to me that seems to be quite unreasonable, and it seems to me that he may for the purposes of making these extracts and copies, just as the managing partners may for the purpose of making up the books, employ a proper clerk or other person to do the work. We then come to the question whether the right of access is to be limited to the partner personally, and the right of examination is to be limited to the partner personally. I confess I cannot see why it should be so. It is said that the idea of a third person being introduced is contrary to the nature of confidence which exists in every partnership relation. There is no doubt it is, but I cannot see that that prevents a partner for a proper purpose from acquiring the necessary information in order that he may exercise his own right properly. I cannot see that if a clergyman, or a surgeon, or other person, desires, as he is entitled to, to obtain full information as to the transactions of a large brewery in which he is engaged he is to be entirely devoid of all assistance, and, indeed, when the defendants are driven to the last stand they do not so contend, because it is admitted—or, at least, I have heard no argument to the contrary, and I do not think it was contended otherwise—that if the partner succeeded in getting from the books the information which he desires to acquire by his agent, he could immediately go to his agent from whom he wished to get confidential advice and submit the extracts and copies which he had himself procured to be made and get his confidential advice upon them. Now I think that the right which the partner has to employ an agent must, no doubt, be limited. The case of Dadswell v. Jacobs, which has already been referred to, is a decision of the Court of Appeal, but it does not follow that because a partner has a right to avail himself of the services of an agent he may choose as that agent any person he pleases. This agent must be a person to whom no reasonable objection could be taken, and, further, the agent must, I think, be one who is willing to put himself upon terms not to use the information which he acquires otherwise than properly. I believe that limitation rests on the partner himself, as was pointed out in the case of Trego v. Hunt, I believe by nearly every judge who dealt with it, but very clearly by Lord Davey in the House of Lords, who says, "The notice of motion asks that the defendant might be restrained from making any copy or extract from the books of the partnership for any purpose other than the business of the partnership. In my opinion that relief so asked was inconsistent. As well under the general law as under the express provisions of the articles of partnership the defendant was entitled during the partnership to have access to the books, and to make copies thereof or extracts therefrom. It is conceivable that, had the defendant proposed to use that information for purposes injurious or hostile to the interest of the firm, he might be restrained from so doing, but in such a case he would not be obtaining information properly, and the use which the partner proposed to make of it would be restrained." Therefore the partner who obtains information is bound to abstain from using it for an improper purpose. Equally the agent whom he employs in order to procure the information is under an obligation to abstain from using it for an improper purpose. In the present case the plaintiffs have nominated a gentleman to whom no objection is offered on the part of the defendants, and that gentleman is willing to give an undertaking that the knowledge which he acquires shall not be used for any purpose other than giving confidential advice to his employers with regard to their interests. It seems to me that the only possible injury to the defendants which they can suggest in their affidavits is protected against by an undertaking given in that form, and under these circumstances it seems to me that upon that undertaking being given there ought to be an injunction in the terms which we are asked for.

Appeal allowed.

MAYOR, &c., OF WOLVERHAMPTON v. EMMONS. (a.)

Contract — Contract to erect houses — Breach — Specific performance.

The defendant covenanted to erect certain houses on a piece of land sold to him for that purpose by the mayor and corporation of W., who sought to have houses erected on this site in order to increase the rateable value of that part of the town.

In an action to enforce specific performance of the covenant to build, with an alternative claim for damages for the non-performance of the covenant, the special jury assessed the damages at £50; and the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs for specific performance.

Held, that, this being a case in which the loss arising to the plaintiffs from the land remaining vacant could not be estimated in damages, specific performance of the covenant to build had rightly been granted.

Per Romer, L.J.—As a general rule the court will not grant specific performance of a building contract; but there is an exception to that rule where it is established (1) that the building work to be done is defined; (2) the plaintiff has a substantial interest in having the contract specifically performed which cannot be adequately compensated by damages; and (3) the defendant has, by reason of the contract, obtained possession of the land on which the building is to be erected.

Application by the defendant Samuel Emmons for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Wills, J., and a special jury at Birmingham Assizes.

The action was brought for specific performance of a covenant to build, or in the alternative for damages for breach of that covenant.

The short facts admitted or proved were these: By an indenture dated the 31st of July, 1897, between the plaintiffs, the Corporation of Wolverhampton, and the defendant, the plaintiffs conveyed to the defendant a piece of land fronting Canal-street, on the outskirts of the borough of Wolverhampton, and by the same indenture the defendant covenanted with the plaintiffs that he would commence to erect upon the land within twelve calendar months from the 25th of May, 1897, a new building or new buildings of a minimum height of 35ft. from the pavement to the eves or parapet, and not more than the height regulated by the bye-laws for the time being in force in the borough, and would complete the same ready for occupation within two years from the date aforesaid. The defendant submitted plans for eight houses, and they were accepted. He also cleared the land of the old buildings, but considering that in view of the overbuilt condition of the neighbourhood it would be impossible for him to make a profit out of his intended scheme, he decided not to build. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action to enforce the covenant, and the defendant pleaded this was not a case in which the court would grant specific performance, and he paid the sum of 40s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim for damages.

At the trial Wills, J., decided that the corporation could maintain this action for specific performance, but, in case the Court of Appeal should be of the contrary opinion, he asked the jury to say the amount of damages to which they thought the plaintiffs were entitled.

The jury returned a verdict for £50.

The learned judge entered judgment for specific performance, and the defendant appealed.

Jelf, K.C., and Disturnal, for the defendant.—This is not a case where the court ought to order specific performance, for the covenant, even if read with the subsequent agreement to build, is in too vague terms. It is well settled law that the court will not make a decree for specific performance of a building contract except in cases, perhaps, where there is no alternative remedy for the breach complained of. In a note to Pembroke v. Thorpe, 3 Swanst. 437, a number of cases are cited for and against the proposition that a specific performance may be decreed of a covenant to build. Here the jury, after considering all the circumstances of the case, have found that £50 is the measure of the damage suffered by the plaintiffs. The defendant is willing to pay that sum, but to build as proposed on the site would mean throwing away several thousand pounds, and the judgment directing specific performance ought on that ground not to stand. Webb v. The Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Co., 1 De G. M. & G. 521, is a case in point. There specific performance was refused on the ground that such a decree would produce more injustice than justice. That test has been often adopted by the courts when deciding whether a decree should be granted or refused. Further, it has never been the practice of the court (except in very exceptional cases) to grant specific performance of a covenant to build: see Fry on Specific Performance (3rd ed.), p. 44; South Wales Railway Co. v. Wythes, 3 W. R 3, 1 K. & J. 126; Greenhill v. Isle of Wight (Newport Junction) Railway Co., 19 W. R. 345. Apart from the subsequent agreement contained in the letter of the 5th of July, 1899, the covenant sought to be enforced could not have been the subject of a decree. It was simply to erect a new building or new buildings. Nothing was said as to the style or as to the material. It is clear from the statement of claim that it is this vague covenant that the plaintiffs seek to enforce.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and R. J. Lawrence, for the plaintiffs.—The judgment of Wills, J., directing specific performance is one that on the facts could properly have been given. In Mayor, &c., of London v. Southgate, 17 W. R. 197, 38 L. J. Ch. 141, which was decided since Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), it was held that the court had power to order the specific performance of a covenant to grant and accept a lease and gave damages for the non-building of a house: see also Asylum for Female Orphans v. Waterlow, 16 W. R. 1102. Assuming that the covenant to build as it stood in the indenture of the 31st of July, 1897, was too indefinite in terms, although the new building or new buildings were to be erected to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs' surveyor, yet the defendant having carried in plans which were approved cannot now be heard to say that the terms of the covenant are any longer in doubt. The covenant to build according to plans that have been agreed to is a definite contract and is capable of being enforced just as any other contract to which the doctrine of specific performance can be applied. The mere fact that the judge left to the jury the question of damages does not disentitle the plaintiffs from relying on their right to a decree for specific performance. Moreover, the quantum of damages was wholly inadequate, and cannot be regarded in the light of an alternative remedy for the admitted breach.

Jelf, K.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case the defendant, being minded to speculate in land and building, bought a piece of land in the town of Wolverhampton from the corporation for £1,000. The conveyance contained a covenant by the defendant that he would erect a new building or new buildings thereon within a certain period, but he failed to perform this obligation. He, however, obtained from the corporation further time on making promises to carry out his contract. There was correspondence, and by a letter of the 5th of July, 1889, the defendant undertook, that if further time was allowed him he would build eight houses within two months. That letter, coupled with certain plans to which it referred, was said by the plaintiffs to constitute a definite and unambiguous agreement, and one which the court, in the events that have happened, had power to order specific performance of. But still the defendant did not carry out his undertaking, and in March, 1900, the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action claiming specific performance, and, in the alternative, damages. The action should have been brought in the Chancery Division, and, in addition to that blunder, there followed another by the plaintiffs—namely, they asked in their statement of claim for the specific performance of the indefinite covenant contained in the indenture of the 31st of July, 1897. It was hopeless to ask for the specific performance of that covenant. At the trial Wills, J., saw that that covenant was too ambiguous for the plaintiffs to be entitled to an order for its specific performance, but in the course of the evidence it came out that a subsequent contract had been entered into between the parties which was sufficiently definite—the contract, I mean, contained in the letter of the 5th of July, 1899—and the learned judge allowed the case to proceed on the basis that that was the contract which the plaintiffs desired to have enforced. For greater caution, however, he took, and I think rightly, the opinion of the jury on the question of damages, and they assessed the damages at £50. He did not order judgment to be entered for the £50, because the plaintiffs had not in substance asked for damages, but had only made the claim for damages a subsidiary point. The defendant complained that the contract was so vague that this was not a case where the court could say exactly what the duty was that was cast upon him, and therefore could not decree its specific performance. But was that really so? When the plans and the two contracts are looked at together, it is perfectly clear that the kind of houses which the defendant was expected to erect were specifically defined. That being so, the contract to build was a specific unambiguous agreement. Then there arose a second consideration: Was the carrying out of this specific unambiguous agreement to build one of importance to the plaintiffs, with whom the agreement was made, over and above mere money damages? The evidence showed that it was. The plaintiffs desired to have buildings erected in that part of the town in order to raise the rateable value of that part of the borough. Wills, J., was fully aware of this, and feeling that the corporation would be but poorly compensated for the breach of the contract by £50 damages, made an order only for specific performance. I agree with Wills, J., in thinking that the loss arising to the plaintiffs from the land remaining vacant could not be estimated in damages and for the reasons I have stated, that this is a case in which the Court of Chancery would have ordered specific performance of the contract, and therefore that the judgment of Wills, J., was right and should be affirmed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess I have always felt some difficulty in understanding on what general principle the courts of equity have in some cases granted and in others refused specific performance of a a contract to build. Probably the reason is that there is no one principle underlying all the cases, and that the attitude of the courts towards the question has varied at different times. In the case we are now considering I agree, and for the reasons already stated, that the order for specific performance should be affirmed. I think it is quite clear that no adequate compensation in money could be made to the plaintiffs for non-performance.

ROMER, L.J.—I also have felt some doubts as to the principle to be applied to such a question as is now before us; but the conclusion I have come to here is that the judgment of Wills, J., ought not to be disturbed. And for this reason. It is clear that the plaintiffs have not lost any right to specific performance which they would otherwise have had by reason of the conduct of the trial. It is clear that all through they were insisting on their right to specific performance. The order as drawn up should be amended, in my opinion, in some particulars, and I propose to state shortly the alterations which, with the consent of my learned brothers, I think should be made in it. [The learned judge having read the order as he thought it ought to read, continued:] It is quite clear from the cases cited in Fry on Specific Performance (3rd ed.), pp. 45 et seq., that as a general rule the court has not thought fit to grant specific performance of a building contract. But there are certain recognized exceptions to that rule, and whenever the plaintiffs seeking specific performance of a building contract can show that they come within the exceptions the court has invariably made an order. Now what are those exceptions? I again quote from Fry's admirable work. The plaintiffs to succeed must establish first that the building work was defined—that is to say, that the nature of it was so definitely ascertained that the court might know with certainty what was the work agreed to be done. Secondly, they must show that they had a substantial interest in having the contract specifically performed, and that that was an interest which could not be adequately compensated by damages. In short, that they had open to them no other remedy; and, thirdly, they must prove that the defendant had by reason of the contract obtained possession of the land on which the building was to be erected and so put it out of their power to build. I think in this instance all these three requisites are satisfied, and the plaintiffs having come within the exception to the general rule have a right to have the order for specific performance in their favour affirmed.

Jelf, K.C., asked that the time within which the buildings were to be completed should be extended, and that there should be no order as to costs, the court having modified the order as drawn up in the court below.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs.

WRIGHT v. SHARMAN. (a.)

Will—Residue—Bequest of residue of personal estate after payment thereout of all testamentary expenses—Estate duty on real estate.

A direction in a will that all testamentary expenses shall be paid out of the residuary personalty does not include the payment of estate duty in respect of the realty.

Originating summons.

John Sharman by his will, dated the 22nd of December, 1899, devised his real estate to his trustees upon trust to pay the rents and profits to George Sharman for life, and after giving certain legacies bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate "after payment thereout of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses" in trust for the persons therein named.

The testator died on the 18th of April, 1900. The summons raised the question whether the estate duty payable, on the decease of the testator, in respect of his real estate, ought to be paid out of the residuary personal estate or ought to be borne by the real estate.

KEKEWICH, J., said: The question is whether the expression testamentary expenses includes estate duty on real estate. If the testamentary expenses include estate duty on real estate then this duty ought to be paid out of the residuary personalty. In In re Clemow, 48 W. R. 541, [1900] 2 Ch. 182, the only question that arose was inrespect of personal estate, and as to estate duty which it was necessary for the executors to pay in order to obtain probate. Again in In re Treasure, 48 W. R. 696, [1900] 2 Ch. 648, only personal estate was in question. It is not necessary for the executors to pay the duty on the real estate. They may pay it if they like, but as the duty is made a first charge upon the property they can obtain probate without paying it. The point must have been considered by Joyce, J., in In re Jolley, 17 Times L. R. 244, though he seems to have been dealing with the particular facts of that case. So far as it is an authority, it is in favour of the real property bearing its own duty notwithstanding a direction concerning testamentary expenses. Another point taken is, that since the Land Transfer Act, 1897, the real estate passes to the executors as such, and that therefore, the case not coming within section 9 of the Finance Act, 1894, the executors are liable to pay the duty upon it. As to that I simply follow the decision of Buckley, J., in In re Palmer, (1900) W. N. 9. I accept the law as I find it stated by him and follow it without question. The duty must therefore be borne by the real estate.

Power—Appointment—Power exercisable by deed or writing duly executed or by will—Testamentary documents not admitted to probate—Exercise of power.

A power of appointment exercisable by deed or writing duly executed or by will is not validly exercised by testamentary documents executed by the donee, but attested by one witness only, and containing no reference to the power or to the property subject to it.

This was a summons taken out by the surviving trustee of the will, dated the 13th of August, 1840, of Neil Benjamin Edmonstone (who died the 4th of May, 1841) for the determination (inter alia) of the question whether certain paper writings in the handwriting of the late Anne Craigie Edmonstone, a daughter of the testator, or any and which of them operated as valid appointments or a valid appointment of the sum of £7,000 or the investments representing it (part of the testator's estate) under any of the powers for that purpose conferred upon the said Anne Craigie Edmonstone by the said will.

The testator bequeathed the net residue of his personal estate in trust for his three sons and six daughters in equal shares, and as regards each of his unmarried daughters (of whom Anne Craigie Edmonstone was one) declared trusts of £7,000, part of the share of residue so bequeathed to her. Under these trusts £7,000 and the investments representing it, was to be held in trust for each daughter for her life, and after her death, unmarried or leaving no child who attained a vested interest, in trust for such person or persons and in such manner in all respects as she should if unmarried by any deed or writing with or without power of revocation, or by will or codicil to be by her respectively duly executed from time to time, or at any time, direct or appoint, give or dispose of the same; and in default of and subject to any appointment, in trust for her sisters or sister living at her decease.

Anne Craigie Edmonstone died a spinster and intestate on the 12th of December, 1899, leaving personal estate of the net value of about £12,000; the £7,000 subject to the power being then represented by investments to the value of about £9,000. She had never exercised the power unless by certain paper writings in her handwriting found among her papers after her death. These paper writings were three in number, and two papers were further annexed to the first paper; but only this paper and one of the papers annexed to it were signed by Miss Edmondstone. Each signature was attested by one witness, one of these witnesses being a clergyman. The first paper contained various pecuniary gifts to relatives and others, each made in the words "I leave"; and concluded with the words "I wish my nephews W. H. Edmonstone and Marmaduke E. Browne to carry out my instructions." The papers annexed to it contained certain alterations in these gifts, and the words "my nephew N. B. Edmonstone to be residuary legatee. I believe there is not money enough to carry out these instructions." The second and third papers (unsigned) contained further gifts made in the same way; and altogether the first paper and those annexed to it purported to dispose of £14,380, and the second paper of £7,400. None of the papers contained any reference to the power or the fund subject to it. There being some doubt, whether all the parties interested were before the court, it was agreed that the question should be determined as between the testator's estate and Mr. N. B. Edmonstone as a beneficiary under the first paper.

Levett, K.C., and B. B. Swan, for the trustee of the will.

Mulligan, K.C., and Robertson, for Mr. N. B. Edmonstone.—The phrase "residuary legatee" refers to the residue of the £7,000, not of Miss Edmonstone's own estate, and "I leave" means only "I give at my death." The court will not construe the documents as a will and so render them a nullity, since they could not be admitted to probate. Miss Edmonstone must be taken to have known that they were inadmissible, and accordingly she must have intended them to operate on the settled fund, since there was no other property on which they could operate.

They cited Farwell on Powers (2nd. ed.), p. 176; and Denn v. Roake, 6 Bing. 475; Brodrick v. Brown, 1 K. & J. 328, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 54; Proby v. Landor, 9 W. R. 47, 28 Beav. 504; In re Morgan, 7 Ir. Ch. Rep. 18; and Hales v. Margerum, 3 Ves. 299.

Norton, K.C., and John Henderson, for the parties entitled in default of appointment.—The documents are testamentary in character and, accordingly, the court is not at liberty to look at them. But if they are not testamentary, they are inoperative as an execution of the power, since they refer neither to the power nor to the property.

They referred to the above cases and to the Wills Act, 1837, s. 10.

Mulligan, K.C., replied.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts, continued: Everything in these documents point to their being intended as a will, on the face of it, except the fact that they are not properly attested. The expressions "I leave" and "my nephew to be residuary legatee," and the alterations which the lady has made in her original gifts, all lead me to the conclusion that the documents are an intended will, or instructions for one, and the request to the nephews to carry out her instructions seems to me an informal appointment of executors. And I may observe that no evidence has been called as to the circumstances under which the documents were executed. But even if they are to be looked at as writings, and not as testamentary documents, I am not satisfied that Miss Edmonstone intended them to operate as an execution of the power, since they contain no reference to the power or to the property subject to it, and all the cases have decided that one or other of these references is necessary unless there is no other property on which the provision made by the donee of the power can operate. But here it seems clear that the lady did not intend her dispositions to operate on the settled fund only, since she disposed of over £20,000, the fund amounting only to £9,000. To hold this a valid appointment would be going far beyond anything laid down in any of the cases, and I cannot do it. I must hold that none of the documents operated as a valid appointment of any part of the fund in favour of Mr. N. B. Edmonstone.

In re CRICHTON'S OIL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Assets — Distribution — Previous loss of capital — Last year's profits — No dividend declared — Preferred and ordinary shareholders — Articles.

Where, on a limited company going into liquidation, there is standing to the credit of its revenue account a sum representing undivided net profits,

Held, that such sum, though it might have been made available for dividend to preference shareholders, in spite of a previously existing debit for loss of capital, was not to be applied as dividend if, prior to the liquidation, no dividend had been recommended by the directors or declared by the company in accordance with the articles.

This was a summons by the voluntary liquidators of the above company asking that it might be determined whether a sum of £1,675, being the amount of the profit made by the said company in the year ending the the 31st of March, 1900, ought (notwithstanding the previously existing debit to profit and loss) to be distributed in the liquidation as dividend among the preference shareholders of the company.

The capital of the company was divided into preference and ordinary shares, and by the memorandum it was declared that the preference shares should "confer on the holders a right to a fixed accumulative preferential dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the capital paid up thereon subject to the provisions of the company's articles of association."

By clause 6 (b) of the articles it was provided "that in the event of the winding up of the company, the surplus assets shall be distributed between the holders of preference and ordinary shares according to the amount paid up thereon."

Clause 103 (14) gave the directors power to set aside a reserve fund with a proviso that so much only of the reserve fund as represented profits should be applicable to the payment of dividends.

Clause 108 was as follows: "The profits of the company from time to time available for dividend shall, subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained be applicable: First, to the payment of the fixed cumulative preferential dividends on the preference shares in the original capital. Secondly, the surplus shall be applicable to the payment of dividends on the other shares in proportion to the capital paid up thereon, but the whole or any part thereof may be carried to reserve or otherwise dealt with as the directors with the sanction of the company in general meeting may from time to time determine.

"Clause 110.—The company in general meeting may declare a dividend to be paid to the members.

"Clause 111.—No larger dividend shall be declared than is recommended by the directors, but the company in general meeting may declare a smaller dividend.

"Clause 112.—No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company.

"Clause 139.—If the company shall be wound up, and the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets, shall, subject to clause 6 (b), be distributed so that as nearly as may be the losses shall be borne by contributories in proportion to the capital paid up or which ought to have been paid up on the shares in respect of which they are contributories at the commencement of the winding up."

All the preference and ordinary shares which were issued were fully paid up.

In July, 1900, the company passed resolutions sanctioning an agreement for the sale of the assets of the company and for voluntary winding up of the company, and in August, 1900, a contract was entered into with an agent for a new company for the sale of the assets of the company, "exclusive of any undivided net profits of the business appearing in the balance-sheet for the year ending the 31st of March, 1900." Such profits amounted to the said sum of £1,675. Dividends on the preference shares had been paid up to the 31st of March, 1896, but from that date, no profits having been made until 1900, no dividends were declared. The books of the company showed a debit of over £4,000 for losses in previous years.

The amount produced by the sale was insufficient to pay the shareholders the amount of capital paid up on the shares.

A. R. Kirby, for the voluntary liquidator, asked for the direction of the court.

A. Dunham for the preference shareholders, contended that the fund in question should be employed in paying all arrears of dividend to the preference shareholders. A company is not called on to recoup capital lost in previous years out of subsequent profits, it may declare a dividend out of such profits: In re National Bank of Wales, 48 W. R. 99, [1899] 2 Ch. 629, and Bishop v. Smyrna and Cassaba Railway Co., 43 W. R. 647, [1895] 2 Ch. 265. [WRIGHT, J.—The mere fact of losses on previous years does not interfere with declaring profits on another year, but it may be quite different if the company has established another practice of not paying dividends in such a case.] No such practice has been established here.

F. Cassel, for the ordinary shareholders, argued that (1) there had been no recommendation or declaration of dividend by the directors or shareholders in accordance with the articles, and therefore the fund could not be employed in paying such dividend. Article 108 merely said profits "shall be applicable" not "shall be applied"; and (2) that there was no case yet in which it had been held that, while there was a debit in the accounts of the company, the profits of a particular year could be applied as dividend in the winding up of the company. Prior to the winding up the company could have declared a dividend, but it had not done so, and the court would now look to the whole profits and loss of the company and would not throw all the losses unfairly on capital.

He referred to In re Odessa Waterworks Co., (1897) W. N. 167.

Dunham, in reply, said that the case of In re Odessa Waterworks Co. was essentially different, as there the surplus assets arose in the winding up as a result of a sale taking place in the winding up, here they arose prior to that event; moreover the language in the two cases was different.

WRIGHT, J.—The question in this case is, whether this fund, the profits of one year's trading, is shown to be profits belonging to the preference shareholders? It is for the preference shareholders to make out that this fund is available for dividend, and this they have failed to do. Here there has been no declaration of dividend by the company nor even a recommendation of dividend by the directors, and it has not been considered whether the whole or any part of the £1,675 shall be carried to the reserve fund, or how the debit on the profit and loss account shall be dealt with. It is most improbable that the entire £1,675 would have been treated as dividend if the company had continued to carry on its business. I think it was necessary to show not only that the £1,675 might have been, but that it actually was, made available for dividend, and as this has not been shown the claim of the preference shareholders therefore fails.

SQUIRE (Appellant) v. BAYER & CO. (Respondents) (a.)

Master and servant—Factory—Fine for breach of rule as to good order and decorum—Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44), s. 1, sub-section 1 (b) (c).

The respondents, who were corset manufacturers, and were the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory Acts, 1878 to 1895, entered into a contract with a girl, Helen Robbins, and employed her as a machinist in their factory. The following rule (inter alia) formed part of the contract: "All workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory, and shall not do anything which may interfere with the proper and orderly conduct of the business thereof, or of any department thereof, and shall in all respects obey the lawful commands of the general manager, forewoman, or superintendent of their respective departments. A fine of sixpence (or less, at the discretion of the manager) shall be paid by each worker who shall be guilty of any infringement of this rule."

The employees were, if they wished, allowed to have their dinners in the workroom. On one occasion the clerk in charge of the factory heard a considerable noise in the workroom, and on going there discovered disorder, the girl Robbins playing a small harp and the other girls dancing. For this disorder Robbins and some of the others were fined the sum of twopence each.

The appellant, an inspector of factories, thereupon by an information made complaint that the respondents had committed breaches of section 1, sub-section 1 (b) and (c), of the Truck Act, 1896, on the ground that the said rule did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed, and that the fine imposed was not in respect of some act or omission within the meaning of sub-section 1 (c).

The justices found that good order and decorum were not observed, and that dancing and disorder were likely to cause loss or damage to the respondents, and that the said rule constituted a reasonable contract, and complied with section 1, sub-section 1 (b) and (c), of the said Act, and they accordingly dismissed the information. On appeal by the inspector of factories,

The court held that the justices had decided rightly; the rule was good and was not too general, and there had been such a breach thereof as justified a fine being imposed. The words "good order and decorum" must be construed with reference to the special circumstances under which a particular business is carried on, having regard to the place in which any alleged disorder takes place.

This was a case stated by the justices for the city and county of Bristol for the opinion of the court on an information by Rose E. Squire, an inspector of factories and workshops, who alleged that the respondents had committed breaches of sub-section (1) (b) and (c) of section 1 of the Truck Act, 1896.

The information complained that on the 13th of November, 1900, the respondents, being employers within the Truck Act, 1896, unlawfully did make a contract with Helen Louisa Robbins for a deduction for or in respect of a fine of sixpence or less, from the sum contracted to be paid by them to her contrary to section 1, sub-section 1, of the aforesaid Act, in that the contract did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine might be imposed, and that the said fine was not in respect of some act or omission which caused or was likely to cause damage or loss to the said employers or interruption or hindrance to their business.

The following facts were proved or admitted before the justices:

The appellant was one of H.M. inspectors of factories.

The respondents were corset manufacturers, and were the occupiers of the Victoria Works, Roman's-road, Easton, Bristol, which said works were a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895.

The document called Rules, and forming part of this case, was produced by the respondents as containing the terms of the contract between them and their employees, amongst which rules was the following provision: "All workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory, and shall not do anything which may interfere with the proper and orderly conduct of the business thereof, or of any department thereof; and shall in all respects obey the lawful commands of the general manager, forewoman, or superintendent of their respective departments. A fine of sixpence (or less at the discretion of the manager) shall be paid by each worker who shall be guilty of any infringement of this rule."

In November, 1900, the respondents made a contract with Helen Louisa Robbins (being a workman within the meaning of the said Act), upon the terms mentioned in the said document, and employed her as one of their machinists, the hours of work being from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m.

The respondents granted to their employees the privilege of having their dinners in the workroom of the factory between 1 p.m. and 2 p.m., but the said employees were not obliged to have their dinners in the said factory and could dine at home, or elsewhere, if they so wished. It was proved that the rules of the factory were in force as well during the dinner hour as at other times, and this was known to the employees. On one day in November, after the date of the aforesaid contract, during the dinner hour, Miss Knight (a clerk), who was then in charge of the factory, but whose room was immediately underneath that in which the employees were having dinner, heard a considerable noise and commotion going on in this room. On going there she discovered disorder, the said Helen Louisa Robbins playing a small harp, to the music of which several of the other girls were dancing, singing, and clapping their hands.

Miss Knight, in the course of her duty, reported this disorder, and Robbins and some of the others taking part in it were fined the sum of twopence each.

The girl Robbins stated before the justices that she had not been informed that it was wrong to dance and sing during the dinner hour, and that she was not aware there was any harm in it, but it was proved that a copy of the rules, before referred to, was posted in this workroom and other copies at other places in the factory, and Robbins admitted that she and the other girls would not have done what they did if Miss Knight had been present.

It was proved that the disorder and dancing caused considerable dust, and that dust would cause injury to the machines at which the employees worked, as well as to the material served out to them to work upon.

It was further proved that no fines were deducted from the wages of the employees, but a fine book was kept and once a week the said employees were asked to pay such fines after they had received their wages in full, and a receipt was given for such fine, and the following is a copy of the receipt given to Robbins:—

"The sum of 2d. has this day been received from Robbins in respect of a fine for making noise during dinner hour.—Dated this 10th day of November, 1900."

Upon the above facts the appellent contended: (a) That the said rule did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed; (b) that the fine imposed under the said rule was not in respect of some act or omission within the meaning of sub-section 1 (c) of the 1st section of the Truck Act.

The respondents on the other hand contended that the words of the said rule sufficiently specified the acts and omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed, and that the fine, in fact, inflicted was in respect of an act which caused or was likely to cause damage or loss to the respondents, or interruption or hindrance to their business.

The justices found as a fact, upon the evidence adduced before them that good order and decorum were not observed, and that dancing and disorder were likely to cause damage or loss to the respondent employers, and injury to the discipline to be enforced in a factory of this description.

They also found, as a fact, that the said rule (which was the only one in dispute) constituted a reasonable contract between the respondents and their employees for securing good order and decorum in the factory and complied with sub-section 1 (b) and (c) of the 1st section of the said Act, and they accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether on the facts above stated the justices came to a right conclusion. If they were wrong this case was to be remitted to them with such directions as the court might think fit to give.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (H. Sutton with him), for the appellant.—The magistrates should have convicted the respondents. A rule which says "all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory" is not a sufficient specification of the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine may be imposed so as to satisfy sub-section 1 (b), the whole object of which is that specific notice shall be given to the employees of the particular offences for which they will be fined. The rule is much too vague and general. There is no notice that the employees are not to dance or play music. Further, what the girl Robbins did cannot fairly be called a breach of good order and decorum.

Foote. K.C. (Douglas Metcalfe with him), for the respondents.—If the contention that this rule is too vague be correct, it would follow that it would be necessary to specify all possible acts of disorder. That would be impracticable and unreasonable. General terms must be used. It would be very difficult to say what the words "good order" and "decorum" mean. They must be construed with reference to the special circumstances of each case and the business being carried on.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The case is not free from difficulty, but in my opinion we cannot say the magistrates have come to a wrong decision.

We have to consider, firstly, whether this rule is a good one, and secondly, whether there was such a breach thereof as would justify a fine being imposed, having regard to the terms of the statute. Now, by section 1, sub-section 1, there must be a contract which shall specify the acts and omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed, and the fine must be in respect of some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer. Under sub-section 2 all deductions are to be made in pursuance of such a contract, and particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed are to be given to the workman. In this case the magistrates have found that there was during the dinner hour disorder and dancing—but "disorder" is the word to which I call attention—in the factory workroom; that to the knowledge of the employees the rules were in force as well during the dinner hour as at other times, and that the disorder was discovered and reported by the clerk in the course of her duties. It has been pressed upon us, and we must consider the matter, that a rule which says "all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory" is not a sufficient specification of the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine can be imposed. Now, as there are so many different factories and so many different kinds of businesses, good order and decorum must be something with reference to the particular character of the business carried on and the particular privileges which are given to the workpeople. I think that it would be going too far to say that a rule imposing a fine for breach of good order and decorum is too general. I agree that in one sense the rule does not specify a particular act or omission, but I do think that the words "good order and decorum" are words which have to be construed with reference to the circumstances under which the business is carried on. Speaking for myself I think it is a sufficient compliance with the Act to say, "We shall impose a fine if while in the factory you do not observe good order and decorum."

It was next contended by the Attorney-General that there is no evidence of anything done by Robbins which could fairly be called a non-observance of good order and decorum. As to that I think these facts stated by the magistrates prevent that point from really being raised, and in face of these facts I think we cannot take the isolated act of the girl who provided the music, however innocent that act may have been in itself, and say that that particular act was not part of the disorder which the magistrates found to have taken place.
